This is not all however; other questions enter into consideration besides the commercial one. We hold our influence in the Mediterranean by our possession of the fortress of Gibraltar, and the Island of Malta. Spain, weakened and distracted as she is, does not forget that Gibraltar is on her territory, and would not be sorry to see us evacuate it, though a poor and embarrassed Government could not hope to maintain it in its present efficient state. And France would be glad of any opportunity of regaining possession of Malta; by converting the whole of the coast of Algeria and Morocco into the seaboard of a French colony, she would have most efficient means of embarrassing the supply of these two important posts, and some dim vision of such a contingency may have its influence on these bombardings and seizures, which are disturbing the repose of politicians, awakening the anxieties of the peacefully disposed, shaking the sense of security in which we have, perhaps, too long indulged, and, doing worse than all this, giving rise to discussions on points of national courage, and national skill in war, which inflame the desire on both sides to bring the dispute to the one fatal and decisive proof which is only to be derived from war itself. It is sad to think that the education and experience of the present, combined with the history of the past, should not have taught nations a juster estimate of what are their true interests. Is it inevitable that of every half century twenty-five years must be passed in battles and bloodshed, to the waste of energies and wealth that might be so much better employed? It is little more than a quarter of a century since Europe sat down after one of the longest, most general, and most bloody wars recorded in history. It loaded us with a debt that at this moment presses like an incubus on every spring of industry throughout the empire, increasing the cost of every article of life, and proportionally tasking the energies of every individual beyond the amount of toil that would otherwise be required to earn them. Are we to be compelled to bring additional burthens upon ourselves, and anticipate still further the resources of posterity—for war is but a synonym for running the nation deeper in debt? Most fervently do we hope that the extremity will be avoided; there is no one party in England anxious for war; it is here looked on as it deserves to be, as an evil of the most desperate kind; we do not surround it with any false glare of glory; we do not array the bloody reality in the dazzling hues that blind the eyes of men to the hideousness of the demon to whom they give themselves as the self-immolated victims of an unholy sacrifice. But this full appreciation of the true character of war, will not preserve us from it; it is always in the power of a quarrelsome nation to drive a quiet neighbour into hostilities, and this is our position at the present moment with respect to France. We shall be compelled to some act of hostility by the mere necessity of self-protection: the consequences we need not anticipate. A desire to be at peace does not imply the absence of that spirit and resolution which are necessary in war; these we have always possessed, and to them we add a naval force whose power is tremendous, should it be necessary fully to exert it. There is no desire on our part to engage in a war, neither should we be capable of avoiding it by any mean or dishonourable compromise. The Government, perhaps, has relied too much on the pacific professions of France, and left our force in the Mediterranean too small to meet any sudden emergency; but this is a mistake that is already, we believe, being rectified.

Two old Pacha of Egypt did not abdicate, notwithstanding the positive report of his having done so. He quarrelled with his council, got into a passion, quitted Alexandria in a fury, and did, it seems, threaten to give up all interference with the affairs of government, and make a pilgrimage to Mecca. Those second thoughts, however, which are said to be generally the best, came to his aid. He cooled down, and, on their part, the council reconsidered their share in the dispute, gave up the point to the Pacha, who thereupon returned, and was himself again. It is easy to perceive how this affair might be exaggerated into a formal abdication; but it was an unlikely step for the old Pacha to take. In the East there is nothing between dethronement and death; the step is from the divan to the tomb. Even with respect to subordinate officers of Government the surest dismissal is considered to be that of the bowstring, which discharges the dignity of his office and his life together. Mehemet Ali himself disposed of Defturdar, his son-in-law, whom he made Governor of Kordofan, by a bowl of poison—so that he understands both the principle and the practice. He must rule or die. Abdication by an Eastern monarch would be little better than an act of suicide; and the only thing that could account for it would be, that exhaustion of soul which the long possession of absolute power sometimes induces, and which drives them from being despots to become devotees. Charles V. is an instance of it, which will occur to every one:—

The Spaniard, when the last of away
Had lost its quickening spell,
Threw crowns for roses away,
An empire for a cell;
A subtle despotism on creeds,
A strict accountant of his beads,
His dotage trifled with;
Yet better had he never known
The bigot's cell or despot's throne.

But we remember no instance of a Mahometan ruler abdicating in consequence of the "mind diseased," by ambition taking the direction of piety. The religion of the Koran was that of an enthusiast, a soldier, and a ruler; it does not, therefore, inculcate such self humiliation in the "Commanders of the Faithful." Neither is Mehemet Ali the sort of man of which pilgrims and hadjis are made. He is a shrewd, calculating, unprincipled, and worldly man; much of whose tolerance of the Christians arose from his perfect indifference to all religions—his own inclusive. A more orthodox Mussulman would have been a hater of the "Infidels;" but then Egypt would have lost the services, the example, and the teaching which it derived from the many Christians Mehemet Ali encouraged and employed. We are glad that the Pacha resumes the reins of government: his retirement at the present moment would have added to the complications that surround our position in the Mediterranean. He has an able head, and keeps together a government, that, without him, would fall into a mere mass of anarchy. He is, besides, well disposed to the English, and renders us essential service in keeping open our overland communication with India. The French always had a desire to establish a footing in Egypt, and the death or abdication of the Pacha would probably induce them to make a move in that direction; their occupation of any part of Egypt would be anything but an advantage, either to that country in particular or the world in general. We should inevitably have to seize the territory that would enable us to command the Isthmus of Suez, or consent to be driven round the Cape of Good Hope as the route to India. Even when we were battering down his forts and beating his troops, the old Pacha escorted the mail-bags and passengers across the desert as if nothing had happened—an act that none of the rulers of civilised Europe would have had the forbearance to do. Mehemet has his good points about him, and Egypt would probably gain nothing by a change; any other ruler would be as despotic, would grasp at and monopolise the whole trade of the country, and engage in the slave-trade. But very few would possess his ability, and none would long maintain the supremacy necessary for a stable government. We are glad that Mehemet is again smoking his pipe, levying taxes, and abusing his council at Alexandria.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY.

We have the pleasure of stating that the Queen is now sufficiently restored to be able to take short sittings in the grounds of the royal residence. Her Majesty left the Castle, for the first time since her accouchement, yesterday week, during the finest portion of the day, and was drawn about the royal gardens for upwards of half an hour in a low chair, his Royal Highness Prince Albert walking by the side of the Queen.

PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTH-DAY.

Monday being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the birth of Prince Albert, the auspicious event was celebrated at the royal residence, and throughout Windsor, with every demonstration of attachment and respect. At twelve o'clock a royal salute was fired from the corporation ordnance, in the Bachelors' acre; and at one o'clock a royal salute was also fired from a battery erected in a field in the Frogmore-road, opposite the Castle.

Her Majesty, who, we rejoice to state, looked remarkably well, and seemed to be in most excellent spirits, appeared in public, for the first time since the birth of the infant Prince, this day. The Queen left the Castle at noon, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in a pony phaeton and a pair of grays, the Prince Consort driving, and proceeded through the Long Walk into the Great Park. The Queen and the Prince returned to the Castle after an absence of upwards of an hour. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness returned the loyal and affectionate salutations which greeted them throughout their drive in the most marked and affable manner.

At eight o'clock the eastern terrace of the Castle was illuminated. In addition to the illumination of the Castle terrace, a most brilliant display of fireworks took place at the lodges forming the entrance to the Long Walk. In the metropolis, the bells rung merry peals, whilst from their several towers was displayed the royal standard. At one o'clock the Park and Tower guns fired a royal salute in honour of the day. The various vessels on the river displayed the royal standard, union jack, &c. In the evening the illuminations were more general than usual.

On Saturday last Prince Albert rode on horseback attended by Colonel Wyld. The Royal family were taken on a riding in the grounds about the Castle, and in the afternoon were taken a carriage drive. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal went to the residence of the Duchess of Kent, Frogmore Lodge.

FRIDAY.—The ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. The Duchess of Kent attended divine service at St. George's Chapel.

MONDAY.—To-day was the birthday of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The auspicious event was celebrated at the Castle. In the afternoon Prince Albert walked in the royal gardens. A number of the nobility and gentry called during the day at the Castle to pay their respects.

TUESDAY.—Prince Albert inspected the second battalion of the Scots Fusilier Guards in the Great Park. The Queen took an airing in a pony phaeton for upwards of an hour. Prince Albert drove her Majesty out. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, after luncheon with the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore House, went with her Royal Highness to the Castle, on a visit to the Queen.

WEDNESDAY.—The ceremony of churning the Queen took place this morning in the private chapel of the Castle, the Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiating. His Royal Highness Prince Albert attended the ceremony. The Queen and Prince Albert walked on the Terrace and in the pleasure grounds adjacent to the Castle this morning. A garden chair was taken for her Majesty's use when required. The Judge Advocate-General arrived at the Castle in the forenoon, and had an audience of the Queen, to submit to her Majesty the proceedings of some courts-martial. The Queen took an airing in the afternoon, in a pony phaeton. The Royal Family were taken their usual airings.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—This morning, at seven o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert left the Castle in a travelling carriage and four, preceded by outriders, for the Farnborough station, on the line of the South Western Railway, en route to the Isle of Wight. The Prince was attended by Mr. G. E. Anson and Lieut.-Colonel Wyld, squermy in waiting. The object of his Royal Highness's visit to the Isle, was to inspect Osborne House, (where he was met by Mr. Saunders, of the Lord Chancery's department), preparatory to the arrival of the Royal Family, who are expected to reach there in about ten days or a fortnight. His Royal Highness returned to the Castle this evening to dinner. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty this morning and remained to luncheon. The infant royal family were taken for their usual airings, this morning, in the pleasure grounds. The Princess Royal rode on her Shallop pony, her royal highness being attended by the Dowager Lady Lytton. Her Majesty, who is usually restored to her usual excellent state of health, walked this morning in the pleasure grounds, and this afternoon, the Queen was driven out for an airing in a pony phaeton, accompanied by the Princess Royal, and attended by the Dowager Lady Lytton. The Hon. Colonel Grey was in attendance on horseback. A very beautiful fly rod, elaborately mounted in silver, with silver wick, and with the name of the Prince Consort engraved on the rod, has just been presented to his Royal Highness in a highly-finished mahogany case, bound with purple velvet, by Mr. Little, a long-tack maker, of Victoria Lane, London. His Royal Highness was so pleased with the whole affair, that he immediately ordered a warrant to be issued out, appointing Mr. Little fishing-rod maker to the Prince. A bottom-rod, also, beautifully mounted in silver, weighing not more than seven ounces, has likewise been presented from the same manufacturer to the Prince of Wales. It is fitted in a richly ornamented case, containing a variety of flies, State, &c., with the Prince of Wales's feathers, highly wrought at the end, in polished silver. The christening of the infant Prince, according to present arrangements, will take place in the Queen's private chapel, at the Castle, on Friday, the 6th proximo. His Royal Highness Prince William of Prussia is expected to arrive at the Castle, upon a visit to her Majesty, on Saturday next (the 11th inst.). Numerous royal and distinguished personages have been invited to the Castle, during the stay of his Royal Highness. Mrs. Lady, her Majesty's monthly nurse, left her illustrious charge yesterday; her Majesty being sufficiently well, after the expiration of only three weeks from the period of her confinement, to dispense with her services. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent is expected to dine with the Queen and Prince Albert this evening.

HER MAJESTY'S MARINE EXCURSION.—Our Windsor correspondent says that, according to present arrangements, her Majesty and the Prince Consort will take their departure from Windsor Castle about Monday or Tuesday, the 9th or 10th proximo, and proceed to the coast of Hampshire, to embark on board the royal yacht. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice will, it is fully expected, accompany their illustrious parents to the Isle of Wight. Her Majesty and Prince Albert will shortly afterwards proceed to Netley in the Victoria and Albert yacht, leaving the infant royal family at Osborne House, where it is expected they will remain until the return of the Queen and the Prince from the north. It is believed that her Majesty's marine excursion, and series of visits to the Scottish nobility, will occupy from three to four weeks.

MORE ROYAL EXCURSIONS.—According to the Brighton Gazette, it is certain that her Majesty will pay a visit to the Duke of Norfolk, at Arundel, in the course of two months. The same paper says:—"We hear from very good authority, that we shall shortly be honoured with a visit from some of the Royal Family. On Wednesday instructions arrived at the Palace to keep the workmen employed earlier and later. We believe that the Court arrangements will be similar in every respect to those of last year; that her Majesty will go on a marine excursion in the Royal Victoria and Albert yacht, some time about the 18th or 20th of September, and that the royal children will be sent to Brighton during the absence of the Court. The Prince of Wales and his royal sisters will, it is expected, be at Brighton about the 20th of next month, perhaps even earlier. We hear that the Princess Alice steamer is to be fitted up, for the purpose of attending on the royal yacht, in an excursion which her Majesty and Prince Albert intend to make to the Netherlands early in September."

REPORTED VISIT OF PRINCE ALBERT TO SCOTLAND.—The Perth Courier states that Prince Albert intends to pay a visit to Lord Glenlyon at his noble residence of Blair Castle. It is expected his Royal Highness will arrive at Blair Castle early in September, to enjoy the sports of the season amongst the picture-que hills of Perthshire. Every preparation is already in progress for the reception of the royal visitor, and we understand that the Highlanders who made so prominent a figure at the tournament, and who formed her Majesty's body guard during her brief visit to that place in 1842, are again to be under arms during the sojourn of her illustrious consort amongst the mountain fastnesses of Athole. According to another report, her Majesty intends to accompany Prince Albert to Scotland.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.—There are contradictory reports respecting the projected visit of Louis Philippe to this country. Letters from Paris state that the visit of the King to England has been postponed to the 17th of October, and that the emperors have been fixed for that day at Cherbourg. According to another account, Louis Philippe is expected at Dieppe, to be present at the 21st to be given on the inauguration of the statue of Duchesne, from the 21st to the 24th of September, and that he will proceed from thence to England. The Constitutionnel says:—"The King's journey to England is postponed. Orders, it is said, have been despatched to the ports to delay the preparations." The Press says it has reason to believe that the visit will take place between the 24th and 10th of October.

THE PRINCE ROYAL OF PRUSSIA.—At the end of last week the Prince Royal of Prussia enjoyed the splendid attractions of Chatsworth, and thence proceeded to York. The royal party proceeded to Edinburgh and Glasgow, and afterwards next went to Liverpool. After leaving Liverpool, the Prince went to Birmingham and Coventry. From Coventry, the royal party proceeded to Tamworth direct, where the Prince, on alighting, was met by Sir Robert Peel. His Royal Highness appeared agreeably surprised at meeting the right hon. baronet at the station, and having shaken hands heartily with Sir Robert, entered an open carriage drawn by four horses, which was in attendance to receive him, and drove off in the direction of Drayton. Arriving at the Manor House, the Prince was received in the entrance hall by Lady Peel and the other members of the right hon. baronet's family. At eight o'clock dinner was served. On Tuesday morning the Prince, in company with Sir Robert Peel, inspected the park and grounds in the vicinity of the mansion, and afterwards departed for Appleton, the seat of the Earl of Westmorland, travelling by way of Helvoir Castle, which noble structure the royal party spent a considerable period in inspecting.

The Margrave and Marchioness of Waterford are making a tour in Germany. The Duke of Northumberland will remain confined to his room at Mon House, by an attack of gout. His Grace is expected to visit Lexington, for the benefit of the waters, prior to proceeding to the North for the season.

Lady Alice Peel and family returned from the Continent last Wednesday. Col. Peel, her ladyship, and family, are expected to leave London shortly, to pass the winter in Paris.

LORD PALMERSTON.—Accounts from Cologne, dated the 20th inst., mention that Lord Palmerston had arrived there.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—We are happy to learn that Sir W. W. Follett has, since his departure for the Continent, considerably improved in health.

DEATH OF ARCHDUCKE RAINER OF TURKEY.—Intelligence has been received of the demise of the youthful Archduke Rainer of Turkey, third son of his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke of Tuscany, which event took place on the 16th inst., at the Villa Castigione, at Florence.

ROYAL MARRIAGE.—A marriage is said to be on the tapis between his Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Schwerin and a Wurtemberg Princess.

It is rumoured in fashionable circles that the eldest daughter of a distinguished and popular Duke, who has long been celebrated for the magnificence with which he dispenses his princely hospitality, is about to bestow her hand upon a foreign nobleman, who at present occupies the important post of representative of an Imperial Power at the Court of her Majesty.

COLONEL NEEDHAM is at Brighton. Baron Brunow is also in that town, on a visit to the Count, who is stated to have received great benefit from the sea bathing.

LORD WHARFORD and party have sailed from Southampton in his lordship's cutter yacht, the Botolph, on a cruise in the Channel, prior to his lordship laying up his vessel for the season.

DEATH OF SIR CHARLES WATSON, BART.—We have to record the death of the above noble baronet, who died on Monday last, at Writting Park, Cambridgeshire, at the advanced age of ninety-three years, having been born in 1751. He was the eldest son of Admiral Charles Watson. In consideration of the great services his father had rendered to his country, George III. conferred a baronetcy on him, but before the patent of the creation was completed he died, and that dignity was eventually conferred on his son, the deceased, then in his tenth year.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

His Grace the Duke of Wellington, as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, has presented the Rev. William Thomson, M.A., Principal of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, to the living of Galloway, Isle of Wight. The Lord Bishop of Peterborough has instituted the Rev. George Monington, M.A., to the vicarage of Besswell, Leicestershire, vacant by the death of the Rev. James Powell, on the presentation of the Haberdashers' Company. The Rev. John Thomas Barclay, M.A., of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, has been licensed to the incumbency of the new district church of St. Simon, Bristol. The Lord Bishop of Norwich has instituted the Rev. J. K. Tucker, B.A., of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, to the rectory of Pettigay, Suffolk. The Rev. Elisha White, B.A., has been licensed to the perpetual curacy of Quaresmore, in the diocese of Chester. The Rev. J. Winter, M.A., has been instituted by the Bishop of Lichfield to the incumbency of St. John's Church, Wednesbury, Staffordshire. His Lordship has also instituted the Rev. Samuel Fox, M.A., Vicar of Hoveley, to the rectory of Morley, in the county of Derby. The Lord Bishop of Gloucester has instituted the Rev. William Harris Roach, M.A., to the incumbency of the new church of St. Paul, Whitehill, Stroud.

On Wednesday last, the first stone of a new church, to contain 250 sittings (all free), was laid at Coton in the Elms, in the parish of Lollington, by Lady Wilmot Beeton.

The Archdeaconry of Stow, vacant by the death of the Rev. Henry Vincent Bayley, D.D., has been conferred on the Rev. William Brookhurst Stonehouse, M.A., Vicar of Oulton, Lincolnshire, Canon of Eppingham, and official to the late Archdeacon.

The Queen Dowager has transmitted a donation of £500 in aid of the fund for the erection of the intended new church at Clifton, near Ashbourn, Derbyshire, the foundation-stone of which is to be laid on Wednesday next by Archdeacon Shirley.

The Rev. John Charlesworth, B.D., of Queen's College, Cambridge, has been instituted to the rectory of St. Mildred's, Broad-street, and St. Margaret's, Mow, on the presentation of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. Joseph Gedge, M.A., Vicar of Rumberston, to the rectory of Ashby-cum-Fenby, Lincolnshire, to which benefice the reverend gentleman has been instituted by the Lord Bishop of the diocese.

RECREATION FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.—The Duke of Norfolk has promised, on the expiration of a few leases, to give up fifty acres of his land for a pleasure-ground, for the recreation of the people of Sheffield. In Birmingham the question has already been discussed in the Town Council, and the great advantage and benefit of public parks unanimously affirmed. That body has opened a communication with Government, for the purpose of obtaining a grant towards providing the public walks, which in Birmingham, with its 250,000 inhabitants, are felt to be imperatively needed.

LOUIS NATURE.—On Monday night a cat, the property of Mrs. Lee, landlady of the Duke of York Inn, Huddersfield, killed, and the produce was a very remarkable one. The creature was born with the head and shoulders and fore legs properly formed in the usual manner, but just before the shoulders the body divided into two, being placed breast to breast, and from the breast of each was produced a fore leg, perfectly formed, except that the one on the left side was somewhat larger than the other; downwards the two bodies separated entirely, and each body was also perfectly formed, with the hind legs and tails equally perfect, the colours of each being quite similar—what is called a schizoid.

IRISH CHARITABLE REQUESTS ACT.—We have heard it mentioned, as from authority, that Dr. Murray, Dr. Healy, Dr. Kinsella, Dr. Blake, the Right Hon. D. R. P. O'Connell, and the Right Hon. A. R. St. John, have been named by Sir Robert Peel as the Roman Catholic Commissioners under this Act.—Dublin Monitor.

POSTSCRIPT.

BOMBARDMENT OF TANGIER AND MOGADORE.

The official report of the Prince de Joinville of his operations before Tangier, has at length been published, and has arrived from Paris by express. We give this important document entire, because it contains the explanation of the measures which induced the attack upon Tangier, and also some interesting details of the object which the Prince had in view in bombarding Mogadore.

Report of the Prince de Joinville to the Minister of Marine, on board the steamer Flores, Aug. 10.

M. le Ministre.—Not having time to give you an account by the last courier of our affairs, in detail, as well as of our operations before Tangier, I take advantage of the first moment of leisure to fulfil this duty.

I informed you that on the 2d August, the day fixed for the reply to the ultimatum of our General, nothing reached us.

I waited then for news of Mr. Hay, before commencing hostile acts. On the 4th a letter of Sid Bousselman, Pacha of Larache, was sent to me more measured, more conciliating, than precede our acts; it renewed, nevertheless, the imminent demand of the punishment of the Marshal. The letter of Sid Bousselman said not a word of the delinquency of the corps of troops collected near Ouchda. As to Abd-el-Kader, Sid Bousselman asserted that he was no longer on the Moroccan territory, and that orders had been given to prevent his returning to it.

Nevertheless, the Marshal learned at the same time that Abd-el-Kader had gone into the interior of Morocco.

These accounts had but one object—to frighten us. Annoyed at learning nothing of Mr. Hay, I sent the Volce steamer to inquire and bring news of him.

The Volce came back on the 5th to Tangier, bringing me word that Mr. Hay was in safety at Mogadore.

In fact, on the evening of the 4th, the Olea, coming from Oren, brought me your despatch of the 27th, ordering me to commence hostilities, if the answer to the ultimatum was not satisfactory. It brought us news, also, of the Marshal proving the falsity of the assertions of the Moors respecting Abd-el-Kader.

Hostilities was no longer possible. We were amused with deceitful messages while they were preparing war; and we were thus obliged to have recourse to arms.

On the morning of the 6th I attacked the batteries of Tangier. My instructions were to destroy the exterior fortification, but to respect the town.

I could easily have attained this aim by disembarking; but I preferred employing cannon, and rendering the batteries useless, whilst respecting the quarters of the consuls, which but five or six stray bullets reached. We attained this result with the loss of three dead and sixteen wounded, the ships receiving very slight injury.

The enemy confessed a loss of 150 dead and 400 wounded; but it is impossible to ascertain the number of dead, since they were only drawing them from under the ruins on the spot.

During the engagement, Mr. Hay arrived from Rabat, where he had stopped to see the Emperor. I received him the next day. He told me he found the Emperor much depressed. The news of the retirement of the consuls had reached him. Mr. Hay thanked me for the solicitude I had shown with respect to him.

I now proceed to Mogadore, as the other extremity of the empire. Mogadore is the private property of the Emperor. The town itself, as well as the public revenue, is his property. He lets the houses and the ground. It is, in a word, one of the principal sources of his revenue. To attack that city, to destroy it, or to occupy the island that forms the port, and to obtain satisfaction, is to give the most sensible blow to Moulay Abderrahman and all the south of his empire.

I shall limit myself for the moment to these two operations, in order to prove to the Emperor that he is deserted by all the world. The affair of Tangier has sufficiently proved that, and that we have the means of doing him serious injury (which we shall try to prove at Mogadore). Moreover, our presence on the coast will render the Moors from the frontier to the defense of their homes, and will thus facilitate the Marshal's operations.

We can then warn the Emperor, that in spite of what has passed, we still desire peace, and that what we have done at Tangier and Mogadore will prove that he must not trifle with us. If he wishes for peace let him himself grant us what we demand, and let acts follow words. If not, if he is not convinced, and if he continues to receive and encourage our enemies on the frontier, he must expect extremities from us.

The later despatch of the Marshal Bugeaud contains the following particulars:—Our loss in the day was 14 killed and 54 wounded, including an officer. The island taken, it only remained to us to destroy the batteries of the town, which lie opposite the harbour. Our cannon had already damaged them, but it was necessary to make them completely unfit for service.

Yesterday, when under the cross fire of three batteries and two brigs, 500 men were disembarked; they met with no resistance; we spiked the guns, and threw some of them into the sea. We carried away some of them; the powder magazines were swamped; in fine, we carried off or sunk all the vessels which were lying in the harbour. I believe that we could at that time have penetrated into the interior of the town without danger, but it would have been only a precipitate without an object, or without other result than useless pillage. I therefore abstained, and brought back the troops to the island, and the crews on board the ships. I am busy establishing on the island a garrison of 500 men. The occupation of the island without the blockade of the port would be but a half measure. I therefore follow your orders, in closing the port of Mogadore.

The town at this moment is in fire, pillaged by the Arabs, who have taken possession, after having driven out the Imperial garrison. The English Consul, his family, and some Europeans, have just come to us.

Mogadore, Aug. 17. FRANCIS DE ORLEANS.

PARIS, Aug. 20.—At Tortoni's in the evening the funds opened at 307. 3/8, but soon afterwards they fell to 306. 1/2, at which they closed.

ENTERTAINMENT TO SIR ROBERT AND LADY SALE.—On Thursday last splendid entertainment was given at the Mansion-house, by the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress to Sir R. and Lady Sale, and Mrs. Sturt. The guests were about 120 in number. After the usual toasts, the Lord Mayor proposed the health of Sir Robert Sale in appropriate terms. Sir R. Sale, in returning thanks, said he was convinced that if the exertions of British officers should at any time be required, there were numerous numbers in the service as capable as he was of acting for the public good, and ready at a moment's notice to prove their ability and zeal. If any occasion should offer for testing their promptitude, the country would not be disappointed in the expectation she had formed. (Cheers.) Mr. Cotton, the Governor of the Bank of England, proposed "the health of Lady Sale," whose courage and power of endurance were an honour to her sex and her country.

He also expressed an earnest wish that the blessings of peace might be universally diffused. The toast was drunk with three times three, and immense cheering. The company were much pleased with the whole entertainment.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.—The latest letters from Paris state positively that Louis Philippe has abandoned his intention of visiting England this year. Should this prove to be the fact, it is highly significant of the sensitive position of affairs between the two countries.

THE RELATIONS OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—The Morning Post contains the following important announcement of a crisis in the relations between England and France. Our contemporary, however, does not positively pledge itself for the accuracy of the news.—According to our informant, the receipt of the intelligence from Mogadore on Tuesday night was immediately followed by the despatch of a special courier to Paris in the evening of a communication from Lord Aberdeen to M. Guizot. His lordship is said to have demanded the immediate evacuation of the island of Mogadore by the forces under his Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville, and to have intimated that, in the event of a refusal to withdraw the French troops, measures would forthwith be taken, in conformity with the established usage in similar circumstances.

CHAMBERLAINSHIP OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—The contest for the above lucrative office has already commenced with great spirit. Alderman Brown has offered himself, and Sir John Pire is also mentioned as a candidate.

MR. HAMPSON'S BALLOON ASCENT AT CHELSEA.—On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Hampson, the intrepid aeronaut, made a beautiful ascent, with his new balloon, from Privy Gardens, Cheltenham. The gardens were numerous attended by persons of rank and respectability. At a quarter past five o'clock the "Monster Balloon" left the gardens, amidst the hearty cheers of the spectators. There being little wind, the balloon rose almost perpendicularly, and passing slowly over the town, a most splendid view was afforded and enjoyed. After being in mid-air for more than an hour, Mr. Hampson and his companion, Mr. Carter, jun., descended on the west side of Day-hill, the locality where his parachute alighted in the year 1838.

On Wednesday, about noon, Capt. Fisher, for many years Captain Superintendent of the royal dockyard, Sheerness, and who had previously been in his accustomed good state of health, was suddenly attacked by paralysis, and expired a few minutes before four o'clock in the afternoon.

ATTEMPT AT MURDER.—Yesterday (Friday) an Irishman, named Michael Reed, was charged, at Bow-street, with having cut and maimed James O'Flaherty, with intent to murder him. The complainant resided in Dolphin-court, Drury-lane, and was visited in his house by the prisoner and a woman who accompanied him. They quarrelled over some drink, and the prisoner struck the woman. The complainant took her part, and was immediately struck violently on the face by Reed. A scuffle ensued, in which they both fell on the floor, and while there Reed stabbed O'Flaherty with two pairs of scissors in all parts of his body. The wounded man was conveyed to King's College Hospital, where it was some time before he was pronounced out of danger. Mr. Taylor committed the prisoner for trial, for cutting and maiming with intent to murder, and refused to take bail.

FIRE AT THE DOVER AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—Yesterday morning about ten o'clock, a fire took place in an extensive shedding at the New Cross station of the Dover and Brighton Railway. Flames were first seen issuing from the centre of the building, which had a frontage of at least 200 feet, and a depth of 40 feet, by one of the railway police. He instantly gave the alarm, and with assistance, succeeded in rescuing from the flames several valuable carriages. By this time the fire had obtained great hold, and the heat being very intense, the men were prevented from doing more to save the building, which was in less than half an hour on fire from the top to the bottom. By half-past two o'clock the whole range, with its valuable contents, consisting of carriages completed, and others in an unfinished state, was completely burned down, and everything consumed. How the fire originated is not known.

ENTIRE CHANGE OF MINISTRY IN GREECE.—Our accounts from Greece, contained in a previous column, stated that Ministerial changes were expected. The following telegraphic despatch has since been received by the French Government:—"Athens, August 30. M. Metaxas and his colleagues have resigned, and their resignations have been accepted. The King has entrusted M. Colletti to form a new administration. The Athens elections have been suspended for some days. The town is perfectly quiet."

UNITED STATES.—ARRIVAL OF THE CALIFORNIA.—The California has arrived at Liverpool, with the mails from the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia, and of passengers. She left Boston on the 16th, and Halifax on the 16th inst. Although the accounts from New York are a fortnight later than those last received, they are full of interest. The public attention there was chiefly fixed on the exciting contest for the office of President. According to the New York Herald, however, it is of very little consequence whether Clay or Polk be elected; for it says the country must "go ahead," at all events. The project of a line of American steamships between Liverpool and New York is exciting some attention in the latter city. An army of 15,000 men was preparing to leave Mexico for Texas, and was expected to reach Matamoros in November next. A dreadful destruction of property has taken place at Caracas, arising from inundations caused by excessive rains. The Philadelphia papers give an account of another steam explosion, by which several lives were lost. The harvest is likely to be very good. The commercial news is rather gloomy. It is stated that the fall trade is about commencing, and the impression that a very heavy business will be transacted this fall appears to be general. Exchanges on England and France have further advanced, being at 94 to 10 for London, and 56. 1/2 for Paris. The accounts from Canada state that no administration has yet been formed.

THE GRAND CONSERVATORY AT CHATSWORTH.

Towards the close of our account of her Majesty's late visit to his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, at Chatsworth, we promised our readers an engraving of the vast Conservatory, upon a scale corresponding with its gigantic proportions; which we have now much pleasure in submitting for their approbation.

This unexampled structure is beautifully situated, to the south of the princely mansion, near the celebrated Waterwork Willow; a portion of the wood, several acres in extent, having been cleared for its erection. The situation could not have been better or more picturesquely chosen—on high ground, yet effectually screened from the chilly winds, by a belt of the loftiest forest-trees.

On leaving the mansion, after crossing the spacious lawn, and passing the water-works, the fountains, the cascades, &c., a path, winding amongst the natural and artificial beauties of the rock-gardens, leads to an easy flight of steps amongst the stupendous rocks, which ascend to a broad raised path, running around the Conservatory, at some distance from the building, and forming one of the most delightful promenades that can be imagined.

The building itself contains one acre of ground, and is, in plan, of the form of a "trefoil," wholly composed of glass, arranged in the "ridge-and-furrow" plan; the slips of glass, being long, have no lapping in the widths of the ridges; the ribs are composed of thin pieces of wood, clamped together, which is considered to have much more strength than if solid. The area of the interior of the Conservatory is about 324 feet long, by 170 wide; the central compartment 90 feet high; and the sides about 52 feet. Around the central compartment is a light and elegant gallery, which is approached by a winding flight of steps amongst gigantic rock-work, stocked with the most rare and valuable cactuses, ferns, &c., and from which one of the finest scenes is obtained, which an eye, even accustomed to oriental grandeur, can desire.

Around the principal area is built a strong foundation of solid masonry, an arched basement wall with a solid stone plinth about four feet high. In this are fitted wooden valves to equalise the temperature and regulate the currents of air. From this wall spring a series of strong quarter circular ribs of wood, the upper ends of which are firmly fixed into an horizontal framework of iron, which rests on two parallel ranges of iron pillars, with cross pillars at the end. From this framework spring a similar series of semi-circular ribs of 70 feet span. The spaces between the ribs are filled in with glass, in the "ridge and furrow" plan. The slips of glass, four feet long, are arranged in perpendicular rows at a high angle, every alternate row inclining similarly, so as to form a series of zig-zag planes one above the other; thus breaking the monotony of square lines, and being much more likely to withstand hail-storms, rain, and wind.

On the ground-floor is a broad walk running around the whole building; and down the centre, the entire length, is a beautiful carriage drive, the folding glass doors at either end being thrown open for admission. Some idea of the extent of this room may be formed, when we state that, at the late visit of her Majesty to this splendid seat, the state carriages, six in number, with their full complement of horses and attendants, had ample room in length between the doors when closed. Of the vegetable inhabitants of this earthly paradise it is difficult to speak. They consist of all that is choice, rare, and valuable—many of the specimens unique in this country, planted in soils essential to the growth and nature of each species in borders, and the temperature so managed in its application to the different beds as to suit the natural character of the plants.

The result of this arrangement is, that the specimens from the lofty and magnificent palms and plantains—the bread-fruit and date—the light and elegant acacias—the aloes—the oranges, citrons, and lemons—the cactuses and ferns—the papyrus, the callows, rice, and every other plant—whatever its original nature or climate—are all in the most luxuriant state of vegetation; and, grouped and arranged as they are, with every attention to picturesque effect—with the lofty palms and plantains (80 feet high) formed into arcades, interspersed with the most fragrant and odiferous flowers and shrubs—the ponds stocked with myriads of gold and silver fish—the numberless little foreign warblers, in every diversity of colour and tone, from all climates—the Italian cats, from the mountains near Rome—and the gems and crystals—combined with the rocks and seats—render the grand Chatsworth Conservatory the most luxuriant place yet raised in this country.

Around the Conservatory, beneath the building, is a railroad tunnel for the conveyance of fuel to the stoves, and for the removal of the ashes, &c. The plan of watering adopted is most efficacious: the building is supplied from the immense reservoirs on the hill, pipes being laid all around the interior, and the gallery, to various parts of which a rose hose can be fastened, throwing a jet of 80 feet in as complete and natural a shower as the leafy inmates could get in their natural open-air situations. The whole of the design, arrangements, and management of this splendid pile are under the direction of Mr. Paxton, head gardener to his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, whose "Magazine of Botany," and other works, are so well known.

GRAND FETE AT MOUNT EDGECUMBE.—THE BALCONY AND ITALIAN GARDENS.

GRAND FETE AT MOUNT EDGECUMBE.

This very interesting fête and bazaar have been held in the beautiful and picturesque gardens and grounds of Mount Edgcumbe, by the kind and express permission of the noble owner of Mount Edgcumbe, in aid of the funds of the Devon and Cornwall Female Orphan Asylum, and of the South Devon and East Cornwall Hospital.

The estate of Mount Edgcumbe is situated in a south-western direction from Plymouth, a distance of about two miles; and is approached by crossing in boats from various parts of the town, or by the ferry-boat from the Admiral's Yard, Stonehouse. The demesne is about three miles in circumference, and occupies the whole peninsula between the Hamoaze and the Sound, and in that space presents as great an alternation of product, and as great a variety of scene as any spot of similar size in England. With the knowledge of what then transpired for the benefit of the asylum, the officers and committee hailed with feelings of gratitude and delight the announcement that the kind-hearted owner of the beautiful domain had expressed his desire that his park should be again used for a similar purpose, and the necessary preparations were immediately commenced to carry the object. Thursday and Friday, the 22nd and 23rd inst., were fixed for this splendid reunion of all classes.

Fortunately the weather, though rather dull in the morning of the first day, turned out favourably; and the immense concourse of persons who thronged into Plymouth showed that the interest felt towards the object was not confined to the town.

The hour appointed for opening the Park gates was eleven o'clock; but so early as ten o'clock parties began to arrive, such was the interest excited. That part of Hamoaze which divides Mount Edgcumbe from the opposite shore was a scene of much animation, from the numberless boats engaged in transporting the throng of persons who crossed the water on this day, there being a continuous stream of boats until three o'clock, and nothing could exceed the enraptured appearance of the fine harbour and river at this period; the majestic view of the numerous fine ships of war, combined with all their other wonders, formed a picture truly splendid—such as will cause thousands to remember with grateful feelings the place where—

"Fam'd Tamer winds her wanton streams,
And deck'd with villas, forts, and towns,
With woods and pastures, hills, and downs,
With docks and mares—England's pride,
And lighter boats that swiftly glide."

The entrance to the grounds was by the lower Lodge-gate, an elegant canopy being formed by flags, beneath which, many members of the Committee, aided by several ladies, stationed themselves to receive the contributions of the visitors.

The Bazaar was held in the Orangery, an in the Italian Garden—a charming spot, the extreme beauty of which could not fail immediately to fasten the attention of the beholder. The Orangery, of Palladian design, having a Doric front, is a noble building, 108 feet in length; proportionately lofty. It presented on this occasion a splendid appearance, being tastefully decorated with flags; the exhibition tables ran the whole extent of the building, and, in addition, two extensive ranges of stalls, covered with flags, were arranged in other parts of the park, those under cover of the Orangery not being sufficient for the articles that had been kindly furnished.

The Stalls were covered with beautiful specimens of work, which were eagerly purchased of the Countesses of Mount Edgcumbe and Morley, Lady Juliana Eliot, Misses Macdonnell, the Hon. Miss Elliot, Lady Louisa Cornwallis, Lady Elizabeth Cornwallis, Lady Cope, the Hon. Mrs. Murray, Miss Butler of Morwell, and the other distinguished ladies who kindly undertook the task of conducting the sale. The youthful Lord Vallet of superintended a flower stall.

The Italian Garden was evidently the centre of attraction. From the grouping of all its statues, its plants, rare exotics, its fountains, &c., it presented a truly classic scene.

The French Garden also had its admirers, all the avenues being thronged. This enclosure is surrounded by high clipped evergreen hedges, the ground being laid out in parterres, with trellis work and bowers, a basin, with a jet d'eau being in the centre.

A numerous company were here assembled; the retirement of one party being instantly followed by the accession of others, who, in their turn, added to the living stream which was constantly pouring into the English Gardens—in the arrangement and planting of which nature is more attentive to, and art less seen. Beds of beautiful shrubs and flowers, fine cork trees, and some splendid specimens of the cedars of Lebanon and of Virginia, served here to variegate the scene. The numerous walks beneath the lofty trees and close underwood, connecting the various gardens and pleasure-grounds, were also crowded with company, and exhibited a delightful contrast to the more open scenery of the gardens. In the slope facing the sea, and near the Battery, booths had been erected for refreshments, superintended by a committee of gentlemen. The bands of the Royal Marines, the 44th Regiment, and of the San Josef guard-ship, were stationed in the gardens, and played for several hours.

About four o'clock, the numerous and fashionable company, congregated from the towns and country around, began to thin, and at six, the gardens were cleared, though many persons remained in the grounds, wending their way amongst the charming beauties and sylvan scenery of this far-famed spot.

The number of visitors the first day was upwards of 10,000, and the amount taken at the gate was £516. The amount received the first day at the stalls, from all sources, exceeded £900.

We should notice that the establishment of a Post-office in the Gardens was a source of revenue; every applicant found on enquiry that a letter was waiting for him, but the wholesome practice of pre-payment was not observed, and the postage of sixpence at least followed the delivery of a letter; the ladies who managed this affair, displayed much wit and ingenuity in preparing the epistles.

On the second day, the weather, we are happy to state, was equally fine. The proceedings of the second day were similar to those of the first, and the large party left the grounds much delighted.

The number of persons entering the grounds this day was about 2500, being about £200 less than on the second day in 1840, the number on that occasion being 4700. The receipts this day for entrance, sale of work, &c., amounted to about £290, being about £40 less than the receipts of the second day on the occasion of the former fête at Mount Edgcumbe.

The Earl of Mount Edgcumbe appeared highly to enjoy the enlivening scene; his lordship was in various parts of his noble domain, on his pony, during both the days.

It is a source of much gratification to be enabled to state, and a pleasing circumstance which reflects the greatest credit on the conduct of the vast number of persons collected—that not the slightest damage of any kind was sustained. Every visitor appeared to appreciate the generosity which had led the noble proprietor to expose the choice and valuable collection of plants and flowers, which the garden contained, to the risk which must necessarily be incurred by admitting so many persons to range through the whole of them.

THE "TARTAR SOLDIER" IN HYDE-PARK.

A very large number of people, principally military men, have been attracted into Hyde-park, to witness the horsemanship and military exercises of a very curious individual, a Tartar soldier, formerly in a Mahomedan regiment of cavalry in the Russian service, who, it was understood, would exhibit himself and his horse in front of the Horse Guards barracks. The Tartar made his appearance, accompanied by several gentlemen on horseback; one of whom appeared to act as his interpreter, and in some degree to direct his movements, and a large space of ground for his evolutions was cleared out, and kept by the privates of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards. The Tartar is a good-looking man, apparently between 25 and 30 years of age, of an athletic frame, with considerable squareness of limb, but with no superfluous flesh. He stands about 5 feet 10 inches in height, and may weigh about 13 stone. He was dressed in a tight-fitting tunic of red-coloured silk, wadded, and capable of resisting a hard blow; very loose trousers, drawn tightly round his legs just below the knee, and met by tight black boots, almost resembling long gaiters. On his head was a sheepskin cap of black wool, similar to those worn by the Persians. He had mustaches on the upper lip. His arms consisted of a pair of pistols, which, to the course of his performance, he repeatedly discharged, and a pole about ten or a dozen feet long, which he used as a lance, throwing it with considerable force when galloping, and with correct aim. We believe this part of his practice is what is called throwing the "Djered." The Tartar also displayed considerable skill in lifting this weapon from the ground without dismounting, but this he performed without putting his horse in motion, making him stand still whilst he recovered his weapon. He also threw himself off his horse whilst at the top of his speed, and vaulted again into the saddle with great ease.

Towards the close of the exhibition, Mr. Maynard, formerly an officer of the Blues, the son of Lord Maynard, mounted upon a troop horse with a fencing foil, undertook to encounter the Tartar, who was armed with a basket-hilted single stick, and nothing daunted by his formidable appearance and reputation as a swordsman, succeeded with apparent ease in inflicting a "palpable hit" upon his ribs, just beneath the left arm of the Tartar (who is a left-handed swordsman), as the latter raised his arm to parry the blow. The Tartar did not appear to comprehend what had occurred, and in rather a levitable manner dismounted, and did not renew the contest. Mr. Maynard then threw his fencing glove on the ground, and putting his horse in a canter, lifted it up without dismounting. This gentleman also exhibited the feat of vaulting into the saddle, and in the company of a horseman with the Oriental foreigner certainly suffered nothing. As a skilful swordsman the Tartar is certainly to be surpassed by many of those who were on the ground, and many of the Life Guardsmen expressed their willingness to contend with him. He has since exhibited at the barracks in the Regent's-park, and has been matched with Linhard, considered the best swordsman in the regiment quartered there, and also with Hemmingsway, a good swordsman of the same regiment. Linhard had the best of him, and Hemmingsway also set him at naught.

The following account of this singular personage may not be uninteresting to our readers. Balthazar Beck Pegasus is the son of a Kniaz or Khan, of Independent Tartary. At the early age of fourteen Balthazar joined the Cossack army, and fought against the Russians for three years. At the end of this time, the troop in which he served were taken prisoners, when engaged in a battle near Tula. As Balthazar had no choice left but to be sent to Siberia or to take service in the Russian army, in hopes that some day or other a chance of escape would offer itself, he chose the latter, and was sent to Warsaw, where he was placed in a Muscovite regiment, and served in it for nine years. When on parade, being outraged without cause before his own men, the Tartar, in a state of frenzy, drew his sword and cut down the officer. He saw in a moment that he was a lost man, and that there was no safety for him but in flight. Reckoning to his cousin and his servant, who served in the same regiment, to follow, he started without losing a moment. They made for the frontier of Prussia, but by mistake they took the road of Plock instead of Posen. Meanwhile an alarm was raised, and Cossacks were sent in pursuit of them, and very near the Prussian frontier they were overtaken. In the attempt to capture him, his two companions were shot from their horses; their pursuers, one by one, dropped off, till only one remained—the officer, who, as he rode after the Tartar, fired at him, and wounded him in the thigh. Notwithstanding this, he got clear over a brook; the Cossack officer followed closely, but failing, fell with his horse into the water.

Balthazar, now in Prussia (for that brook formed the boundary), was not claimed as a deserter, but the Prussian authorities refused to give him up. Some Prussian gentlemen of distinction now supplied him with money for the journey, and with letters to friends at Danzig, and he proceeded on his horse to that city, where he met with further kindness from the officers of the garrison, by whom he and his horse were sent to this country, whence it is said he intends to depart for France, and by way of Marseilles to get to Constantinople. We understand he has been purchased by Lord Dudley Stuart, and other influential persons, and that a subscription to defray his expenses and journey to Constantinople, to the amount of £250, has already been made. He has the greatest affection for his horse, a grey Arab, of great beauty and extraordinary good points, and has refused to part with it for any price. On being asked, a few days ago, by an officer of the Life Guards, if he would sell the animal, he energetically laid his hand upon the snout of his horse, and said, "I would sooner cut this from my head, and make my horse eat it, hair and all, than sell her, my preserver!"—Abridged from the Times.

LITERATURE.

KNIGHT'S WEEKLY VOLUME—I. to IX. C. Knight and Co.

In this very economical series, the ingenious editor and enterprising publishers, are carrying out Archibald Constable's "Magnum Opus," projected some seventeen years ago, and honoured with the special patronage of King George the Fourth. Constable, in his famous "Miscellany" scheme, thought he had reached the ne plus ultra of cheapness; whereas, Knight's series is sold at less than half the price of the Edinburgh publisher's volumes, and is of more sterling character than the Scottish literary wares. This advantage is, in the main, referable to the printing machine, which, to use Mr. Knight's words, "has done for the commerce of literature, what the mule and the Jacquard loom have done for the commerce of silk—it has made literature accessible to all."

Mr. Knight opens the campaign bravely, with a "Biography of William Caxton," the father of English printing; which in neatness of execution, as well as comprehensiveness of detail, is a good example for his collaborators: to the memoir is appended a postscript showing the progress of the press in England, from its introduction by Caxton to the present time, in which "The Mirror," established in 1822 (the parent of all the cheap periodicals), is as much entitled to mention as the "Penny Magazine," commenced ten years subsequently. II. "Mind among the Spindles," is a selection from the "Lowell Offering," written in American cotton factories. III. "The Englishwoman in Egypt," is a selection of letters written by Sophia Poole, during a residence at Cairo with her brother, Mr. Lane, author of "The Modern Egyptians," and containing much novel information on domestic life in the capital of Egypt: this is a very charming little book. IV. VII. "Tales from Shakspeare," by Mr. and Miss Lamb, is an entire reprint of that very popular work. V. "The Textile Manufactures of Great Britain," is an interesting picture of the progress of some of the principal national manufactures, by which this country has reached her present point of industrial greatness. VI. IX. "The Chinese," are the first and second volumes of the best work yet written on China, that by Mr. J. F. Davis, Governor of Hong-Kong. VIII. "Fests on the Fjord" is a reprint of Miss Martineau's domestic Norwegian tale.

Such are the "Weekly Volumes for all Readers," already issued. Their price, one shilling each, is a marvel of cheapness; equalled, however, by the attractiveness of the subjects, and the soundness of the information conveyed. Indeed, we despair of ever seeing economy and excellence more advantageously combined than in this undertaking.

MOGADORE.

We last week gave a brief description of Mogadore, to accompany our illustration, but as the place has acquired additional interest since its destruction by the Prince de Joinville, we subjoin some additional particulars:—

Situate on a peninsula, and surrounded by a plain of shifting sands, Mogadore is quite a new town, founded by the Emperor Muley Mohamed in 1760, in order to have a commercial port on the nearest main point to the city of Morocco. Mogadore is 40 leagues from the capital. The population of Mogadore does not amount to more than 14,000 inhabitants. There are not more than 15 Europeans. It is the most commercial port of all Morocco. The town is called Nourak by the Moors. The island alone is called Mogadore, after a saint called Sidi Mogadoul, whose tomb is seen on the opposite coast at a league south of Nourak. The island is a quarter of a league long, and 600 yards broad. It is armed with batteries in masonry work. The most considerable part of the fortifications of the town commands the island. It would be impossible to occupy the port without having first destroyed the defences of the town which are opposite to it.

Mogadore has never before been attacked by an European squadron, but it was twice besieged on the land side by the neighbouring tribes of Arabs. In Morocco, as well as in Algeria, the towns possess no influence over the surrounding country. The tribes of the country frequently come to blockade them, in order to pillage, as the treasures with which they imagine the houses are filled are the constant dream of their ambition. The commerce of Mogadore has been extremely flourishing. It has exported to Lisbon, Cadix, Marseilles, and even to New York, large quantities of corn and wool, gum, almonds, olive oil, wax, leather, kid-skin, aniseed, orange peel, and various kinds of medicinal drugs. The imports consist of bar iron and steel cutlery, and iron ware of every description: woollen and cotton stuffs, silk, and dreschids, gold and silver trinkets, pearls, amber, or coral necklaces, looking-glasses, sugar, and spice.

The factory consists of ten or twelve mercantile houses of different nations, whose owners, protected by the Emperor, live in complete security from the Moors, and keep them at a rigid distance. The Jews, generally speaking, are compelled to reside in the outer town, which is walled in, and protected by batteries, no less than the citadel itself. Mogadore, curiously enough, was built according to plans furnished by a French engineer, and as far as parapets, ramparts, embrasures, cavaliers, batteries, and casemates, constitute a fortress, it is one; but these works are said to be of a very flimsy and imperfect construction, totally incapable of protecting the place for any length of time against a regular force.

The mouth of the harbour is narrow, yet a heavy sea rolls in; but behind the island the anchorage is good. The battery is much more remarkable for beauty than for strength. The roadstead is very much exposed at certain seasons, and the port, although the only one in the empire of Morocco which maintains a regular commercial intercourse with Europe, is in many respects inferior to that of El Walidia.

Mogadore is situate in 31 deg. 33 min. 40 sec. north latitude, and in 9 deg. 35 min. 30 sec. longitude west from the meridian of Greenwich. It is exactly opposite Panchal, the chief town of the island of Madaga, and is at a very considerable distance to the south of Salé, the next point of importance to Tangier. Between Salé and Mogadore the coast projects a considerably, and forms the capes Blanco and Cantin, which appear to be about equal-distant from the two ports.

DEATH OF LORD KEANE.

It is our painful duty to announce the death of Lord Keane. This gallant officer breathed his last at Burton Lodge, in Hampshire, in the forty-fourth year of his age, the diseases with which he was afflicted having terminated in dropsy.

The deceased John Keane, Baron Keane of Gburnee, in Afghanistan, and Cappoquin, County Waterford, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, was second son of Sir John Keane, Bart., of Belmont, Waterford, by his first marriage with Miss Kelly, daughter of Mr. John Kelly, of Belgrave, and brother of Sir Richard Keane, Bart., of Cappoquin House, Waterford. He was born in 1781, and married first, in 1806, Miss Smith, second daughter of General Smith, by whom he had issue several children; and secondly, in August, 1809, to Miss Charlotte Maria Holland, youngest daughter of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Holland. He entered the army at a very early age, his commission as ensign dating as far back as 1793. In the Egyptian campaign of 1801 he served as a de-de-camp to the Earl of Cavan; and in 1809 we find the then Lieutenant-Colonel Keane in the command of the 13th Regiment at the capture of Martinique. In 1812 he was destined to join the army under the Duke of Wellington at Madrid; and his reputation was such that he was, immediately on his arrival there, entrusted with the command of a brigade in the third division, in which corps he served until the end of the war with France, in 1814, and was present at the battles of Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivelle (near Bayonne), and Orthez; action at Vic Bigorre, battle of Toulouse, and the less gallant actions of that war. In August, 1814, he was appointed to a command, ordered for particular service, and, on his arrival at Jamaica, being senior officer, assumed the command of the military force destined to co-operate with Vice-Admiral the Hon. Sir Alexander Cochrane, for the attack on New Orleans and the province of Louisiana.

In the year 1833 he succeeded Sir Colin Halket as Commander-in-Chief of the army in Bombay; and, after nearly six years service in that presidency, on the 20th of October, 1838, Lord (then Sir John) Keane, received authority from the Government of India to organize and lead into Sindh a force intended to co-operate with the army then on the north-west frontier of India, under the command of Sir Henry Fane. In the month of December following, however, Sir Henry forwarded his resignation to head-quarters, and the command of the combined force devolved upon Sir John Keane.

His services in India are well known. Lord Keane received the thanks of the Court of Directors of the East India Company on the 18th of December, 1839, while on the 11th of the same month he was raised to the peerage, and obtained a pension of £2000 a year for his own life, and that of his two immediate successors in the peerage, added to which were the thanks of both Houses of Parliament in the month of February, 1840.

Lord Keane succeeded in his pension and peerage by his eldest son, Edward Arthur Wellington, who having been aide-de-camp to his father when in command of the army of the Indus, may be presumed to have shared in the honours of that campaign. He is a captain in the 37th Foot, and a major in the army.

The late lord was a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, and a Knight Commander of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic Order.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PRESENTATION OF COLOURS TO THE FORTY-NINTH REGIMENT.—The presentation of colours to this gallant corps, recently returned from China, took place at Winchester, on Tuesday, in the presence of a numerous body of spectators, who had congregated from all parts of the country to witness the interesting ceremony. The Bishop of Winchester addressed the men, and at the conclusion of the address the bishop gave an appropriate prayer in reference to the occasion. Lady Pakenham then presented the new colours to the ensigns, and in doing so said—"I feel much interested in the scene before me, and must beg to express the high importance I attach to the present solemnity. I consider the colours that I am about to present to the 49th as emblems of the past career of the regiment, as well as earnestness of their future success. They bear the names of many battles, extending from the Rocky Mountains of North America to the Great Wall of China; but I esteem it one of the greatest privileges of British arms that wherever they have been successful, wherever that success has been attended by the bright halo of Christianity spreading abroad where the darkness of Paganism formerly reigned. May I express a humble hope that such will be the case in China, and that the success of the 49th at Amoy may be the pledge of this happy result? Receive these colours, and bear them forward as gallantly as you have already done, and may the Lord God, the God of Battles, give you the victory." Sir Hercules Pakenham and Lieutenant-Colonel Adams afterwards addressed the regiment. The new colours were then paraded in front of the regiment in the usual manner, after which the regiment marched past the General in slow and quick time. After the men were dismissed they all sat down to a substantial dinner, provided for them by their officers, in a pavilion erected in the barrack yard for the purpose. The officers subsequently entertained their numerous visitors at a splendid dinner à la fourchette.

STEAM POWER OF ENGLAND.—The Liverpool Standard contains an estimate of the steam force possessed by England, from which it appears, that the French, in spite of their boasting, are as far inferior to us in regard to steam power as they were in their sailing ships during the last war. The French are apt to consider that we possess no steam-ships but what are registered as belonging to the navy, but the fact is, if we take into account all the vessels plying along our coast and to foreign ports, we could turn out a fleet of steam-vessels alone averaging 107,000 horse-power, and if to these we add the vessels already belonging to the navy, and averaging 30,000 horse-power, we may calculate upon a force fully equal to anything France could exhibit on the seas. The port of Liverpool alone possesses steam power equal to 14,452 horses; London, 24,600; Hull, 9200; Glasgow, 7000; and so on with almost every other sea-port in the country.

APPARENT PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.—It is stated that frequent communications are being made by the Government to the several departments at Devonport, on the subject of the store and state of the materials necessary in case of any emergency which may require sudden equipment. Orders have been issued for the entry of seamen for general service, a ship only taken in the expectation of more than the ordinary demand. One hundred able seamen are also ordered to be entered in the dock-yard, as labourers, at 2s. 6d. per diem; petty-officers to act as leading men, at 2s. 6d. per day. They are to be entered on the express understanding that they are to join any ship when required, and at a moment's notice.

The garrison of Gibraltar is to be reinforced by another regiment, and another company of Artillery. The 72nd, at Battersea, are hourly expecting the order to march to Cork, and embark thence forthwith for the Rock.

POST-MORTEM, Aug. 28.—The Right Hon. the Earl of Haddington, First Lord; Admiral the Right Hon. Sir George Cockburn, G.C.B.; and the Right Hon. H. T. L. Corry, arrived last evening at seven o'clock by train from London, on their annual visit of inspection to this port and arsenal.

INCREASED ACTIVITY AT BRIGHTON DOCK-YARD.—Orders have been received at the dock-yard at Brighton to prepare the Terrible, 600 horse-power, burden 1870 tons, for sea immediately. In consequence of the above order, it is expected she will be ready for the water at the close of the present year. To expedite the work, 80 men as shipwrights have been taken in the yard since Monday last; 30 of them have been set to work upon the Terrible. By a public notice posted at the gates, we find that 100 seamen are advertised for, a great number of whom have been already engaged. In this once desolate yard there are now upwards of 400 persons employed in constant daily labour.

The name of the vessel built at Woolwich under the title of the Inferral, has been changed to Edgar, and she has been commissioned by Commander Walter G. B. Estcourt. The Volcano steam-vessel, Captain Sir William Dickson, is expected at Woolwich from the coast of Ireland, to have her defects made good. The Princess Alice steam-vessel, master Commander L. Smith, arrived at Woolwich on Sunday, from Dover, and will leave early next week for Portsmouth, to join the royal squadron.

The Neptune, 120, and several other ships, are being masted and otherwise brought forward for service if required.

PROMOTIONS.—Lieutenants: John B. Marsh (1830), who was senior of the Ensigns, 44, during her last term of service in the East Indies; Jacob Sankey (1835), who became first of the Ensigns previous to last paying off; and George Woodhouse (1838), first of the Thunderbolt, steam-sloop, to the rank of Commander. Masters: Henry de Lisle, of the Alfred; Charles Sullivan, of the Formidable; Thomas Miller, of the Agincourt; and Thomas Cochran, of the Thalia, to the rank of Lieutenant.

APPOINTMENTS.—Commander Walter G. B. Estcourt (1841), to the Edgar (late the Inferral), steam-sloop, which vessel has been commissioned at Woolwich. Commander Estcourt, when a Lieutenant, commanded the Linard, steamer, in the Mediterranean, and was promoted from that service to his present rank.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

What a glorious week has this been for the rural life of England! Far and wide has the golden harvest been gathered; on every side is seen plenty; a generous measure, pressed down and flowing over, and health and happiness are the symbols of the season. All hail to the Source of these boons; all hail, and thanksgiving! And turning from the industrial tenants of the fields, lo! there roameth abroad other active spirits, full of lusty life and jocund labour. Away to the blue hill-tops they hasten, to win rosy health and the red heath-bird. Grouse-shooting is Hygeia's calisthenic; a fortnight in Braemar would put health upon the ribs of death—but

Non eris hinc contingit adire Corinthum—everybody cannot have shooting quarters in the Highlands; and, as we write for everybody, we confine ourselves to those sports which offer the greatest amount of enjoyment to the greatest number of persons. Happily the reader is partial to aquatics—apart from warm water. Gravelled is good, and Woolwich well enough, in their ways; but, without any offence to steam, there is nothing gallant in boiling-up an excursion, or doing a bit of tea-kettle on any scale. When we speak of aquatics, we mean brave sailings in salt seas for profit or pleasure—extending our license to a trip in a R. T. Y. C. craft, provided she be a clipper. The week's principal regatta was that of the Royal Western Yacht Club, held at Plymouth. It was a very brilliant spectacle, for the weather was beautiful, and the situation formed by nature for a marine exhibition. For the principal event—the race for the Club Cup—four cutters started, the Comet, the Corsair, the Medina, and the Elizabeth. They came in as here set down—a great achievement for the winner, the renown of the Corsair being inferior to none of her class in this water. Nine went for the second prize, a piece of plate, for cutters between 18 and 32 tons, won by the Weazel, after one of the finest contests ever seen. The small Yacht Cup the Terzagant won in a field of three; a good race. We have been somewhat dull at home, the Thames giving us only a few small rowing matches, above bridge and below. Of the former, the best was a race between four of the Sphinx Club, from Chiswick Eyt to Kew-bridge, for a pair of Silver Challenge Sculls, won very cleverly by Mr. Muxworthy.

Passing from the flood to the field, we find the present position and prospects of the economy of the turf, is far from a satisfactory state. The leaders of racing circles having provided for the annoyances with which they were threatened by the memorable quint actions, left the little folks to shift for themselves, and the consequence is, they are threatened with all sorts of damage and discomfort. Actions by the gross have been commenced against those publicans in town and country, at whose houses Derby or other lotteries have been dispensed and drawn. Unless some very energetic measures are adopted before the close of the season, their case will go hard. If a conviction take place, the penalty cannot be mitigated under the statute. This is a discouragement—another blow was the discovery of the wholesale leggerdemain of the postmen: the ramifications of racing scandalism must be pretty extensive, when they have reached so immoderate an institution as the Post-office!

Thus had begun—but worse remains behind. There is no longer any doubt about a direful robbery having been practised by means of Ratan for the late Derby. How it was managed, and who the actors were, is still kept as dark as possible; nevertheless, the plot and its machinery are in the hands of those who are engaged in the investigation. As an official statement will presently appear, any partial revelation would be incongruous. But, pending this publication, it cannot be too generally known that the whole business of racing is at this moment—and long, very long has been—tainted by all sorts of foul play. That the Derby has frequently been won by four-year-olds during the present century, is certain; and if that facility for plunder no longer exists, it only incites the wits of the sharp practitioner to discover other means. More than one scheme is already on the stocks; and our counsel is earnest, that those who will indulge in betting, be especially careful with whom they wager, and whose horses they back. The latter point must not be lost sight of, most particularly at this moment. The Leger has constantly been obnoxious to suspicion; and that on whose threshold we stand is certainly not free from good reasons for caution. According to the betting, the field is contemptible—let it not be despised: verb. sup.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The sinister reports now in circulation with regard to the Bahan affair, the suspension of the jockey by two of his principal employers, and the alleged imposition of several penalties of some standing in the betting ring, have tended greatly to check speculation on the St. Leger; and until the matter shall have been thoroughly investigated by the "powers that be," will no doubt make book-making a profitable proceeding. For this reason we may dismiss the transactions at the Corner this afternoon with the single remark that the Curd, Imperial, Red Deer, and Fogh-a-Ballagh, were in general demand, and that all the other favourites were in stale racio.

THURSDAY.—A few members only were present, but the betting, limited in its range, was calculated to excite the apprehensions of the Itahael party; 100 to 1 was laid against him to a large amount, the backers, however, being parties who were likely to have been well informed. The betting in other respects was languid, but in its tone favourable to Red Deer, Bay Mousie, Valerian, and Fogh-a-Ballagh.

CRICKET.

MARYLEBONE CLUB AND GROUND, WITH PILCH, V. THE NORTHERN COUNTRIES, WITH MR. A. MYNN.

This match, which has for some time been looked forward to with considerable interest, commenced on Monday last, at Barker's Cricket-ground, at Leicester, in presence of a large number of spectators. The weather was propitious, the ground in beautiful order, and the players, as a reference to their names will show, were of first-rate character, consequently all went off with clout. The game began by the Marylebone side going in; after scoring 71 for their first innings, they resigned their bats, and the play was resumed the following morning. The result will be found in the subjoined score:—

SURREY V. BUCKS.—The first match this season between the counties of Surrey and Bucks was played in Mr. Briggs's field at Slough, on Tuesday. The score was as follows: Bucks, first innings, 43; second innings, 60—total 103. Surrey, first and only innings, 132; winning the match by forty runs in one innings. The return match will be played at Chertsey, on Monday next.

ARCHERY.—On Wednesday last the members of the St. George's Archery Club, who have lately challenged all England for a trial of strength in that old English sport, had a grand contest for the Captainship of the club, at their grounds, in Hamilton-terrace, St. John's Wood. The shooting commenced at about half-past three, and terminated near seven o'clock. On the whole, the hitting was extremely good, the highest score being 348. There were twenty competitors for the honour of captain. Each was attired in the club dress, viz., green coat and cap, white trousers, with accoutrements, &c. In the first score the distance was 100 yards; in the second, 80 yards; and in the third, 60. There were eight targets, four being placed on mounds at either end of the ground. At the termination, Mr. Teeling was declared captain, he having scored 348. Mr. Wyett, being the second in amount, was declared lieutenant of the fraternity. Several ladies and gentlemen witnessed the shooting from the pavilion erected in the grounds, in which the members dined together in the evening.

READING REGATTA.

READING REGATTA AND RACES.

Reading has at length shaken off a lethargy of nearly half a century. With the "long-faded glories" of Bulmershe Heath the name of Reading disappeared from the list of sporting towns. Few persons cared to visit a place which remained, as it were, shut up within itself, and which seemed to heed so little the good that might be derived from a proper attention to its own natural advantages. Even the luckless invalid, whom change of air compelled to a few weeks' residence in the town, was glad to leave a place in which there was no amusement. Things are altered now; and three days' sport of the first order show something like a desire and determination to atone for past negligence; and we gladly proceed to give a brief outline of the events.

THE REGATTA.

The first day's amusement was the Regatta, on Tuesday, the 29th instant. There could not be a better spot for aquatic sports than the beautiful sweep of water from the Scours to the old Rectory House. On one side rises the Warren with its rugged chalk cliffs, here covered with heather, there darkened by deep masses of lofty fir-trees, with grassy meads at its feet gently sloping to the water. On the other bank, a broad and level range of meadows stretches far away to Reading. Both sides were thronged soon after two o'clock, by hundreds of well-dressed persons, and the numerous punts engaged in ferrying over the fresh arrivals gave the river a very animated appearance, even at that early stage of the proceedings. But when the competitors for the different prizes took their stations, the sight was truly inspiring; and Old Father Thames himself, as well as those who shadowed his waters, seemed all alive with the excitement.

In the first heat for the Diamond Pin, mounted with gold sculls, Mr. J. Cocks, in Little Ariel, beat Mr. Stevens, in Isle of Beauty.

In the second heat, Mr. Bartlett, in La Polka, beat Mr. Ives, in the Sailor.

The contest for the Reading District Challenge Cup and Medals, was between the Reading Britannia Club and the Henley Aquatics, when the Reading crew lost in consequence of an unlucky casualty.

The final heat for the Diamond Sculls, terminated in favour of Cocks.

In the double sculling match, between Messrs. Watts and Riggs, and Messrs. Stevens and Ives, of Henley, the latter were winners.

The Gold and Silver Oar was contested for by Messrs. J. Cocks, in the Ariel; G. Prince, in the Water Witch; and W. Fook, in the Water Lily. Won by J. Cocks.

Messrs. Clayton and Harris, in the Britannia, beat Messrs. Stevens and Ives, of Henley. The prize was a pair of Silver Sculls, and the race was the best contested of the whole series.

The Caversham Challenge Cup was won easily by the Henley Aquatics, the same men who rowed for the Reading District Cup.

The Ladies' Cup was won by Cocks, in Little Ariel, beating H. Bartlett, in La Polka.

The Reading Challenge Cup was contested by the Britannia, Britannia, jun., and Ariel. This race, by far the most important of all, remains undecided, in consequence of an accidental collision between the Ariel and Britannia, at an early period of the race.

This day's amusement was truly delightful, and great credit is due to the secretaries, Messrs. Charles Tagg and George Hawkes, jun., for their arrangements.

THE RACES.

Wednesday morning ushered in the races, and, as if the appetite had been whetted by the enjoyment of the previous day, the people of Reading and its environs thronged the beautiful race-course in the "King's Meadows." This beautiful course is bounded on one side by the Kennet and Thames, and on the other by the railroad. It presents throughout a broad and spacious level—supposed to be the same green fields in which the rejoicings on the marriage of John of Gaunt are represented by Chaucer to have taken place. At an early hour the ropes on each side were pressed by a greater number of people than we ever remember to have seen congregated in Reading. Carriages, and waggon, and bipeds (no quadrupeds but the racers were allowed) kept flocking in rapidly; and by the time the signal was given for the first start, not less than fifteen thousand persons were present. It was a noble and a beautiful sight. A line of carriages on the right, in front of the stand, extending nearly a mile, filled with the beauty and fashion of the whole county—on the left a dense mass of well-dressed persons—and behind them the numerous crowded stands, reaching almost to an equal distance with the carriages. The arrangements by the stewards, and the well-known clerk of the course, Mr. Hibbard, were excellent. There were, as usual, lots of jugglers, and gipsies, and tumbler, but no gambling of any kind. A bright sun heralded the sport, which was kept up throughout both days with great spirit and satisfaction.

The races, which commenced at two o'clock, came off in the following order, with the principal results annexed:—

The Innkeepers Plate of £25, added to a Sweepstake of 5 sovs each, won easily by Mr. Hepple's Lady Flora.

The Berkshire Stakes of 30 sovs each, with 10 added.—An excellent race, the horses keeping nearly close all round, and well terminated in a dead heat.

Won by Mr. Coleman's Devil-among-the-Tailors.

After the Ladies' Plate was run for, the Devil and Freystrop again ran an excellent race, and kept nearly close the whole distance. The Devil winning by a short length.

The Ladies' Plate of £20, added to a Sweepstake of 5 sovs each.—A very fine race between Mr. Preston's Soporosis and Mr. Osbaldeston's Kerrick in the second and third heat. Soporosis taking the lead—the horses kept well together.

Won after a hard struggle by Soporosis.

The Hurdle Race Sweepstake of 3 sovs each, with 15 added from the fund; beats, one mile and a half; four leaps to be taken in each heat. Mr. Bladen's Pansy, Mr. Lamb's Donald Caird, and Mr. W. Lay's b g The Knight kept well together, the former winning the first heat by a neck, and the second by rather more than a length. An excellent race between Donald and The Knight for second place.

The second day's race was not so fully attended, although a very large company was present. The sport was excellent throughout the day.

The Borough Plate of 25 sovs added to a Sweepstake of 5 sovs each, was a closely contested race. Mr. England's Spry took beating Mr. Stanborough's lute worth the first heat by a short length, and the second heat by half a head.

The success of the present year, we hope, will prove a stimulus to greater exertions for the next. Reading is rich enough to have a regatta and races too.

THE THEATRES.

SADLER'S WELLS.

It is really worth a pilgrimage to this little theatre, to witness the unique representations of the olden drama, which the new management, (Mrs. Warner and Mr. Phelps), have lately produced here. To be compelled to journey from the heart of the metropolis to its suburbs, to see Shakespeare and Massinger's masterly plays adequately put upon the stage, and to find the theatre in which this is accomplished, densely filled with a most attentive audience, is a somewhat puzzling sign of the dramatic times. Tragedy in warm weather, we know, is like pork in the dog days; and this may be an explanation of timely adaptations of popular novels, and sparkling burlesques of old nursery tales, filling certain of our theatres almost to suffocation; but, why should our olden drama flourish in the suburbs, and fall into atrophy in the town? To this paradoxical position of affairs, we must reply in Massinger's own words, "we cannot help it."

Assuredly, this success of the Elizabethan drama at Sadler's Wells, is an indication of the good taste and discernment of the Islingtonians, as it is merited by the exertions of the management. As we strolled up to the old "music-house," or "bearded-house," on Monday evening, how many associations of its ancient celebrity flitted about us: how we thought of the origin of its appellation, from a well of mineral water which belonged to the Priory of St. John of Jerusalem, and was, doubtless, in use in the reign of our First Henry; how the Monks deluded the people by attributing its virtues to monastic intercession, until Henry VIII. dissolved the priory and its revenues; how the well was covered over for a century and a half, until one Sadler, in the reign of Charles II., built a music-house here, and caused the well to be visited by from 500 to 600 persons every morning; how it attained notoriety for gluttonous feasts performed there—as eating live animals, &c. (twopenny admission); how we find Ned Ward describing its entertainments and performers, as of no very decent order; how it became noted for its "good cheer, as cheese-cakes, custards, bottled ale and cider;" then, one Forcer, "master of Gray's inn," introduced rope-dancing and tumbling, with acrobacy, about a century since; and, the waters ceasing to draw company, the well was again covered in. Roseman (whose name is preserved in that of an adjoining street,) was the next owner of the property, and in 1764, pulled down the old music-house, and in its place erected the present theatre, the scene of Grimaldi's glory. Nor must we forget the revival of the aqueous celebrity in the "real water" scenes of spectacles and melo-dramas, and the practice of the company drinking wine in the boxes and pit during the pieces, accompanied by strong carver of performances of the "fire and ice" school; at length, succeeded by the genuine Shakespearean drama. Who could have dreamed of such a location, such a shifting of quarters from Covent Garden to the Islingtonian suburb—as unexpected as the transit from Bankside or Dorset-street to the Cockpit in Drury-lane? Why! even Charles Knight, in his imaginative biography of the great bard, cannot have indulged in a vaticination of this great change—the drama driven from her ancient temple, and compelled to take refuge in this little river-side resort.

The performance of "Hamlet" at Sadler's Wells on Monday evening would have been highly creditable to either of "the patent theatres;" indeed, we have rarely seen such careful taste shown in the getting-up of a stockplay as in this production of "the play that delighteth the English more than any other." The text is accurately followed; the costumes are rich but judicious, the scenery appropriate, and the stage appointments denote extraordinary pains to have been taken with them. The acting was excellent throughout: Mr. Phelps's Hamlet, if it exhibit few new points, is a correct reading, replete with energy and pathos; he was ably supported by Mr. G. Bennett as Claudius, and Mrs. Warner as the Queen. The characters of Horatio and Laertes were well sustained; and, what is very important in this play, the subordinate parts were well filled: there was none of that vulgar blundering which is often the step from the sublime to the ridiculous in a regular play at a minor theatre. It was, altogether, a delightful treat to witness the almost breathless attention of the audience—how they sympathized with the woes of Ophelia, and alike enjoyed the madness of the philosophic Dane, and the quaint humour of the grave-maker. Surely, this contrast with the Monday-night noise of some score years since indicates a healthy tone of the public mind; nor rightly to appreciate the classic beauties of this wonderful play, bespeaks no low average of intellect. The tragedy was succeeded by a farcical version of an anecdote of Frederick the Great, entitled "The Sergeant's Wedding;" and Dibdin's genuine English farce of "The Waterman."

Among the revivals already acted here, we must not forget Sheridan Knowles's adaptation of a fine play of Massinger's entitled "The Brides," in which the powerful acting of Mr. Phelps and Mrs. Warner is so fully appreciated as it was some few years since, on the production of this play for Mr. Macready. We are pleased to see "The City Madam" underlined in the bills; for its masterly exposition of extravagance and needy and unprincipled court, and its picture of a blunt honest man contrasted with an overbearing and insolent noble, must work good wherever it is performed. Massinger's merits may be thus summed up,—that, "in dramatic power, in delicacy of expression, and in beauty of thought," he approaches more nearly to Shakespeare than any of his contemporaries. Another revival, is Holcroft's play of "The Road to Ruin," in which the manager's enactment of Old Dorseton is worth a journey from May Fair to Sadler's Wells to witness.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION OF PICTURES.—It is a curious fact that oil paintings are among the articles liable to spontaneous combustion. Many an oil painting has fired spectators with an enthusiastic admiration, or with a desire of emulation; but that they should fire themselves (in another and far more unwelcome sense), to their destruction, is at once a remarkable fact. It will be remembered that a large package of pictures was lately burnt, without apparent cause, while in the course of being transported on the Edinburgh and Glasgow railway; and that is but one among many instances. Vegetable oils, used on cloths, yarn, or wool, in the process of dyeing, and confined for a time from the open air, are very apt to occasion spontaneous fire. Floor cloths and rags used in cleaning oil are thus to be found among the forty various articles ascertained to be liable to spontaneous combustion. So far back as 1815 an instance occurred of this phenomenon at Lyons, where the material was cloth containing oil.

It is currently reported that an action for breach of promise of marriage has already been commenced by a beautiful and accomplished young lady, possessing valuable landed property in one of the midland counties (Leicestershire), against a young nobleman who has recently entered into the holy bands of matrimony.

THE ARTESIAN WELL OF GREVILLE.—The Prefect of the Seine, accompanied by M. Arago and the engineers of the city of Paris, on Saturday visited the basin of the Estrapade, into which the water of the artesian well of Greville was introduced for the first time. The flow was in the highest degree satisfactory. There are two basins placed at the angles of the rue Clotilde and a Visille Estrapade; each of them will contain about 50,000 hectolitres, and is thirty metres higher than the mouth of the well, which is 548 metres in depth. At the mouth of the well the flow of water is equal to 100 fountain inches, or 20,000 hectolitres per day; but the reservoir will only receive half this quantity. About twenty inches are destined for the supply of subscribers, and the rest for the public fountains. The source which supplies the water is 512 metres below the level of the sea; the height to which it rises is sixty metres above that level.

READING RACES.

"GENERAL TOM THUMB'S" CARRIAGE.

"GENERAL TOM THUMB'S" EQUIPAGE.

The career of the miniature hero, "Tom Thumb," in this country, has been one unvaried round of success; and, if proof were wanted of the sterling results, it might be adduced in the fact that he now possesses the outward and visible attribute of a gentleman—he keeps his carriage. Mr. S. Beaton, of No. 16, Denmark-street, Soho, has just built for his Generalship an elegant dress chariot, suitable to the dimensions of the hero. The body of the chariot is twenty inches high, and eleven inches wide. It is completely furnished in the richest style, with lining, lace, lamps, blinds, plate glass windows, spring roller blinds, &c. The colour of the body is of an intense blue, elegantly picked out with white; the wheels are blue and red; and the axles are Collinge's patent. Upon the door panels are emblazoned the General's arms, Britannia and the Goddess of Liberty, supported by the British Lion and American Eagle; crest, the Rising Sun, and the British and American Flags; the motto, "Go-a-head!" The crest is also repeated on the body and throughout the harness, made by Messrs. Pillingham, of Whitechapel-road. The box is furnished with a superb crimson hammer-cloth, elegantly trimmed, with a silver star and red and green flowers. The carriage will be drawn by a pair of Shetland ponies, which have been purchased of Mr. Batty, of Astley's Royal Amphitheatre. Two lads have been engaged as coachman and footman; they were liveries of sky-blue coats, trimmed with silver lace, and with aquilettas tipped with silver; red breeches, with silver garters and buckles; buttons, plated; cocked hats and wigs: the footman provided with a cane. The whole turn-out cost between £300 and £400. The carriage has been exhibited gratuitously in the drawing-rooms of the manufacturer; it is, really, a very elegant affair, and is highly creditable to the taste and skill of the builder. The entire equipage will be sent to "The General," at Birmingham, on Monday next.

ASTLEY'S.

Mr. Batty, the enterprising proprietor of this popular establishment, has recently added to its attractions, a spectacle entitled

CARTER'S TIGER FEAT.

Mungo Park, in which Mr. Carter as "Kafu, the Lion Tamer of the Niger," introduces many extraordinary feats with his trained troop of wild animals. Of these, the first illustration shows Mr. Carter gambolling with a fine tiger. The second scene is of a more classical character, and shows the "Tamer" driving a lion at full speed across the stage, reined with a garland of flowers.

This gentleman does not agree with Pope, that the "Proper study of mankind is man;" but yet he is a civilizer, and that is more than many of his fellow-creatures can say who undertake hazardous expeditions to displace aborigines, and rob them of their home and birthright. Now, Mr. Carter proceeds in a more philanthropic, or, as some will have it, lyncanthropic manner:—

Into the jungle, or the forest deep,
He plunges boldly, and the whistler's pard
Or shaggy lion tears from out their lair
And makes them gentle denizens of towns!
Or, if with savage nature they rebel,
Another Hercules is he to grasp
Each son of hundred-headed Typhon and Give him Nemeean death, as did of old Alcmena's child the fearful monster in
The Argolic grove:—but best he loves
To soothe and calm them for our eyes' disport.

FINE ARTS.

THE BEAUTIES OF THE OPERA, Part III.—"Norma." D. Bogue. An artist cannot have a more splendid subject for his pencil than Grisi in the rôle of "Norma." Her fine Italian head never seems so majestic as in this part of the Druid Priestess, and her commanding figure is not often seen to more advantage. The portrait of her in the present number, if not the best likeness in the world, is almost as beautiful as the original, and therefore must bear some resemblance. We speak merely of the face; we cannot say we much admire the rest of the picture. A character-portrait should present some associating accessories; but this exhibits none, with the exception of a reaping hook and a wreath of oak leaves, which would rather make us mistake her for Ceres herself than the Druidical Priestess. The number, as usual, is got up in the first style of taste and elegance.

CARTER'S LION CHARIOT FEAT.

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.*DESCRIPTION OF THE FIGURES.

MODÈS PARISIENNES.

The season is too far advanced to expect much novelty; it is therefore only in the details and accessories that any change is to be observed.

There is no alteration in the make of dresses. The laced corsages are frequently replaced by facings or lappels; many terminate at the waist with basques, forming jackets, giving length and grace to the shape, a style which it is expected will prevail this autumn.

The sleeves of dresses are worn short and not very full, but have the addition of long under-sleeves, composed of muslin, confined at intervals by embroidered bands, or sometimes by bands going spirally round the arm. A novelty has been introduced as a substitute for these sleeves, which consists of guimpes (chemisettes) with sleeves of fancy muslin, as guimpes are always placed inside the corsage; it is quite a new idea to add sleeves, which appear on the arm from under the short half-sleeve of the corsage.

Cambrie muslin peignoirs are adopted for the watering places; they are mostly of delicate colours. Also, printed muslin peignoirs with high corsages in the Amazon (riding-habit) style; they are embroidered with bright colours and have lappels or facings, which can be thrown open or crossed over at will. The sleeves are half long, leaving the arm at liberty, with an under sleeve, or with laced mittens.

The ornaments of dresses this season consist generally either of narrow velvet, of ribbon, passementerie, or black lace. Many corsages have their points rounded off, which allows waist ribbons to be adopted, a style to which there is a sensible tendency.

Scarfs have superseded Shawls for the present, as they are suited for all changes of the temperature according to the manner in which they are worn.

The most fashionable Mantelets are large and rounded behind, with two puckered volans, three inches apart. Shot tafeta, violet and black, green and black, or orange and black, is the favourite material.

Hats are becoming gradually shorter at the ears, and in the same proportion longer in the brims. This change is so gradual, that it is only perceptible in paille de riz hats, which, being free from bouillons, are seen in their actual shape.

The Trimmings of Straw Hats for the watering places are changed from ribbon to coloured velvet, which is better suited to resist both sun and damp. This is an alteration which takes place annually, with, of course, some change; thus, instead of being placed crossways on the front, with accessories of black lace, as heretofore, they now place two rows of velvet, an inch wide, round the crown; another passes over the brim, and terminates on each side with a rosette bow; the bayonet (curtain) is trimmed with two narrower rows; the bayonet is either straw colour, the same as the hat, or the colour of the lining and ribbons.

The newest Capotes for the autumn season have the crowns made of plain or figured silk.

STATISTICS OF MORTALITY.—The average age of all who die in Bradford is 36.69 years; in Liverpool the average age is from 17 to 18 years; in Manchester, 18 years; while in Leeds it is 31 years.

EXTRAORDINARY BREAK OF BEES.—At the workshops of the London and South-eastern Railway, Vauxhall terminus, a quantity of bees have taken up their abode, and are now very assiduously depositing their honey in one of the engine-shed doorways, the domicile of their fancy being in a crevice or opening between the wooden frame of the door and the brick work, and within twenty inches of the iron rails upon which the engines are frequently run in and out of the repairing shops; also where the workmen are continually passing and repassing in that direction. They are not the least daunted with the noise and bustle of railway stations and works.

GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the General Steam Navigation Company took place at the office on Tuesday, 29, Lombard-street, and was numerously attended. The chair was taken by John Wilkin, Esq. (in the continued absence from illness of W. Attwood, Esq., the chairman of the company), when a report from the directors, with the half-yearly accounts, was read. From these it appeared that the operations of the company for the past half year had been attended with increased advantage to the proprietors, and that the general condition of the affairs of the corporation was calculated to give the highest satisfaction. The usual dividend being declared, the cordial thanks of the meeting were voted to the chairman and directors for their continued efforts in promoting the company's interests.

OCCUPATION for PERSONS of INDUSTRIOUS HABITS.—Shoppers wishing for a respectable addition to their business, or persons having part of their time unemployed, may add considerably to their income by the SALE of the LONDON GINGER Tea Company's celebrated TEAS, established November, 1818, at 23, Ludgate-hill, the oldest concern of the kind in the kingdom, by the sale of whose teas many families have been entirely maintained during the last 58 years. Applications to be made at the Company's warehouse, 2, Ludgate-Precinct-hill, London.

N.B.—No business transacted at this Establishment from Friday at sunset, until sunrise on Saturday, when it is resumed until twelve o'clock.

RECEIVING-HOUSE OF THE ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.

RECEIVING-HOUSE OF THE ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY, HYDE-PARK.

There cannot be a more opportune period than the present bathing-season, for introducing to our readers the many advantages which have accrued to the public from the establishment of the Royal Humane Society, for the recovery of persons apparently drowned or dead.

The Institution was founded in 1774, by Drs. Goldsmith, Heberden, Towers, Lettison, Hare, and Cogan; but principally by the exertions of the last three gentlemen. The Society offers rewards and medals for saving lives. The number of cases in which successful exertions have been made, have amounted to several thousands; and the number of medals awarded—so long as a year ago—exceeded 20,000. Similar institutions have been established in other parts of Great Britain, in our colonies, and elsewhere.

The Society has eighteen receiving-houses in the metropolis. The principal house was erected in the year 1794, on the north bank of the Serpentine, in Hyde-park, upon a piece of ground presented to the Institution by George III., and subsequently extended by William IV., the patron. The fitness of this site is attested by the number of persons resorting to the Serpentine in the bathing and skating seasons, and consequently the number of accidents occurring there. Indeed, it is stated that not less than 100,000 persons on an average annually bathe in the river and the neighbourhood of the receiving-house; and on one occasion, during a frost, twenty-five individuals were submerged by the breaking of the ice; but, by the exertions of men (who are required to be good swimmers) employed by the Society at such seasons, and the proximity of the receiving-house, no life was lost.

The house built in 1794 was taken down in 1834, and the foundation-stone of the building shown in the engraving was laid by his Grace the Duke of Wellington. It is a neat structure, of fine brick, fronted and finished with Bath and Portland stone. The front has pilasters at the angles, and a neat entablature, which is surmounted by the royal arms upon a pedestal. Over the entrance is a pediment supported by two fluted Ionic columns and pilasters; upon the entablature is inscribed "Royal Humane Society's Receiving-house." The doorway is tastefully enriched; over it is sculptured in stone a fac simile of the Society's medal, encircled with a wreath; the design being a boy endeavouring to resuscitate an almost suffocated youth by blowing it, and the motto being "Lateat scintilla ferax."—"Perchance a spark may be concealed."

The interior of the receiving-house consists of an entrance-hall, with a room for medical attendants on the left, and waiting-room on the right; parallel with which are two separate wards for the reception of male and female patients. Each contains beds warmed with hot water, a bath, and a hot-water, metal-topped table for heating flannels, bricks, &c.; the supply of water being by pipes around the walls and beneath the floor of the rooms. Next are a kitchen and two sleeping-rooms, for the residence of the superintendent and his family; adjoining is the furnace for heating water, planned by Messrs. Simpson and Thompson, engineers of the Chelsea Water-works. In the roof of the building are two cisterns for cold, and one for hot water. In the rear is a detached shed, in which are kept boats, ladders, ropes, and poles; wicker boats are likewise in constant readiness. In short, the whole of the arrangements are upon the most complete scale; the medical assistants of the Institution reside near the spot; and the superintendent supplies the furnace from daybreak till eleven o'clock at night; so that a hot water bath can be made ready for use in a minute. Lastly, the Committee consider this receiving-house a model for all other institutions of the same kind.

This unique building was erected from the design of J. B. Bunning, Esq., architect, who is a member of the Committee, and, upon this occasion, generously relinquished all claim on the Society for his professional services.

Proper attendants, warm baths, beds, and tables, apparatus, and copper, are in constant readiness during the bathing and skating seasons, to prevent the fatal or injurious effects of any accident. Our second engraving represents the interior of one of the wards; with the arrangement of the bath, the bed, table, the electrical machine, &c.

According to the last report of the Society, there had been, within one year, 164 claimants to rewards; to 23 of whom the silver medal had been awarded; to 15 the bronze medal; and pecuniary rewards bestowed on 126. Within this period, the lives of 171 persons had been preserved from casualties. The apparatus for the preservation and restoration of life is very complete; and the Society lose no opportunity of introducing improved methods. Among the latter are newly-invented circular bellows for inflation; Mr. Williams's floating drag, with a fine buoy; and Mr. Pugh's inflated crease.

A Director of the Society has recently asserted that there is not an establishment in Europe more perfect, or in more efficient order, than the Receiving-house in Hyde-park; and the activity of its superintendents and boatmen is best attested by the promptness with which, in three minutes, one of the latter, at the beginning of the present month, found a body, having, in the mean time, picked up another man who was drowning. A daily report of the estimated number of bathers is made to the Secretary; and, by a careful and moderate computation, they have exceeded 274,000 during June and July of the present year. During this period thirty-one cases were rescued, and fifteen taken to the Receiving-house, where they were successfully restored from apparent death; and, up to the 2nd instant, only three casualties had proved fatal since the bathing season had commenced. It should be added, that the Institution cannot exceed its present expenses; and the establishment in Hyde-park already costs a very large portion of the Society's income. "If we look at the crowded state of the river Thames, the wonderful increase of traffic by steam, and the numerous accidents—too many of which have been fatal—we shall find ample room for the employment of more men and boats by the Humane Society. There is, indeed, a fine field for the Institution to carry out its objects, and cheerfully would the Committee endeavour to do as much on the Thames as it has done on the Serpentine, if the public, whose safety alone is concerned, would enable it to do so."

PRICE OF BREAD.—On Monday the price of bread fell generally in the metropolis 4d. per quarter loaf, on account of the abundant harvest. The general price is now 7d., although at many of the underselling bakers it is 6d.

PRINCIPAL DONATION.—A short time since an anonymous letter was forwarded to the Bishop of London with the princely sum of £5000, and a request to apply the amount "for the erection of a church in the metropolis." Since the receipt, an eligible site for the erection of a sacred edifice has been purchased by some charitable individuals, in Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square, at a cost of nearly £5500, upon which a church will be built for a district which contains a population of more than 15,000 persons.

WARD OF THE RECEIVING-HOUSE OF THE ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.

NEW CHURCH, ARGYLE-SQUARE.

This Church is built for a society of persons who worship the Lord Jesus Christ in conformity with the views of Scripture doctrine presented in the writings of Swedenborg, and who have removed from a small chapel in the City, which they built more than forty years ago. Though generally called Swedenborgians, this is not the designation they give themselves. They call themselves members of the New Christian Church, which they believe to be predicated by the New Jerusalem, seen by John in the Revelation as descending from God out of Heaven, and by which they understand to be signified an harmonious and rational system of pure doctrine drawn from the Word of God.

Their new place of worship stands at the south-east corner of Argyle-square, near Rattle-bridge, and is a conspicuous object from the New-road—its handsome front being seen on looking up Charterfield-street. The foundation-stone was laid July 27, 1843; the building was erected during the subsequent part of the year, and the interior finished during the present year. It was opened and dedicated to the Lord Jesus Christ as the one only God, by the Rev. Messrs. Howarth (of Salford), Smithson (of Manchester), and Shaw, the Minister of the Church, on Sunday, the 11th inst.

The building is in the Anglo-Norman style of the period of the Conqueror, and exhibits, with a combination of the refinements and conveniences of the present day, the simplicity and entirety of the buildings peculiar to that early period. The style has been preserved throughout, even to the most subordinate parts.

Most of the buildings that have been erected of late years, in the Anglo-Norman style, have been of the transition period; but this church exhibits a decided reception in this respect; the only trace of the transition period discoverable is on one of the flank walls, where there are twelve windows to the school-room, beneath the church, with interlaced arches.

The principal features of the entrance front, shown in our engraving, are two towers, about seventy feet high, and the gable of the main building, with a sub-gable, extending over a wide-spreading porch, which reaches from tower to tower. The towers are surmounted by octagonal spires, with intersecting angle roofs, the whole of which are covered with stone-coloured mosaic tiles, laid anglewise, with alternate bands of square tiles. The apex of each tower terminates with a bronze cross. The main gable is surmounted by a stone cross. The front is recessed on stepped corbels, rising from shafts. Within the recess is a wheel-window, and beneath is a series of arched recesses. The gable to the entrance porch has a pinnated cross. The entrance doorway is deeply recessed, with indentations containing alternately a column and a chevron moulding surmounted by corresponding archivolts, which, uniting with the archivolts of adjacent windows similarly recessed and decorated, form a triplet embracing the whole space between the towers. The steps are of considerable width, and, in connection with two perforated stone walls, which unite them with the towers add much to the spacious appearance of the entrance.

NEW CHURCH, ARGYLE-SQUARE.

The chief part of the building is of white and yellow brick, stone-work being sparingly introduced. The arches to the recesses and apertures of the towers, and also to the side windows, have spandrels and weatherings entirely formed of bricks, cut and rubbed. The various billet and other ornaments around the wheel-window, and the slender columns or shafts, consist also of bricks, cut and rubbed to the required form. These and the interlaced arches exhibit examples of what may be accomplished out of the rudest and most unmanageable materials.

The interior of the church is divided into nave and aisles by four arches on each side, with deeply moulded archivolts. The height of the nave is 36 feet, of the aisles 24 feet; and as there are no side galleries, the beautiful roof may be seen to advantage from various points of view. The nave and aisles are vaulted, the ceiling of the aisle, or recess for the communion, is formed by a continuation of the nave vault. The transverse ribs are moulded, but the angles of the groins are plain. Columniated shafts sustain the nave arches, from which, and from corbels in the side walls, the vaulting springs. One of the four arches on each side is less than the others, the piers of which are united by a transverse wall forming an organ loft and gallery for children, having a vestibule underneath, and this without any apparent encroachment upon the body of the building. The front of the gallery is ornamented with arches on corbels and a moulded chignon. The gallery is reached by spiral stair-cases in the towers.

The recess for the communion table, or aisle, has a wheel window enriched with stained glass, containing, in the outer compartments, the words "God is One," and, in the centre, the letters I.H.S. The arrangements here are altogether peculiar. The floor consists of an outer and inner platform, each of which is raised successively two steps. On the upper is placed the communion-table, over which is an arched recess, with two sub-arches and a central column dividing the recess into two compartments. In the central apse are the words, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments," and in the two compartments are written, or rather to be written, the Commandments. The cover of the altar table is of rich crimson velvet, on the front of which is embroidered the sacred monogram I.H.S., surmounted by rays, and preceded and followed respectively by the Greek letters Alpha and Omega. On each side of the upper platform is a projection on which are placed two letters or reading desks, corresponding in form and size, the pulpit and its attendant stairs being dispensed with. The lower platform is enclosed with an oak railing, and this we consider far more characteristic of so early a period than an iron railing. The font is octagonal, ornamented around with semi-Norman arches in relief, and is placed near a door, the baptismal rite being considered representative of introduction into the Church of the Lord.

The church is lighted, on each side, by seven windows, in three complete and one single window; the whole of which are at considerable elevation from the floor, and are ornamented with shafts and archivolts, and the slight introduction of stained glass.

Great breadth and simplicity of effect result from the whole of the walls, ceilings, piers, and gallery front, having a uniform appearance of stone. The mouldings of the ceilings being of the same rough texture and jointed as the walls, the whole is directed of the effect of lath and plaster so prevalent in modern churches. The organ, which is a very superior instrument, by Robson, is designed in accordance with the style of the building. This and the lanterns, seats, and other moveables, are uniformly dark oak, and with the crimson cushions and other appendages produce a simple but vigorous harmony.

Advantage has been taken of the difference in level between the roadway and the site on which the building stands, to form beneath the church a school-room capable of containing two hundred children, together with apartments for the church-keeper, stove-room, and convenience for warming the whole with hot water.

The body of the church is fitted with open seats, a portion of which are free, and will accommodate about three hundred persons, the organ gallery being appropriated to the choir and Sunday school. The cost of the whole, including the purchase of the freehold, is upwards of £3000. The work has been erected from the design, and under the superintendence of Mr. J. D. Hopkins, architect, of Bedford-square.

THE JUDGMENT REVERSED.

ALL'S well that ends well, may be the exclamation of those who till Wednesday last were the Irish state prisoners. On that day the judgment against them was reversed by the House of Lords, much to the surprise of those who had taken it for granted that the opinion of the majority of the English Judges on the legal points submitted to them would have governed the decision of their lordships. But it has turned out otherwise; O'Connell's legal luck has not deserted him; though the chances were against him through all the rest of the game, fortune has made him amends at the end of it; at the very last throw, when it appeared that nothing less than a miracle could save him, the dice have turned up in his favour. The whole trial, from beginning to end, was such an example of the uncertainty of the law, that we are quite justified in borrowing an illustration from the one only thing that is more uncertain still—the chance of the die. Judges, statutes, authorities, dicta, precedents, have all been arrayed against each other, each seeming good and sound, till another was brought forward to contradict it. Every stage of the proceedings has exhibited strange differences of opinion in the highest legal dignitaries. The Judges on the Irish bench were several times divided in opinion in the preliminary stages of the case. The English Judges differed from their Irish brethren, and from each other; and now the Law Lords, whose decision binds the whole House of Peers, have differed from both! If the uncertainty of the law were not already a proverb, what a striking proof of it might be furnished by this case, which will go down in legal history unrivalled among English causes célèbres!

Inexplicable as all this seems, there are a few principles involved in the proceedings that render the uncertainty and apparent contradictions less surprising. In the first place, the offences charged against the defendants were not to be defined with anything like accuracy or clearness. Political offences cannot be defined by statute. Robbery and murder have been robbery and murder in all ages; the "overt acts" are things plain to the senses, and open to direct proof. But treason and political misdemeanours are perpetually changing, according to the temper and character of the age. Men have been beheaded and hanged for high treason and conspiracies, on evidence of acts that no Judge or Jury would dare now construe into an offence; yet the law of treason and conspiracy, as far as it can be ascertained by statute, remains the same, or nearly the same; the difference of interpretation arises from the temper of the times, acting on Judges or Juries, as on all the rest of society.

The crime itself being vague and undefined, with no certain line to mark where legal concurrent political action becomes illegal combination, or conspiracy, it followed, as a necessary consequence, that the indictment charging the offence would be long, cumbrous, involved, and intricate. But the Irish indictment exceeded all examples of legal obscurity; it had all the worst faults of a legal instrument, with some additional ones peculiar to itself; it was a legal puzzle placed upon parchment to the confounding of all ordinary understandings, and of none more so than those of the Jury who had to decide upon it. Mr. Attorney-General Smith erred on the side of excess; he aimed at making matters safer than was possible; he tried to include everything that could be thought of; he spun the legal web too finely, and, by thus attenuating the threads, left them too weak to stand the assault made on them: the great fly has broken through, pulling the little ones after him.

The cumbrous indictment has been one great cause of the uncertainty pervading the whole proceedings; it charged all sorts of things in all sorts of ways; the consequence was, that many of them were unsound, bad, and untenable in law. The defects were pointed out by the defendants' counsel in the Dublin Court of

HOUSE OF LORDS—THE LORD CHANCELLOR PRONOUNCING JUDGMENT IN THE CASE OF THE QUEEN V. O'CONNELL.

Queen's Bench. But the Irish Judges all declared the counts were unexceptionable. When the case is removed to England, the English Judges all declare that the counts are bad; but the majority of them think the indictment is not sufficiently vitiated by it to render a reversal of the judgment imperative. But that opinion not binding the House of Lords, it has decided both that the bad counts do vitiate the judgment, and that it ought to be reversed; so it is reversed accordingly. The mistakes and mishaps that attended the Jury list, and the refusal of the traversers' challenge of the array have also had much to do with the quashing the decision of the Irish Judges. These last points seem to have weighed particularly with Lord Denman; but the grand vice and radical defect of the trial was the "monster" indictment, which may serve as a warning to all future Attorneys-General to make their charges as unlike it as possible.

And now that the final judgment is given, what will be the effect of it in England and Ireland? Here it will be considered a lucky turn of affairs for O'Connell; but it will not be deemed a triumph for him. He is liberated by a majority of one, where the numbers were only five altogether. The two peers who would have supported the judgment are O'Connell's bitterest personal and political opponents. The three who have reversed it are of liberal politics, and supporters of O'Connell in many of the questions he has advocated, though neither of them is a Repealer. Lord Lyndhurst is an able lawyer, but a fierce and unscrupulous partisan. On a question, which is, after all, a political conflict, it would be almost impossible for him to avoid being influenced in his interpretation of the law by his well-known political bias. Lord Brougham's name carries very little weight with it as a lawyer, and he has played the "double" of Lord Lyndhurst so long and so closely, that if the Lord Chancellor thought fit to stand on his head on the woolsack, Lord Brougham would immediately throw his heels into the air. He has also a great dislike to O'Connell; so on this occasion he may have seconded the Lord Chancellor with all the sincerity of spite, as well as with all the alacrity of imitation. On the other hand, the legal characters of Lord Denman, Lord Cottenham, and Lord Campbell, are very high; but they, too, may have been influenced—perhaps imperceptibly even to themselves—by their political partialities. In England, certainly, it will be believed that there is some ground for thinking, too, that the Government did not greatly wish for a hostile decision, or certainly it might have secured one. It was Lord Wharfedale, the President of the Council, who prevented the lay lords from voting; they have the right, though it has not been the custom for them to do so, and the Ministry did not like to break through ordinary usage. But a vindictive or unscrupulous Government would have secured a majority at all hazards. It is not improbable that Sir R. Peel is by no means sorry thus to get rid of a heavy embarrassment. The "monster meetings" were suppressed by the trial, and the presence of O'Connell was withdrawn from the Corn-Exchange by the sentence. But his imprisonment was causing and continuing another kind of agitation, quite as dangerous as the former one. This, his release will check. How the Government will deal with the agitation hereafter, depends on the mode in which it is conducted; but we imagine the ministers will not try a second "state prosecution."

In Ireland, however, the decision will be considered a signal triumph. It will confirm the common opinion of O'Connell's legal infallibility, and it will increase the hatred and suspicion felt by the Catholics of Ireland towards the administrators of the law, so uniformly chosen from one party and creed, and so frequently acting from violent and bigoted motives, that all confidence has been shaken. The greater temper and moderation of the English Judges will place the Irish Bench in an unfavourable contrast. But it may also tend to check much of that fierce, indiscriminate invective against Saxon hatred and Saxon oppression of Ireland, a too frequent use of which has been O'Connell's greatest error. And if the decision now come to should create a better feeling, neither country will have cause to regret that the judgment of the Dublin Court of Queen's Bench has been overthrown.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

DECISION OF THE JUDGES IN THE CASE OF O'CONNELL AND OTHERS—THE JUDGMENT REVERSED.

The House of Lords was very much crowded on Monday, that day having been appointed for the judges to give their decision in the case of O'Connell and the other defendants. The greater number of the Judges and of the lay lords were present. Among the latter were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Denman (the Lord Chief Justice), Lord Brougham, and Lord Campbell. The Bishop of Lichfield read prayers.

Lord Cottenham arrived shortly after the commencement of the proceedings. The Duke of Cambridge was in the house at a very early hour in the day, as were Lord Beaumont, Lord Redesdale, the Earl of Dalhousie, Lord Strangford, Lord Boston, and Lord Tankerville.

Lord Chief Justice Tindal delivered the opinions of the Judges on the several questions submitted to them by their lordships. The learned Judge said, the first question proposed to her Majesty's Judges was, whether all or any, and, if any, which of the counts in the indictment were bad—so that, if standing alone, no judgment could properly stand upon them. The question would be whether all the counts were framed with convenient certainty and accuracy; for if any were framed in so loose and uncertain a manner as that the defendants might on their own defence avoid the consequences of them, there was nothing they could gain by such a course that they would not be entitled to under the writ of error. Now, to constitute the crime of conspiracy, it was necessary that two or more persons should agree to do something of an unlawful character. To do such things was an offence at common law, and had clearly been recognised as such ever since the time of Edward I. It had always been held that the gist of the offence was the intention to break the law, no matter whether the act be done or not. No serious objection appeared to have been taken against the sufficiency of any of the counts of the indictment up to the sixth. The previous counts were not bad and could not be objected to. They contained a definite charge against the defendants to do an illegal act. With respect to the 6th and 7th counts, the judges all agreed that they did not state the illegal purpose for which the defendants conspired with sufficient certainty to lead to the conclusion that the defendants intended to do an illegal act; for the words "intimidation" and "physical force" were not sufficiently defined. The objects stated in the 8th, 9th, and 10th counts were illegal acts, each and every offence being a violation of the law. So that as to the first question they were of opinion that the 6th and 7th counts were bad in law, and if they had stood alone the indictment could not be supported. On the second branch, as to the finding in the jury on the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th counts, the Judges concurred in opinion, that the finding of the jury, and the entry of the finding, on these counts, were not supportable in law. With respect to the 3rd question, whether there was any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment by reason of any defects in the indictment, or of the finding of the jury, or the entry of the finding, there existed a difference of opinion among the Judges, and he therefore stated only his own individual opinion upon this question. The learned Chief Justice then entered very minutely into the legal grounds of his conclusion, that the judgment was irreversible on the ground of the four defective counts (the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th). The judgment proceeded on the good counts only, and if so, the whole difficulty was at an end. With regard to the second branch of the question, he was of the same opinion, and generally he was of opinion that there was no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment by reason of any defects in the indictment, or of the finding of the jury, or the entry of the finding, of the jury. The Judges all concurred in opinion that there was no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment on the matter of the plea in abatement. On the 4th question, as to the continuation of the trial, which it had been objected was conditional, the Judges were of opinion that the order was perfectly legal, and that the trial was properly continued, and that this question should be answered in the negative. With respect to the 5th question, whether there was any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment because of the Court's erring in disallowing the challenge of array, they were of opinion that the Sheriff had not acted improperly or illegally, and no object could have been obtained if the challenge had been allowed, for the jury must have been chosen from the same book, and the jury might have been objected to, and so on before proof, and there would be no trial at all. The Judges, therefore, answered this question in the negative. The next question was, did any ground exist for reversing the judgment by reason of a defect of entering the countinances from the day of trial to the 11th of April? The Judges were of opinion that there was no ground under the statute, and that it was in effect a Parliamentary continuance of the case, and that no discontinuance did in fact take place. On the 8th question, the Judges were of opinion that there was no ground for reversing or varying the judgment on account of the sentence pronounced, with regard to the recognizances and terms of imprisonment. The only difficulty was in the form of the order of entry of the recognizances and of the terms of imprisonment. On the 9th question, whether there was any ground to reverse the judgment on account of the judgments on the assignments of error coram vobis, the Judges thought that, under the statute, the decision of the Court in Ireland might be supported, though, if the matter were res integra, a question might, perhaps, be raised; but upon a reasonable construction of the statute, and the practice of the Court, they thought the objection had been answered, and that there was no ground for reversing the judgment on this point. The 10th question was, whether the judgment should be reversed by reason of its not containing any entry as to the verdicts of acquittal, and the Judges were all of opinion that it should be answered in the negative. With respect to the 11th and last question, he (the learned Chief Justice) gave only his own opinion. The question was, whether the entry on the record, being that the defendants should be fined and imprisoned "for the offences aforesaid," that of itself was a ground for reversing the judgment. He took the words, "the offences aforesaid," in their ordinary sense, meaning the offences laid in the 1st, 2nd, and subsequent counts, and contained in the good findings, and he was of opinion that this question should be answered altogether in the negative.

Mr. Justice Patteson then delivered his opinion on the 3rd and 11th questions, to the effect that the badness of the finding on some of the counts did not affect the verdict and judgment upon the whole of the indictment. Assuming that the judgment would have been bad upon some counts by reason of the defective finding upon some counts, still the whole judgment would be good.

Mr. Justice Maule followed, concurring with the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Patteson.

Mr. Justice Colman delivered his opinion, to the effect that, with respect to the third question, there was sufficient ground for reversing the judgment. According to his opinion, if one count in the indictment was bad, the judgment was erroneous, because it did not state on what counts the sentence was passed.

Mr. Justice Williams said the difference of opinion substantially arose on the 11th question. There was no difference on the merits, and there was no doubt that there were good counts in the indictment, which would sustain an exceptionable judgment. The objections in the writ were purely of a technical nature, and must be technically treated. The learned Judge cited various cases, and urged reasons for an opposite conclusion to that of Mr. Justice Colman, and for agreeing with the Chief Justice that there were counts which would sustain the judgment pronounced "for the offences aforesaid," which were not the offences contained in the counts bad in law, or in the defective findings, but on those good in law.

Mr. Baron Gurney concurred with the Chief Justice and the other Judges who took the same view of the third and eleventh questions.

Mr. Baron Alderson said it was the rule of counts to give judgment on the good counts of an indictment, and not on the bad counts, and, therefore, in considering a writ of error, it was necessary to ascertain whether there was sufficient in any of the counts to support the judgment appealed against. The learned Baron, in conclusion, said his answer to all their lordships' questions must be in the negative, and in confirmation of the judgment pronounced by the court below.

Mr. Baron Parke said he regretted that, after the best consideration, he could not bring himself to agree with the majority of his learned brethren, on the third and eleventh questions. When an indictment consisted of several counts, bad and good, each ought to have been brought to a decision, and finally disposed of upon the record. There was a prevailing opinion that one good count in an indictment would support a judgment, but it appeared to him to have grown up without adequate grounds. The defendants ought, therefore, in his opinion, on the face of the record, to be put in the same situation as if each count had been a distinct indictment.

Mr. Justice Coleridge was prevented by illness from being present, but Lord Chief Justice Tindal stated that that learned Judge had sent his written opinion, in which he expressed his concurrence with the majority of his learned brethren. The majority of the opinions of the Judges (nine in number) were thus against the writ of error.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, the house postponed the further consideration of the opinion of the Judges till Wednesday.

The house re-assembled on Wednesday, and gave final decision upon the case. The same excitement as before was observable, and every part allotted to strangers, was excessively full.

The case having been called on, the Lord Chancellor rose and said, he had to move their lordships that the judgment in this case of the Court below be affirmed. Their lordships would recollect that when this case was first presented at the bar of their lordships' house, it occurred to him (the Lord Chancellor), as well as to every other noble lord who attended to these proceedings, that it was proper, with reference to the cases to be decided, and the nature and character of them, and from other circumstances connected therewith, and in order to avoid all possible suspicion of political bias in the decision to which their lordships should come, that their lordships should have the assistance of the learned Judges. These learned persons were accordingly assembled by their lordships' order, and attended with their accustomed patience to the long and elaborate arguments which were entered into at their lordships' bar. As soon as it was possible, consistently with their other duties, they assembled to consult together, and, after taking the time necessary to form a correct opinion on the subject, attended before their lordships and communicated the result of their deliberations. With respect to all the points submitted to their consideration they agreed, with the exception of one. With respect to their opinion, seven of the learned Judges, with the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas at their head, had expressed their distinct, clear, and decided opinion, that the objections urged to the judgment of the Court below were not valid. Two other of the learned Judges, for whom he (the Lord Chancellor) entertained the highest possible respect, had expressed an adverse opinion; but that opinion had been expressed—he thought he might be permitted to say, and he believed their lordships would concur with him in so thinking—accompanied by much doubt and hesitation. Now he (the Lord Chancellor) thought that, under these circumstances, unless their lordships were thoroughly and entirely satisfied that the opinion of the majority of the Judges was founded on palpable error, they would feel bound by their decision to adhere to and support their judgment, and act in conformity with it. The noble and learned lord then stated the nature of the question. By the law of England a general judgment, notwithstanding any defective count in the indictment, was sufficient. That was the rule in criminal cases, laid down by Lord Mansfield in clear and comprehensive terms. It was concurred in by some of the ablest Judges that ever adorned the bench, and until in this case he had never heard it questioned. It was stated that the rule applied only to motions in arrest of judgment. He was satisfied that there was no ground for that exception. But it was said that otherwise it could not be shown what portion of the judgment might be awarded in respect of the defective counts. Unless there was proof to the contrary, it must be assumed that the judgment was based upon the valid part of the indictment; but on the face of the record in this case was there any ground for the objection? The judgment was, that the party for the "offences aforesaid" be fined and imprisoned. Some of the counts were bad, because the offence was not clearly stated. How, then, could it be said that the judgment was based upon those counts which stated no offence? Such a conclusion would be an incongruity and inconsistency which their lordships would not sanction. The same reasoning would apply to those counts upon which the findings had been wrongly entered. They were a nullity. Upon the face of the record, therefore, there was no defect whatever. The noble and learned lord then referred to various authorities in support of that opinion, and argued that there had been an award of judgment only for those offences which had been properly laid, and on which the findings were duly entered. On these, and these only, was judgment to be considered as given; and, therefore, there was nothing upon the face of the record with which their lordships could find fault—and with the record alone, and with error upon the face of it, was it within the province of that house to interfere? The cases to which he referred all spoke of general judgments upon a whole record, that record containing counts which were valid, and counts which were admitted to be wholly untenable. But judgment was sustained because of the good counts, and the untenable counts were considered as being no longer upon the record. It never occurred to the Judges on those occasions that objections could be entertained to the entire record because of a defective portion of it. He (the Lord Chancellor) apprehended, therefore, that he was armed with strong and decisive authorities in support of the judgment in this case as it now stood. He had made out, he considered, by a host of authorities, from Lord Holt down to the present time, the position he had started from. Difficulties had been urged to which he should for a moment apply himself. One was as to a pardon for a portion of punishment by reason of ineffective counts. But here the Judges were unanimous, and, therefore, it was not worth while to argue the point further. The corpus delicti had been proved. Under these circumstances would they, or would they not, recognise the decision of the great majority of the Judges—with such a man as the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas at their head? It was nothing but the clearest evidence of wrong that should induce their lordships to differ from a judgment so supported. It was impossible their lordships could yield to the arguments of counsel, however able, when disapproved by Judges so eminent and so enlightened as those who had given them the benefit of their opinions. So much for that point. Then as to the jury—the challenge to the array. There were several grounds of challenge to the array, but they were confined to the Sheriff or other officer entrusted with his duty. There was nothing charged upon this record, according to the law of the country as laid down by the most eminent writers, to raise the question of challenge to the array. It had been said they might go to the last book, but he (the Lord Chancellor) was satisfied, from consultation of the best authorities, that they could not, in such an instance as this, lawfully do so. Such a course had no authority for its sanction, it was not the remedy pointed out by the law. The learned Judges had pronounced their unanimous opinion of it, and he (the Lord Chancellor) should not have adverted to the point, but for the opinion he knew to be entertained upon it by his noble friend at the table (Lord Denman). The main questions had been fully and elaborately argued, and had been decided upon after the most patient and mature consideration. He (the Lord Chancellor) had submitted to their lordships a few reasons why they should agree to the opinions pronounced by a majority of the Judges, finally, strongly, and unhesitatingly, as against the opinions of two other Judges—most eminent men, certainly, but whose opinions, nevertheless, had been given with hesitation, and anxiety, and doubt. He should, therefore, propose to their lordships at once to confirm the decision which had been arrived at by the Court below.

Lord Brougham, after highly complimenting the Judges of the land, said he agreed they were not to be bound by their opinion. They took their answers not as their rule or guide, but as helping them to go over ground confessedly slippery, safely and conveniently. An uniform course of precedents must be considered to make the law for their lordships as well as for the Judges—and the Judges were the best parties to lay those precedents in their full integrity before them. He did not hold that their lordships were bound to pay respect to one precedent, but when a whole course came before them, nearly all of them bearing the same way, the course they were called upon to pursue in the due administration of justice was greatly facilitated. The great majority of the Judges, with two most respectable exceptions, not only admitted the rule as to the sufficiency of one good count over other bad ones, but applied it directly to this case. The Judges were there, however, to assist them with their information, but not with their advice, though, of course, to that advice their lordships would ever give the most respectful consideration. Now, the Judges had decided that in the two counts so often alluded to the offence had not been sufficiently defined; but, with all respect for those eminent and learned personages, he (Lord Brougham) must differ from them. As to a reversal of the sentence, he could see no ground for it whatever, either in law or in reason. The Court, of course, held that the judgment was upon the record generally sustainable, particularly on the good counts, the bad ones going for nothing. The superior Courts had hitherto always said there may be bad counts; be it so; but still there are good ones, and these are sufficient to enter on judgment generally, and no writ of error was ever, before the present one, brought on this point; and could there be stronger evidence in support of the course which had been so properly pursued by the Court below, in the instance at that moment under their lordships' consideration? It was to be borne in mind, as Justice Maule had said, that in meeting out its quantity of punishment, the Court took other matters into consideration, and these must be a good count on the record to support it. But the amount of punishment could not be interfered with by the Court above. Under all the circumstances of the case, he (Lord Brougham) said that upon the great merits and substance of the case the Judges had no doubt—that a great offence had been perpetrated, punishable by law—the Judges had no doubt that the counts so finding the crime had been found correct—that on these leading points the essence of the case, the Judges had a clear unanimous opinion. But there happened with two of the Judges to be a doubt whether there was not a more technical deficiency in a portion of the indictment on which these crimes were proved. The result of the whole of the argument was that seven out of nine of the Judges declared that there was really nothing in these supposed technical deficiencies, and that the judgment, if brought before them in their own courts, they should not feel themselves called upon to interfere with. Seeing that there was a very great majority one way and a very small minority the other—that amongst the seven there was a perfect unanimity of opinion—and between the two great dubiety and hesitation—that even Mr. Baron Parke's doubt did not appear completely clear, even to his own mind—he (Lord B) could have little anxiety indeed in forming his opinion upon the case. He had but one course to take on a question so preponderant, and that was to go by the weight of authority—by the opinions of the majority of those Judges whom they had called in as their helpmates. He wished, however, to say one word as to the right of challenge to the array. The jury had jurisdiction in a case by reason of being selected according to a certain recognized rule. The question, then, was—were they so selected by that rule as to be duly invested with the attributes assigned to them under it? Now, there was no authority, or decision, or enactment, brought forward to prove that there was any ground of challenge validly raised, and this was the very consideration under the demurrer. His opinion most decidedly was, that the decision of the learned Judges upon this point was the only one that could be correctly arrived at. If the objection were good for many names having been omitted, it would be good for one, and it would be going a great way to say that on such a ground the jury was improperly empanelled. On that point, therefore, as on the remaining points, he agreed with the majority of the learned Judges.

Lord Denman next rose, and first addressed himself to the challenge on the array of the jury. He regarded this as a most important part of the question as affecting the privilege of trial by jury, which, without that also of challenge to the array, would be worse than a mockery. To the challenge the Attorney-General had demurred, but he (Lord Denman) was of opinion that the challenge ought to have been allowed. One of the learned Judges of Dublin was of the same opinion, but had been overruled by his brethren. He (Lord Denman) had felt that this matter was one of so much importance, that he had written to his brother Coleridge on the subject, who, although confined to his room by illness, had written to him his opinion on the question, which was that a great injury had been done by the fraudulent list—that the only question was, whether the challenge to the array was the proper remedy, and that it would have been much better that the trial should not have taken place with such a jury. The noble and learned lord then proceeded to state what was the ordinary course in making out the jury list and jury book, and said that the ministerial act of preparing the jury book was improperly performed; the judicial act was correctly performed, but the ministerial act having been improperly performed, the book was no book at all. It was admitted that there might be the greatest wrong and injury done by such omission of names as had taken place, but then it was said that the party was not without his remedy. But he (Lord Denman) asked where was that remedy—what was that remedy? To that question he received no answer, and he therefore said there was no remedy but that of challenge, which ought to have been allowed, and that the trial ought not to have proceeded until that challenge had been allowed. It had been said that an application might have been made to the Court. What! were people who were to be tried for their lives to rest upon a mere application to the discretion of the Court, made upon affidavit? He differed from the opinion that there were only two counts to which there were objections; he thought there were other counts which were open to very serious objections. In the case put in the 11th question there were three counts involved; the verdict was given upon each of those three counts; there must have been evidence given on each of those counts, and the Judge had proceeded to say, "For the said offence for which he stands convicted I sentence him to a certain discretionary punishment." Now it was said that they must assume that judgment was pronounced upon the good counts only; but that was a most dangerous doctrine, because it was notorious that the contrary was the fact. In a case of this kind they should not, sitting in a Court of Error, be led entirely by authorities; but they should look to their own consciences. What had taken place little more than twelve months ago, in a no less important subject than that of marriage? There had been one universal opinion at the English bar on that subject, founded on the dicta of some of the most distinguished Judges who had ever sat on the judicial bench of this country, namely, Lord Mansfield, Lord Ellenborough, and Lord Kenyon, who had all solemnly taken the same view on the subject. Lord Stowell also, half a century of whose valuable life had been devoted to the study of the profession, had come to the same decision. The present Judges of England, however, on consideration of the subject, had come to the conclusion that those distinguished Judges had come to a wrong decision. There was a great deal of law taken for granted, which, when it came to be examined, was found to be no law at all; and such he believed to be the dictum which had been relied upon in the present case. He was of opinion that many of his learned brethren had mistaken the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench with regard to pronouncing judgment upon indictments containing good and bad counts. The noble and learned lord, after replying to some of the arguments of his noble and learned friends, founded on the cases they had cited, said it was his practice, and the practice of several other learned Judges, to see that no judgment was ever entered up for the Crown upon a bad count. It had been correctly said that the principle upon which alone they could rely was, that nothing short of a conviction that what had been done below had been improperly done should induce them to reverse the judgment which had been passed. He had the greatest respect for the learned Judge who had passed this judgment, and, if possible, still more for those learned persons with whom he was in the habit of daily acting; but acting as a Judge himself, and feeling bound to act upon the reasons brought before him, he thought it reasonable to support the opinion that the judgment was not good in point of law, and that it was his duty to vote against the motion made by the noble and learned baron, that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

Lord Cottenham said it required a very great deal of consideration before he could come to the conclusion which he had done, but he felt it his bounden duty to declare that the opinion expressed by the majority of the Judges was wrong, and the opinion of the minority of that learned body the true and correct one. Those eminent and learned men were asked for their opinions, and every legitimate weight ought to be given to them; but they were not to guide the house; they were not to rule, but only to assist their lordships in the decision which, as a Court of Error, they were required to come to. If the opinion of the Court below was wrong, then there was no remedy for a wrong of the most monstrous character. That so great a wrong should have no redress he (Lord Cottenham) could never agree to. The chief question their lordships had to consider was, whether there was error on the record. That told them that the Court below had awarded punishment on all the counts, and how therefore could their lordships say that there was no error on that record, seeing that the Judges themselves had declared some of those counts to be bad? It was not competent to their lordships to raise the presumption that the Judges of the Court below had awarded punishment on the good counts alone. It would be a presumption of fact not capable of being upheld, and most dangerous in its constitutional results. In his (Lord Cottenham's) opinion, therefore, the Court below must be held to have been in the wrong. Suppose a person indicted for a libel, some of the counts charging an ordinary libel—others one of a malignant character—that the first counts were held to be good and the latter ones to be defective, was the party so prosecuted to be punished for a libel of a malignant character? Such, however, would be the result, if the principle on which the proceedings in the Courts below were governed was to be held as a sound and correct one. After going through all the various cases and authorities, and commenting upon them seriously, the noble and learned lord proceeded to say, that it appeared to him that a Court of Error had no power of judging the punishment—of separating that which was given on good counts, and that which was withheld on bad ones, and therefore great injustice must accrue if the rule followed by the Court below were allowed to prevail. It was, in effect, to deprive the party charged of the benefit of a Writ of Error. The rule contravened for by the defendants was correct in principle, and founded on the best practice of the Courts; and on these grounds it was that he differed from the opinion expressed by the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and should feel himself called upon not to give his support to the decision of the Court below.

Lord Campbell then proceeded to give his judgment. The noble and learned lord stated his opinion that the indictment contained some good counts, that the plea in abatement was bad, and the continuance of the trial legal. He then addressed himself on the question of the challenge to the array. The parties ought not to have been tried by a jury struck from the defective list, but, on the challenge, the panel ought to have been quashed. He considered, however, that he should not have been induced to advise their lordships to reverse the judgment merely upon this ground upon his own side opinion; but since writing his judgment, he has listened to the arguments of his noble and learned friend the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, and also those of Mr. Justice Colman. With those arguments he concurred. It was said that this indictment ought to be supported on the ground of expediency. He could not see what inconvenience could possibly arise from taking a verdict upon each count, and passing sentence only upon those counts which were good. He understood that Mr. Baron Rolfe had passed sentence in an indictment for murder in which one count was bad, but in such a case no practical difficulty would arise, as where one felony was proved it was sufficient to support a verdict of guilty, and it could never be worth the while of a person convicted of felony on one good count to sue out a writ of error. But in cases of misdemeanours it was very different, for, according to the present law, a man drawing an indictment, a pleader having drawn one good count, might go on drawing other counts, each increasing in vagueness and ambiguity, until he involved the party indicted in such perplexity, that there would be the greatest difficulty in ascertaining of what he was accused. There could be no difficulty in taking a verdict of acquittal, or entering a noli prosequi on the counts that were bad, and passing judgment only on those that were good. He need not remind their lordships that they were not bound by the opinion of the majority of the Judges whom they thought fit to consult, although entitled to the highest possible respect. The appeal was not from the Irish Judges to the English Judges, but to that chamber of the Imperial Parliament, which, he hoped, would long continue satisfactorily to administer justice in the last resort to all the inhabitants of the United Kingdom. Under all the circumstances, he thought that the judgment could not be sustained. The noble and learned lord concurred by moving that the judgment be reversed.

The Lord Chancellor then put the question thus—Is it your lordships' pleasure that the judgment be reversed? Lords Denham, Cottenham, and Campbell said "Content." Lord Brougham and two or three other peers (by leads) said "Not content." The Lord Chancellor was about to put the question again, in the usual form, previous to taking the numbers, or dividing, when—

Lord Wharfedale rose, but on the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor, he sat down, put on his hat, and addressed the house from his seat. He said that he did not think it desirable that their lordships should divide, as there was a majority of the law lords in the house in favour of the appeal. He humbly recommended those of their lordships who were not law lords—and who, not having heard the whole case, were not so well qualified to judge of the question—to abstain from voting.

Lord Brougham entirely concurred in the opinion of the majority of the Judges in Ireland and England. But he also agreed with the noble lord who had just spoken, that it was more advisable that those of their lordships who had not heard the case should not vote.

After a slight discussion, the whole of the lay peers, between 25 and 30 in number, withdrew.

The question was again put, and Lords Cottenham, Denham, and Campbell having voted for the reversal of the judgment, and Lord Brougham against it.

The Lord Chancellor said—My Lords, THE JUDGMENT IS REVERSED.

The announcement was received outside the house with cheering by a crowd of persons, who appeared in a state of the greatest excitement.

A number of flags and placards were despatched by Wednesday night's mail for immediate public distribution on the arrival thereof, in and about Dublin, announcing, in very conspicuous type, that the "House of Lords had reversed the judgment of the Court below," that "justice had triumphed over law," and that "O'Connell was free." The several agents for the travellers who left London on Wednesday night to congratulate their clients upon a decision which was, even to them, in a great degree unexpected, but which, must be some time known before it can be carried into effect, as a communication stating the reversal of the judgment must first be made by the Clerk of the Parliaments to the Queen's Bench in Ireland, giving rise to subsequent proceedings in that Court next term, unless the prisoners in the mean time cause themselves to be brought before the Lord Chancellor by habeas corpus, and show cause why they should be no longer detained in custody. According to another report the order for the discharge of Mr. O'Connell was despatched from the Home Office, at seven o'clock on Wednesday evening, to Dublin.

GRATY V. THE QUEEN.—The Judges also delivered their opinions in the case of "Graty v. the Queen," which was a question whether a prisoner had a right of peremptory challenge on trial in Ireland for shooting with intent to murder, a newly-created felony under a recent statute. Mr. Justice Wigham, Mr. Justice Cottenham, Mr. Justice Williams, Mr. Baron Gurney, Mr. Justice Patteson, Lord Chief Baron Pollock, and Lord Chief Justice Tindal were of opinion that the challenge ought to have been allowed in the Court below; Mr. Baron Parks was of a different opinion, considering that, in the present state of the law of felony, the right claimed by the plaintiff in error did not exist in such a case, or in non-capital felonies. The further consideration of this case was postponed to the same day as the other, when the House reversed the judgment of the Court below, and awarded a reversal de novo.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

Our accounts from France this week do not bring any news of essential importance, but they are, nevertheless, interesting. In part of our impression last week we published the official despatches of the Prince de Joinville, describing the attack upon Mogadore. A few particulars of interest have since appeared. We translate the following from the Debat:—

"The Prince de Joinville having ordered into the harbour the Pluton, Gaillard, and Phare steamers, on board of which were detachments of troops and sailors, these vessels passed between the brig, and landed their men, under the command of Captain Dugué, who in an instant effected the shore, and carried the battery erected in the centre of the island. The conflict then became violent on the island, where 400 soldiers of the Emperor, posted behind walls and rocks, kept up a very brisk fire. Finally, after a warm struggle of upwards of an hour, supported by our soldiers and sailors against an enemy well posted and animated with the courage of despair, all flight being impossible, the Prince gained possession of the entire island, with the sole exception of a mosque, into which the surviving Moors had retired. The latter, however, ultimately capitulated, and the tri-coloured flag was hoisted on every point of the island, which is the real key of the town and harbour of Mogadore. The dead bodies of 182 Moors were thrown into the sea, 80 others wounded were conveyed on board the fleet in order to receive surgical assistance, and 136 prisoners were picked up on the island."

"On our side we had killed, one of whom an officer, M. Fottier, and 38 wounded. The ships of the line and the other vessels of the squadron sustained a loss of four sailors killed, and 38 wounded, by the fire of the batteries. The Jenappe in particular, being opposed to a battery of 40 guns, ultimately silenced it, but suffered a greater loss and damage than any other vessel."

"During the night the English Consul, whom the British frigate Wasp, anchored near the island, had vainly claimed during five days from the Moorish authorities, was required, with several other English, in the boats of the Cassard. The Prince, after having paid them the most polite attention, gave orders to the Rahis to carry them on board the Wasp, which greeted her with her band playing the national air of France. The captain of the English frigate immediately afterwards returned most grateful thanks to the prince."

"According to a letter from Gibraltar of the 24th ult., the number of killed and wounded on the side of the French at this attack upon Mogadore was eight of the former and eighteen of the latter; the killed on board the ships four, wounded twelve. A force landed on the 16th to attack the town met with no resistance, the place having been totally abandoned. Of 199 guns of all kinds found there, 12 only of bronze were taken away, the rest having been disabled."

"Some of the Paris papers assert to believe that this attack upon Mogadore will settle the dispute, and that the Emperor of Morocco will accede to the demands of France. According to the Revue de Paris, the Ministry had as yet received no official knowledge of the intentions of the Emperor of Morocco; but the reports and indirect accounts which reached from all quarters, induced the belief that peace was at hand, and that Abderrahmân was disposed to grant to France full satisfaction. A private letter from Oran, however, takes a different view of the aspect of affairs. It says, 'The Emperor, notwithstanding the defeat of his son, is determined not to submit to the demands of France—emissaries have been sent in all directions to preach the holy war and to raise men. The Emperor attributes the loss of the action of the 14th to the orders of his son not being obeyed by one of his generals, who has been arrested, and in all probability will be sacrificed. The army of Morocco is more imposing than is generally suspected—and Marshal Bugeaud is in a position to advance far across the territory.'"

"The Sicile states, that an imposing ceremony took place on Monday at the Hotel des Invalides, where the colours captured at Mogadore were deposited. A considerable multitude were present at the military solemnity."

"The Moniteur Parisien announces that copies of the letters exchanged between the son of the Emperor of Morocco and his father, together with a diplomatic correspondence, were found in the Moorish camp. They were inclosed in two chests. A large convey of gunpowder had likewise been intercepted by the French."

No official statement is given in the Paris papers on the subject of the correspondence which has taken place between England and France upon the subject of Tahiti; but it was believed, in the best-informed quarters in Paris, that the matter was in a satisfactory train for amicable adjustment. A sort of compromise, it is believed, will take place; and M. d'Aubigny, although not dismissed the service, was to be recalled, and compensation will, it is said, be made to Mr. Pritchard for the ill treatment he received."

"The Moniteur publishes a royal ordinance, issued on the report of Marshal Soult, instituting a committee to proceed forthwith with the revision of the ordinances for the organisation and internal regulation of the Polytechnic School. The committee is to meet under the presidency of General Dode de la Brunerie."

SPAIN.

We learn from Madrid that the dispute between Spain and Morocco has been arranged to the satisfaction of both countries."

Letters from Cadix mention that the Prince de Joinville had sailed from before Mogadore, and that he was expected with his squadron at Cadix on the 24th ult. The Phare steamer arrived there on the 22nd, with 200 Moorish prisoners taken at Mogadore; and on the 21st, another steamer left Cadix, towing out five merchantmen freighted by the French Consul to carry provisions to the garrison of the island of Mogadore. Mr. Bulwer, our Ambassador in Spain, arrived at Cartagena in the Syd-nam on the 19th, and embarked on the following day for Malaga."

It was generally believed at Madrid, that General Narvaez was disposed to accept the embassy to Paris, and that M. Martinez de la Rosa was to be appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs. Arrests still continued. On the evening of the 27th ult., the editor of the Reprochador was apprehended, as he was leaving the printing-office, and this summary proceeding of the police was followed almost immediately by an order of the Political Chief suspending the publication of that journal."

BELGIUM AND PRUSSIA.

The Belgian papers announce that the commercial arrangements between Prussia and Belgium are terminated. A treaty of navigation and commerce was signed upon Sunday last, by the plenipotentiaries of the Kings of Prussia and Belgium. The treaty will be ratified within six weeks. It stipulates, we understand, the mutual exemption of port charges and duties upon vessels and cargoes going from a port of one country into one of the other. The concessions made by the Zollverein principally relate to the duties on iron, which will be reduced 50 per cent. A similar reduction is to be also carried into effect with respect to wool. Among the concessions made by Belgium are the re-establishment of the terms which German wines and silk goods formerly enjoyed, and the abolition of the duties forbidding the export of bark."

PORTUGAL.

The advices from Lisbon to the 27th ult. represent the city as still in an excited state. From the late despatches, it appears that there is strong intrigue against Cabel, at the head of which is Silva Carvalho, who is warmly backed by the Duke of Palmella, Viscount da Bandeira, and in fact nearly all the peers. Two protests have been presented to her Majesty against the despatches; one of which is from the Marquis of Nisa, and the other from the Tribunal of Commerce in Lisbon. It appears that when the Queen asked the Duke of Palmella his opinion of the first despatch, which has created so much anxiety, the duke replied in words to this effect: "If your Majesty will allow me, I will relate a story. I was at Paris during the disturbances that took place on the occasion of the death of Gen. Lamourgue, and feeling it my duty to wait on King Louis Philippe, in return for the attention with which that monarch had been pleased to honour me, I did so; and, contrary to my expectation, found his Majesty with a very tranquil and cheerful countenance. On noticing this to him, his Majesty was pleased to reply in the following words:—'When a King obeys the law, and complies with the constitution, whatever may happen, he will have nothing to fear. I regret that tranquillity is disturbed, but I am not to blame for it; and if you see me calm and satisfied, it is because my conscience is at ease.' It appears that when the duke had related this anecdote, the King, looking rather displeased, said to him, 'And do not we comply with the constitution?' To which the duke rejoined, 'I did not say so, sir; I only related an occurrence which I witnessed in Paris.' The Queen then turned again to the duke, and said, 'But what do you think of the despatch?' 'Madame,' he replied, 'I will deliberate upon this matter, and will soon give my opinion with all the respect which I have ever paid to your Majesty's person as well as to the liberties of my country.' On the very next day, the duke sent in his protest to the Minister of the Interior. Cabel, it appears, is by no means inclined to recede; on the contrary, he is about to swamp the Council of State, and create a Ministerial majority there by force of new creations. The names of Baron Tejal, Gomes de Castro, Viscount de Laborim, and the Marquis of Fronteira, have been mentioned as the new councillors. In the mean time, the Government is relentless in prosecuting the press."

The new Spanish Envoy, M. Gonzalez Bravo, has presented his credentials to the Queen, who received him in great state, and came to town for the occasion. Report mentions an important incident connected with M. Bravo's reception—that Ministers having, as it is asserted, told her Majesty in a private audience that he was authorized by his own Sovereign to assure her that she might command the assistance of a corps of 10,000 Spanish troops for the defence of her throne and government at any time when required."

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have received Graham Town papers to the 25th of June. Their contents are not of much interest. Some attention had been directed to a minute published by Governor Maitland, on the subject of immigration into the colony. He proposes to apply a portion of the surplus revenue to the formation of a bounty fund. Any person proposing to introduce immigrants, may, under certain conditions, receive a bounty order upon a graduated scale, corresponding to the quality of the labour proposed to be thus remunerated."

The Cape Town papers contain the stipulations of several treaties with the neighbouring native tribes, which seem mutually satisfactory. The exports of the colony appear to be steadily increasing, particularly as respects wine, wool, and dried fish."

The Cape Frontier Times mentions that the depredations of the Kaffirs still continue; but that, from the activity of the police, much of the cattle stolen is recovered."

MEXICO.

A private letter from Mexico, dated the 6th of July last, states that a widely-extended conspiracy had been discovered by Government, the object of which is to change the federative republic into a constitutional government, with a European prince of royal blood at its head, with the title of "Emperor." It was, however, the opinion of well-informed persons that, on the eve of a war with Texas, the executive power will not proceed to rigorous measures against the conspirators, amongst whom there is said to figure more than one general officer, but they will undoubtedly be strictly watched."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The House of Lords met again on Thursday morning, and after judgment had been pronounced in some appeals, the Royal Assent by commission was given to the Irish Fisheries Bill, several bills for regulating Joint Stock Companies, the Art Union Bill, and one or two private bills."

The Lords Commissioners were—The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Delaware, Lord Wharfedale, the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Earl of Dalhousie."

The Lord Chancellor then read the following gracious Speech from the Queen:—

"We are commanded by her Majesty, in moving you from farther attendance in Parliament, to express to you the warm acknowledgments of her Majesty for the zeal and assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the discharge of your public duties during a laborious and protracted session. The result has been the completion of many legislative measures calculated to improve the administration of the law, and to promote the public welfare."

"Her Majesty has given her cordial assent to the bill which you presented to her Majesty for regulating the issue of bank notes, and for conferring certain privileges upon the Bank of England for a limited period."

"Her Majesty trusts that these measures will tend to place the pecuniary transactions of the country upon a sounder basis, without imposing any inconvenient restrictions on commercial credit or enterprise."

"We are directed to inform you that her Majesty continues to receive from her allies, and from all foreign powers, assurances of their friendly disposition."

"Her Majesty has recently been engaged in discussions with the Government of the King of the French on events calculated to interrupt the good understanding and friendly relations between this country and France."

"You will rejoice to learn that by the spirit of justice and moderation which has animated the two governments, this danger has been happily averted."

"We are commanded by her Majesty to thank you for the readiness with which you voted the supplies for the service of the year."

"Her Majesty has observed, with the utmost satisfaction, that by the course to which you have steadily adhered in maintaining inviolate the public faith, and inspiring a just confidence in the stability of the national resources, you have been enabled to make a considerable reduction in the annual charge on account of the interest of the national debt."

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty desires us to congratulate you on the improvement which has taken place in the condition of our manufactures and commerce, and on the prospect that, through the bounty of Divine Providence, we shall enjoy the blessing of an abundant harvest."

"Her Majesty rejoices in the belief that, on your return to your several districts, you will find generally prevailing throughout the country a spirit of loyalty and cheerful obedience to the law."

"Her Majesty is confident that these dispositions, so important to the peaceful development of our resources and to our national strength, will be confirmed and encouraged by your presence and example."

"We are commanded by her Majesty to assure you, that when you shall be called upon to resume the discharge of your parliamentary functions, you may place entire reliance on the cordial co-operation of her Majesty in your endeavours to improve the social condition, and to promote the happiness and contentment of her people."

The Royal Commission for proroguing Parliament was then read, after which the Lord Chancellor declared it to be prorogued until Thursday, the 16th of October next."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House of Commons met again on Thursday, at twelve o'clock, and the attendance of members was very considerable."

The Treasury bench was occupied by the Ministers."

Mr. BARNOW, the newly-elected member for Dudley, took the oath and his seat."

Mr. HOPE moved for a new writ for North Lancashire, in room of Lord Stanley, who had accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds."

Lord JAMNEN communicated her Majesty's most gracious answer to the address of the House on the auspicious birth of another Prince. Her Majesty thanked her faithful Commons for their loyal and affectionate attachment."

Mr. DUNCOMBE gave notice that early next session he would call attention to the unsatisfactory and evasive character of the report of the Secret Committee of the Post-office."

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—Mr. C. NAPEL put some questions to Sir R. Peel in reference to the events at Tahiti, and the armament of France against Morocco.—Sir R. PEEL, in answer, said it would be satisfactory to the house to learn that the proceedings which had been going on on the coast of Morocco, would not lead to any occupation of that part of the world to give the slightest uneasiness. All the promises made by France with respect to Morocco had been fulfilled, and he was satisfied would continue to be fulfilled. With respect to the question of Tahiti, he begged to say that discussions had taken place between her Majesty's Government and the kingdom of France, with regard to the events that had taken place there, and that they had ended in such a way as was calculated to continue the most friendly feelings between the two countries. (Hear, hear.) He had the high satisfaction of saying that those discussions had ended in the most amicable and satisfactory manner that could be desired. That which had occurred between the two countries would, of course, at a future period, be fully communicated to the house and the country. He trusted, however, he should not be pressed further on the subject at that time. (Hear, hear.) He would add, that in every thing which had taken place on this Tahiti affair, the honour and interests of England had been most scrupulously regarded. (Ministerial cheers.)—Mr. HENSLY wished to ask the opinion of the right hon. gentleman (Sir R. Peel), as to the proceedings of the French towards Mr. Pritchard.—Sir R. PEEL, said he had already stated that what had happened in Tahiti had been brought to an amicable conclusion, and this with the most scrupulous regard, during negotiations, to the honour and character of this country. Both countries have been actuated by the most honourable intentions, and the result, as might be expected, was the satisfactory one which he had already communicated to the house."

THE O'CONNELL CASE.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE called attention to the judgment in this case, and moved for a copy of the opinions of the judges as well as the judgment itself.—Sir R. PEEL said he had no objection to the motion, and when the proper time came, he should be prepared to vindicate the course taken by her Majesty's Government in the proceedings referred to.—Lord J. RUSSELL repeated his former opinion, that Mr. O'Connell had not had a fair trial—that, in short, he was tried by a jury elaborately put together for the purpose of conviction. (Hear.)

Sir T. WILDE rose to address the house, but while he was speaking he was interrupted by Sir Augustus Clifford desiring the attendance of the Commons in the House of Lords to hear her most gracious Majesty's speech.—After the speech was read to the Commons they returned to the house, and Mr. Speaker read the speech at the table, after which the right hon. gentleman received the congratulations of the hon. members, and the session was ended."

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Lord Chancellor has recently presented the Rev. H. Howell, of Taunton, with the valuable rectories of Llanymarch and Penrith, Pembrokeshire."

His Grace the Archbishop of York and the Lord Bishop of Ripon have appointed John Chubb Ford, Esq., of Queen's College, Cambridge, to the head mastership of the York and Ripon Diocesan Training School."

The Bishop of London, who is on a visit to his brother, preached on Sunday morning in the cathedral church of the diocese of Chester."

A new parish church is to be erected in Bedford on a scale of great magnificence. In consequence of the dilapidated and ruinous condition of St. Catherine's, an order to pull it down has been issued by the diocesan."

The Queen Dowager has transmitted, through the Rev. Mr. Burdett, a liberal donation towards completing the re-building of the church at Twickenham, near Northampton, in North Devon."

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The attendance at the weekly meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday was by no means numerous. The chairman was Mr. J. O'Hay, a barrister, who entered into a long argument upon the subject of the State Trials, with a view to prove that, let the House of Lords decide as it might, it would prove nothing as to the fairness or the unfairness of the trial. He spoke, in the first instance, of the "high position of the Association, not only in this country, but throughout the entire world, and of the influence which it exercises over the great majority of the Irish people—and of his own humble pretensions to preside in such an assembly;" he then proceeded to discuss the present prospects and situation of the Repeal cause, and drew the most favourable conclusions from the "war with France," which he now looked upon as inevitable. The "Tangiers pepper," he argued, "could not fail to season some agreeable condiment for Ireland." (Cheers and laughter.) War, he admitted, was the bane of the human race—the curse of the world; and it might seem strange that it should be associated in the Irish mind with the idea of some coming good; but it was owing to this that England never did justice to Ireland, except under the pressure of difficulties and the exigency of circumstances which made the support of Ireland necessary to her.—After several subscriptions towards the rent had been acknowledged, Mr. Dillon Browne, M.P., read a letter from Mr. W. S. O'Brien, addressed to Mr. O'Connell, to which he called the most grave attention of the meeting. The purport of this manifesto was to call upon electors to attend to their electoral qualifications, and Repealers of all ranks to be sure to register their votes. Mr. Browne, having read this epistle, said he felt himself constrained to take a voyage in the Mediterranean—(hear, hear!)—and began a long address upon foreign affairs, with a view to prove that the hour of England's weakness, which was of course that of Ireland's strength, had arrived. Thus, he said, was the hour for the people of Ireland to rally round the flag of national independence—this was the hour for them in which to achieve it. (Hear, hear.) He said the Irish were now sufficiently instructed for liberty, they were the best morally instructed people, and had the most enlightened priesthood in the world. He then spoke of the Queen's reported visit. The Irish were loyal in their hearts, but they would care not to make any vulgar demonstrations on the subject. Ireland was now the seat of mourning, for O'Connell was imprisoned. (Hear, hear.) Should her Majesty visit the country, she should have some of the misery and wretchedness which exists in it pointed out to her, and then she should be asked by her Ministers if such a people, so blessed by Providence, and yet so distressed, should be driven to despair? (Hear.) A young candidate for the priesthood, lately returned from a foreign university, assured the meeting, on the authority of a letter he had received from Rome, that his Holiness took the greatest interest in Irish affairs, and had given orders to every bishop in Italy to offer up prayers for O'Connell and the other martyrs. (Hear, hear.) Mr. D. O'Connell then read the weekly prison report. The health and the spirits were as usual—unabated. (Hear.) His father recommended the people to be very indifferent with regard to the judgment of the House of Lords. The questions put to the Judges were so framed as to prevent any opinion being given by them as to the real merits of the case. There was nothing favourable to be expected from them. (Hear.) The people should receive the announcement shortly to be made to them, in quiet and tranquillity. The rent was announced to be 47s.

DECLARATION AGAINST REPEAL.—We understand that the declarations against the repeal of the union, which have been most numerous signed in Limerick and the surrounding district, will be presented in a few days by a deputation to the Lord Lieutenant, Lord Heytesbury, in order that his Excellency may place it before her Majesty the Queen."

DEATH OF THE DEAN OF KILLALEA.—The Hon. and Rev. Dr. George O'Connell, Dean of Killalea, died at Banford, last week."

THE HARVEST IN IRELAND.—The splendid autumn weather with which we are now blessed will crown the labours of the husbandman. In most of the Irish counties the corn harvest is now nearly completed. The wheat crop has turned out even more abundant than had been expected. The only crop reported short is oats, which, it is said, do not yield well in threshing; but, judging by all the accounts, even this crop will be pretty good. Green crops are in the most promising state. The markets are, as a matter of course, going down."

ACCIDENT AT DUNHAM TO AN ACTOR.—A shocking accident happened at the Durham Theatre (Norfolk), on Wednesday week, to Mr. Dillon, one of the performers. He had just completed his dress for the character he had to represent, and was preparing to leave the dressing-room, when he approached too near a lighted candle, and was instantly enveloped in flames. He rushed towards the stage, and was observed by some of the audience, who went forward and endeavoured, by pressing upon him and covering him with such things as were at hand, to extinguish the flames, in which they did not succeed until he was so severely burnt that he now lies in a very precarious state."

INCENDIARY FIRES.—We are sorry to record more incendiary fires. On Thursday week, about eight, a fire broke out in the stock-yard of Mr. Woodford, of Harrington (about eight miles from Cambridge, and near the seat of the Earl of Harwicke, the Lord Lieutenant of the county). Three stacks were soon in flames, viz., a peat stack, an oat stack, and a hay stack; and from the carelessness used the fire was confined to them. The farm is the property of Trinity College, and the loss of Mr. Woodford is about £100.—A few nights ago some villains set fire to a quantity of wheat in stock, in a field in the occupation of Mr. Thomas Walton, of Pillerton Priory, near Kington, Warwickshire.—There has also been an incendiary fire at Stratford-sub-Castle, Whitehire. The property destroyed consisted of haystacks of about 25 tons or 30 tons each, and a rich straw containing about 30 loads, the property of Mr. Walters, senior, of Stratford-sub-Castle, who farms a vast extent of land. This gentleman is the father of the Mr. Walters who some months ago was shot at in the dead of the night by some miscreant, when a ball passed through that gentleman's hat without injuring his person. Therick-yard is situated at the bottom of a hill, to the right leading from Stratford to Dunford, in which there were some 11 or 12 racks."

CULINARY LEGENDS.

On Thursday week, a party of Culinary Artists met in the hotel of Signor Dotekio, at Slough. The object of this meeting was, that six of them should each produce a New Dish. Amongst the number present were her Majesty's two principal chefs de cuisine, the Dowager Baroness Rothschild's, and the head cook belonging to that establishment, with two others. The table was laid for twelve—six competitors, and six to judge the result of this beneficial public innovation. The challenge was, that he who produced the newest, lightest, and most delicate dish, was to be presented with a piece of plate; the judges not to know the authors of the respective dishes until after the degustation and decision. After an excellent course of soup and fish, five dishes were placed upon the table, and four of them met with the greatest approbation from the seven jury; but a general clamour was made for the sixth, when in walked the worthy host, with an elegant dish, labelled "La Grossetade Spilke en surprise à la Cerito," and upon the lid being removed by the chairman, to the astonishment of every one present, out flew a beautiful pigeon, which immediately found its way to the table, and took its departure (or London); the party, however astonished, were not disappointed; for, upon removing a false bottom, an ample supply of Sole de Filets de Grouse à la Bohémienne was discovered; and beneath that some artificial castles and mountains were sweetly resting on a crème aux pêches. The author of this curious dish made a wagger, a few days previous that he would send part of a dish, of his own composition, from Slough to London, in a manner which for speed should only be exceeded by the Electric Telegraph; consequently, at the moment the dish was placed upon the table, it was announced by telegraph to the parties in London; and in fourteen minutes afterwards they received the principal part of this atmospheric dish at the spot appointed by the author, with a paper under its wing, upon which was written, "Please to pay the chef de cuisine of the Repeal Club the sum of £50, for my private apartment in his new seat, and make the cheque payable to A. Sayer." We are informed that a meeting of this description will take place in the Slough Hotel every two months, and each competitor is to invent two New Dishes at least; prizes will be given accordingly; and a pamphlet will be published at the commencement of next season, under the title of "Gastronomique Innovation."

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

The picturesque beauty of the Isle of Wight (an uncommon attraction in sea-girt scenery) would always have insured this highly-favoured spot the preference of thousands who annually pour out of London for health or recreation. This popularity has, however, been greatly increased by the completion of the railway from the Great Metropolis to Southampton, to Gosport; and by the knowledge that her most gracious Majesty has selected "the Island" as a place of summer residence. The present may, therefore, be a fit opportunity for introducing to our readers an accurate map of this beautiful island, executed by Mr. Palmer's patent Glyphographic process, and showing the several towns, villages, hamlets, and domains, with a distinctness unattainable by any other means of illustration in our journal. We shall presently detail Mr. Palmer's process.

The extent of the island is thus given in Mr. Barber's "Picturesque Illustrations," of which a beautiful edition has just been issued, "with every alteration and improvement necessary to render it applicable to the present time."

"The Isle of Wight is situated in the English Channel, at a short distance from the mainland of Hampshire, of which county it has commonly been reckoned a part. The channel which divides it from the grand line of our southern coast, varies in width from two to six miles, and bears the appellation of the Solent Sea. The form of the island is irregular, but bears a rude resemblance to that of the heraldic lozenge. In circumference, this far-famed and delightful may be about seventy-five miles; less, certainly, rather than more. Its extreme length, from east to west (or, from the Foreland to the Needles) is about twenty-three miles; its greatest breadth, from north to south (or from the town of Cowes to St. Catherine's Point), rather exceeds thirteen miles. Its superficial contents are estimated at 105,000 acres, of which 75,000 may be reckoned as under tillage, 20,000 as devoted to pasture, and the remainder as waste land."

One of the "lions" of the island is Norris Castle at East Cowes, a most conspicuous feature in the coast view of this part, and may be approached either by the high road, or by a walk along the shore. The architect of this imposing specimen of the castellated style was Sir J. Wyatt, then Mr. Wyatt, who erected it for the late Lord Henry Seymour, who took much pride in it, and received much pleasure from the visits of strangers to his domain. "The deception as to its apparent antiquity," says Mr. Barber, "is complete to those unacquainted with the details of an ancient English castle; and numbers who might first see Norris from the deck of a steam-boat, would be readily impressed with the idea that centuries had elapsed since the period of its erection. The stables, which are on a princely scale, the pier, bathing-house, and sea-walls, all erections of the late noble owner, merit at least passing attention from the visitor." The property was purchased, in 1839, by Robert Bell, Esq.

Osborne, as will be seen by the map, is situated at a short distance from Norris Castle. The park and grounds comprise upwards of 300 acres, sloping gently to the sea; they are well stocked with noble timber. The views from Osborne are extensive, commanding Portsmouth, Spithead, &c. The mansion possesses some historical interest, it having been in the occupation of Eustace Mann, Esq., during the civil wars between Charles I. and his Parliament.

It is at present understood that the Princess Royal, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Alice, and the infant Prince, will sojourn at Osborne, during the visit of her Majesty and Prince Albert to Scotland.

We cannot better conclude than by the annexed description of "A Voyage Round the Island," from Mr. Barber's elegant guide, which, we should mention, is illustrated with a map and several highly-finished views:—

"Proceeding eastward, Old Castle Point is first rounded as we leave the mouth of the Medina; and then appears that famous 'modern antique,' Norris Castle. Osborne House next meets the view: a finely-wooded coast intervenes, and we pass King's Quay, the entrance to the Wootton river, and perceive Fern Hill and Wootton Church in the distance. Quarr Wood will call up some reminiscences of those remains of the ancient abbey which it embosoms. Instead of those remains, the picturesque bathing-house and seat of John Fleming, Esq.,—Ryde House,—the villas of Earl Spencer and the Duke of Buckingham,—appear in succession: followed by Ryde itself, with its empor, terrace, chapels, cheerful white dwellings, &c. Woods now enrich the shore, with very little intermission, until we reach St. Helen's; permitting but a partial view of the seats called Appley, St. Clare, Sea Grove, and the Priory. Sea-View, otherwise styled Nettlesome, and the ci-devant St. Helen's Church, now a sea-mark, are noted prior to our crossing the mouth of Brading Haven; beyond which lies the fertile valley that extends from the town of Brading to Appuldurcombe; while the downs of Shanklin and Wroxall close the perspective. Passing a perilous reef of rocks, named the Bembridge Ledge, and rounding the Foreland Point, Culver Cliffs appear in their lofty whiteness, and are succeeded by Sandown Bay, and the celebrated Chine of Shanklin. Luccombe Chine comes next; and then the bold eminence of Durnose. East End follows; and we enter what is called the Race of Binchurh. All the beauties of the Under Cliff are now in prospect; and it must be sufficient to recite the names of Ventnor, Steephill, St. Lawrence, Old Park, Mirables, the Orchard, Packwater, the Sandrock Hotel, and Rocken End. The towering heights of St. Catherine's come next into view, with the gloomy features of Black-gang Chine. Chale and Brixton Bays are then traversed; affording glimpses, as we pass, of the villages of Brixton, Mottistone, and Brooke. Reaching Freshwater Bay, we are struck with the majestic altitude of the line of cliffs stretching before us; but we have so lately particularised all the features of this part of the coast, including the Needles Rocks, Scratchell's Bay, and Alum Bay, that further notice would involve an unnecessary recapitulation. Totland and Colwell Bays, and the point beyond which stands the lovely hamlet of Norton, are passed ere we re-view Yarmouth from the Solent, and notice its advantageous position, both as regards the island and the opposite coast. Little to interest now occurs, till the entrance to Newtown River, and Thorness Bay, afford prospects of some fine interior scenery, backed by the range of downs that stretches from Freshwater to Gatcombe. nard's Bay, Wood Vale, and Egypt House, are then the only objects that solicit attention, until we are once more called upon to admire the delightful situation of Cowes, and regain the point from which we started."

Mr. Palmer's process of Glyptography, or Engraved Drawing, may be thus briefly described:—

"The artist first spreads upon a blackened plate of metal a very thin layer of white composition; through this he makes the drawing required, either elaborately or otherwise; and from it is taken, by the electrolytic process, a perfect cast, which must, of necessity, when printed from, transfer to paper a fac-simile of the original drawing."

Such is the principle of Mr. Palmer's invention. The directions for artists will be found appended to a collection of exquisite specimens, published by the ingenious inventor. Mr. Palmer adds:—

"The ruling-machine, eccentric-chuck, and rose-engine work of all kinds, suitable for skies, backgrounds, the imitation of medallions in apparent relief, and chequered work, can be executed by this process for surface-printing."

"In this part of the process we have an incomparable advantage over the ordinary method of wood-engraving, namely, in being able to throw either a bold or delicate crossing over a machined sky, or background; and, if that do not produce the proper texture, or sufficient tone, a third or even fourth line can be introduced."

"In executing cross-hatching, lay down the broadest and boldest line first, and then cut a finer line across it. This instruction may appear simple and superfluous to some; but, if bold work be cut over light work, the force necessary to cut a bold line will close each end of every intersection of the fine line, and so give it altogether the appearance of a dotted line, instead of a light crossing."

"Even after it is electrolytically, parts may be a little darkened by the careful use of the burnisher; or still more by a small hammer, and a very thin piece of steel interposed (a small palette-knife, for instance), or the tones can be gradually lowered by a very careful re-biting."

MONUMENT TO THE LATE EARL OF DURHAM.

Within a month from the lamented death of the Right Hon. the Earl of Durham, on July 28, 1840, the inhabitants of Newcastle-upon-Tyne resolved to perpetuate the memory of the service, talents, and virtues of this distinguished nobleman, by the erection of a public monument, and a subscription was accordingly opened for that purpose. In January, 1842, the subscriptions amounted to the general company assembled were the Marquis of Normanby, and his brother, the Hon. Mr. Phipps; Sirville Ogle, Esq., M.P.; H. Mitcalfe, Esq., M.P.; J. T. Wain, Esq., M.P.; Thomas Fenwick, Esq.; H. Morton, Esq., &c.

The rites at the pavilion having been completed, the masonic procession was formed, and proceeded to the site of the stone.

As the body wound slowly round the base of the hill and up to the summit on the north side, says the Newcastle Chronicle, they were highly attractive: their banners, symbols, and insignia, flashing in the sunbeams, presented a richness of array which was truly imposing. When the head of the procession gained the brow of the hill, within a short distance of the foundation stone, the brethren halted, and divided to the right and left, facing inward, and forming a fine avenue for the approach of the Grand Master, the Earl of Zetland, who came up in his radiant costume, with great dignity, preceded by his regent banner, and the Grand Sword Bearer, and followed by the Ionic light, the deputy Grand Master, the Rev. H. Green, Grand Chaplain, and Grand officers, with plumb, line, &c. &c.

Three having taken their places close to the stone, they were followed by a number of gentlemen of the committee, &c., headed by H. J. Spearman, Esq., the chairman, and the ceremony was immediately commenced by the upper foundation stone being raised by the powerful mechanism fixed above it, and the Grand Master inspecting and adjusting the lower foundation stone in the usual manner. This being concluded, Mr. White, the Grand Secretary, read the following inscription, which had been tastefully engraved on a brass plate:—

This stone was laid by Thomas, Earl of Zetland,
Grand Master of the Free and Accepted Masons of England, assisted by
The Brethren of the Fraternity of Durham and Northumberland,
On the 25th August 1842,
Being the Foundation Stone of a Memorial to be erected
To the Memory of
JOHN GEORGE, EARL OF DURHAM, who,
After representing the County of Durham in Parliament
For fifteen years,
Was raised to the Peerage,
And subsequently held the offices of Lord Privy Seal, Ambassador Extraordinary, and Minister at the Court of St. Petersburg, and Governor-General of Canada.
He died on the 28th of July, 1840, in the 49th year of his age.
The Monument will be erected
By the private Subscriptions of his Fellow Countrymen, Admirers of his distinguished talents and Exemplary private virtues.
John and Benjamin Green, Architects.

The inscription having been placed on the lower stone, the Grand Treasurer advanced and deposited the plumb, containing the coins, &c., and the cement having been placed on the upper face of the bottom stone, the Grand Master adjusted the same with a beautiful silver trowel, which was subsequently presented to his lordship, for his kindness in assisting in the ceremony of the day. This trowel, manufactured by Messrs. Reid, of Newcastle, bears a suitable inscription, the names of the architects, and a view of the temple itself.

The cement being now adjusted, the upper stone was slowly lowered, and the band played "Rule Britannia."
The Grand Master next proved the just position and form of the stone by the plumb, level, and square, and then gave the stone three knocks with the mallet. His lordship next said, in an impressive manner:—"We have now laid this stone, and may the Great Creator of the universe, in His kind providence, enable us to carry on and complete what we have thus begun. May He guard this place, and the country, generally, and preserve it from ruin and decay to the latest posterity." Then taking the Cornucopia, containing the corn, and the ewer containing the wine and the oil, he said:—"I strew this corn as the symbol of plenty; I pour this wine as the symbol of cheerfulness; and I pour this oil as the symbol of comfort and consolation; and may the all-bounteous Author of Nature bless this place, and the country, with an abundance of corn, wine and oil, and all the necessities, comforts, and conveniences of life. May the same Almighty Being preserve its inhabitants in peace, unity, and brotherly love, towards which great objects, no one, during his earthly career, exerted himself more assiduously and more successfully than the nobleman whose memory we are met this day to celebrate."

The Grand Chaplain then offered up a solemn supplication; the Grand Master examined the plans of the memorial, and the ceremony being concluded, the band played "God save the Queen," and the procession again formed, and proceeded slowly down the hill, around the base, and into the pavilion, where the Grand Lodge was closed in due form, and the general company began to disperse.

It is well observed in the Sunderland Herald:—"The circumstance of this monument having been erected by private subscription is highly honourable. That no political animosity followed the Earl of Durham to the grave is plainly visible from the list of subscribers, which embraces men of all shades of opinion, and by the splendid gift of the stones by a nobleman (the Marquis of Londonderry) whose political sentiments were not in unison with those professed by the Earl of Durham, and also by the laying of the foundation stone by the honourable fraternity of Freemasons, whose tenets expressly prevent them from entertaining, as Masons, any political predilection or enmity."

It may be interesting to add that a portrait of the Earl of Zetland, robed as Grand Master, has been engraved in No. 186 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

In the evening there was a dinner in celebration of the event, at the Bridge Inn, in Sunderland, and another at the Wheatsheaf Inn, in Monkwearmouth, both of which were numerously attended.

Our illustrations represent, 1. the ceremony of laying the stone, from a sketch made on the spot. 2. The monument, completed. The design, by the Messrs. Green, is in the form of a Temple, of the Doric order, and the proportions are after the Temple of Theseus. The dimensions are, however, exactly double those of the Temple of Theseus, the columns of which are 3 ft. 3 in. in diameter, and those of the Durham Memorial are 6 ft. 6 in. The proportions are also thus larger than many other of the temples of antiquity, namely, than the Temple of Coruth, the columns of which are 3 ft. 10 in. in diameter; the Temple of Concord, at Agrigentum, the columns of which are 4 ft. 6 in.; the Parthenon, where the columns are 6 ft. 2 in.; the Temple of Minerva, at Susium, where they are 3 ft. 4 in.; the Temple of Apollo, at Samos, where they are 3 ft. 7 in.; the Temple of Apollo, at Delos, 3 ft. 11 in., &c. To speak technically the Durham Temple will be Tetrastyle, Hypæthral, and also Periptyle, commencing with a stylobate 6 feet high, from the ground, in two divisions, of 3 ft. each; or in other words, it has four columns at the front or end, is open to the sky at the top, and has columns all round, raised from the ground, on a Plinth of two divisions or steps.

THE DURHAM MONUMENT.

The dimensions and scale of the building, to be further understood, must be described, as the proportions are immense, and much greater than perhaps might generally be imagined. The total length is 100 feet; the width 53 feet, and the height from the ground at one end 70 feet, and at the other 62 feet. There are 12 columns on the whole on the stylobate, four at each end, and seven at the flanks or sides, counting two of the end ones on each flank. The columns are each 6 feet 6 inches diameter, and they are 5 diameters and a half (35 feet 9 inches) high. The entablature above the columns is 13 feet 6 inches high, and at each end is surmounted by a pediment. The columns are so large as to admit of a staircase, which will be put up in one of them to give access to the top of the monument, from which an extensive panorama of the surrounding country may be seen.

The third illustration represents Lambton Castle, the seat of the late Earl of about £3,000; and at a general meeting of the subscribers, held at Sunderland, the 25th ult., was the day appointed for laying the foundation stone, with masonic honours, the deceased nobleman having held the office of Provincial Grand Master of the Freemasons of Northumberland and Durham.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland, Grand Master of England, consented to lay the stone, and led by a number of Grand Officers, robed in the investiture, and wearing the jewels, &c., which circumstance attracted a vast number of persons (estimated at from ten thousand to thirty thousand) to witness the ceremony.

We ought to mention that the design chosen was that of a Grecian temple, of which six colossal pillars have been erected to a height of above thirty feet, so as to afford some idea of what the temple will be when completed. Two galleries were erected for the accommodation of the elite who were provided with tickets, and a space in front of the elevation (where lies the foundation stone) was raised off for the accommodation of the Freemasons and others who took a part in the proceedings. Several banners streamed from the summits of the columns, which were also decorated with laurels. A handsome pavilion was raised at the foot of the hill for the convenience of the Freemasons, who assembled at twelve o'clock, and the Grand Lodge was opened. The following officers of the Grand Lodge of England were present:—The Earl of Zetland, M.W.G.M.; Sir Colclough Sharp, acting as D.G.M.; Mark Milbank, Esq., Senior G.W.; W. Leeson, Esq., Dep. P.G.M. for Northumberland; Dr. Baica, as Grand Treasurer; the Rev. Robert Green, A.M., Grand Chaplain; William Henry White, Esq., G.S.; Richard Wm. Jennings, Esq., G.D.C.; Thomas Barton, G.T. Among

CEREMONY OF LAYING THE "FOUNDATION-STONE" OF THE DURHAM MONUMENT, ON FENNER HILL.

Barham. It stands on the north bank of the river Wear, and occupies the site of Harston Hall, formerly the residence of the P'Arcy and Bedw'iths. It was erected by the elder Bonomi in 1797, and is placed in a park of seven or eight miles in circumference, wherein races were at one time held. The castle contains a good library, and choice collection of pictures by Lawrence, Martin, Danby, Glover, &c., &c.; indeed the late Earl's patronage of modern art cannot be too highly praised.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Hugo" should write to a member of the Royal Exchange Committee.

"W. H." Hainesworth.—The claim of the self-will would not be legal.

"A Subscriber." A Charleston.—The driver artist who has taken the subject of this in Mr. Habbot Browne, and not Mr. Cruikshank.

"B. G." should apply to the printer as to the jury list.

"M. L. S." Cheltenham.—Mr. Habbot Browne has illustrated the Pickwick Papers, Nicholas Nickleby, Martin Chuzzlewit, and other works by Mr. Dickens.

"W. J. W." Wakefield.—The Duke of Wellington fired his pistol in the air, in his duel with the Earl of Winchelsea. Marshal Soult was in London at the coronation of her present Majesty.

"W. T. R." should write to the Secretary of the General Post-office. Perhaps our correspondent will send the sketch.

"Chas. H."—The name of the sign by which the conjunction "and" is represented as "and per se."

"J. B. G." Newcastle.—The church shall be engraved as soon as our arrangements will permit.

"Cyria." Dublin.—We are scarcely satisfied with the solution yet received.

"Edward." Birmingham.—The Act of International Copyright, 1st and 2nd Victoria, esp. 39, has not been repealed.

"Alpha Beta." Ireland.—Our correspondent's suggestion is impracticable.

"No Traveller." Spalding, should proceed by coach to a station on the North Midland Railway, thence by railway to Lancaster, and thence to Carlisle by coach.

The Soldier's Dream of Home, by "Henry," is inadmissible.

"Henry L." Norwich.—The large print is in a forward state. Will our correspondent oblige us by sending the sketch?

"C. A." New Wells, W. Oxford, is thanked for his obliging communication. The sketches we have been assured, are characteristic likenesses.

"E. J." Anisney, and "X." Admiralty, should see future announcements.

"Bis."—Letters are despatched to Canada, via Liverpool, on the 3rd and 15th of each month, except December, January, February, and March, when they are despatched on the 1st only.

"A. J." Kingston.—The pronunciation is Van Deeman's Land.

"A Subscriber." Hereford, may obtain the Print, by order, of any news-agent.

"G. W. B." London-walk.—The statue of the Duke of Wellington at the Royal Exchange is intended to represent his Grace in middle age.

"M. A."—The marriage is legal with one name.

"A. Jones."—The portrait of Joe Smith was received from New York.

"H. E." is thanked for the sketch; for which, however, we have no room.

"I. B. N." Woolhampton.—Endure is the correct word.

"H. H. M."—We have no room.

"Phil" should refer to his set of our journal.

"E. H." Newcastle.—Pamphlets for France are to be obtained, gratis, at the office of the French Ambassador, 6, Poland-street, Oxford-street.

"L."—O could I write, &c.—Inadmissible.

"A Lady."—We believe the establishment to be safe.

"An Admirer."—Folgy's Latin Grammar.

"L." Northampton, is thanked for the kind verses to an Infant Prince.—Inadmissible.

"J. H."—The writer of an Essay, "On grouping the notes of the genus for the purpose of facilitating (?) the attainment of its knowledge," seems to have forgotten one of his own most incontestable maxims, namely, "that simplicity is essential to elementary instruction;" for a more round-about or complex mode of conveying the alphabet of music to a learner's comprehension we never witnessed. Suppose the student to be a child, would anybody think of teaching him algebra or logarithms before he could read or write? Would he, his mode only attempts "to facilitate the attainment of the knowledge" of the genus in the title. What is to become of the hams and other stuff? To an intelligent mind, the ordinary manner of learning the names and positions of the notes is sufficiently facile; but without the power of Memory for memory, and that of Lycous for sharp-sightedness, we are quite sure that nobody could derive benefit from our correspondent's suggestions.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1844.

A DOCUMENT has just been published which will enable us, as a nation, to comply with that injunction of the philosopher that tells us above all things to "know ourselves." It is the abstract of the occupations of the people, drawn up from the population returns; it states the relative numbers of the people engaged in every kind of employment and division of employment, as far as it has been practicable to ascertain it. Authentic information on this subject was much needed, particularly by legislators, who, for the want of it, were frequently compelled to take for granted the estimates of writers who wrote as much by guess as from knowledge. The opportunity of the last census was very properly taken, then, to fix with some approach to certainty our knowledge of particulars so important. It is well observed by the Times—

A vast and busy swarm, pent up in a compass unequal to its numbers, and still more unequal to its genius and ambition, with its ancient bonds and institutions gradually dissolving, we are in daily jeopardy of losing all principle of order. We are becoming an immense host in heat of battle. The common observer discerns only a chaos of men, and horses, and smoke, and engines of war. He sees them rushing over the plain, and scattered in ravines. He understands nothing of what he sees and hears—not even his own movements. Without knowledge of the field, without continual and exact reports from every member of his army, the commander is bewildered, and, as a matter of course, immediately defeated. The British nation is engaged in a great and arduous struggle for life and existence, in which whole classes have been miserably wasted. We have a great conquest to achieve over the difficulties of nature, and the not less obstinate impediments of human creation. So the first thing to be done is to ascertain the present state of the battle-field;—what flank is gaining ground, what is hard pressed, where is the strength of the foe, where our reserve, what is the state of our ammunition.

But, having obtained all this knowledge, there remains the greater and more difficult task of wisely applying it. It is almost appalling to think of the masses of human beings that have been collected in densely populated districts by the demand for particular kinds of manufactures, who exist by that peculiar kind of toil, who must suffer if it is suspended, and perish if it were totally withdrawn or destroyed. Hitherto, with the exception of some periods of difficulty that acted as checks, the tendency of the tide of population has been from the agricultural districts to the centres of manufacturing and commercial activity. It has worked almost with the regularity of a natural law—the process is still going on—and, great as our manufacturing skill and industry undoubtedly are, we find it difficult to support our present population. Emigration is continually going on, but it is very far from providing for the surplus, and our numbers go on increasing. What is to be done with them? They must be fed; and to be fed, they must be employed. It is proved that agriculture affords no opening for our continually increasing thousands, and they must therefore be driven in upon manufactures or commerce. If these remain at their present amount, population must continually be overtaking them. We are thus compelled to become more and more a manufacturing country; and all regrets for the departed simplicity of a rural life—all the lamentations over the absence of fields and fresh air—all the anathemas of the "harsh sound of the factory bell," are useless and vain. We must yield to the stern law of necessity, from which there is no escaping. We may wish it were otherwise, but wishes have been described as "vain hopes," and such they will prove, when facts are examined by the strong and unflattering light furnished by the "occupation returns."

THE "Athenic Institution" of Birmingham have had a public dinner, and that public dinner has been presided over by Lord J. Manners. It is to be wished that the Society had chosen a name more English, and more indicative of its object, which appears, from a description of it in the report of the dinner, to be a very good one—a combination of amusement and recreation with instruction. There can be little doubt but the great defect of most Mechanics' Institutions has been the little relaxation they furnished. Study is an effort of the mind, and when the body is exhausted by toil, the mental faculties are not fit for exertion. Nature at such times imperatively demands rest, and if it is denied, it is at the cost of health and strength, which are both sacrificed. We may safely pass from toil to amusement; but we cannot with impunity go from one toil to another. Hence, an institution that furnishes this recreation is one that is pretty sure to succeed. And Lord J. Manners is a fitting patron for such a Society. He is an advocate for "national holidays." If he could convert the world to his creed it would be a much pleasanter one; but it will not be converted; it goes on in its old hard-hearted way; the soul of one universal "Scrooge" possesses it, crying, in the spirit of an Egyptian task-master, "Ye are idle, ye are idle—get ye to your tasks." And the world, conscious of the necessity, is, for self-preservation's sake, fain to obey the command. Yet, from amid the smoke and dust of the brick-kilns there are anxious cries for some little respite; and there are thousands who, having continually to tread the "burning marle," would willingly hear something of the "flutes and soft recorders" which Milton speaks of as beguiling the steps of his demons in their infernal march. But even this solace is scarcely accorded to the human toilers, who must continue their course without hearing music by the way. This has been carried to such an extent, that the physical powers of whole masses were failing under it; and there has ensued a very general movement in favour of a relaxation of the hours of toil, or, as in the case of the Birmingham Institution, for procuring the facilities for a better use of those hours which, even under our present over-working system, are at our disposal.

Lord J. Manners is an amiable man, and we rejoice to see that he is also an active one, not confining himself to praises of the past, which he cannot restore, but willing also to influence the present, which men in his station have some power of directing. It would be useless to attempt to revive Archbishop Laud's "Book of Sports," but something of the spirit that caused its promulgation may be revived. The only error to be guarded against will be the expectation that a condition of society can be established similar to that which many suppose once did actually exist, but which we much doubt if England ever saw. Lord J. Manners is not entirely exempt from an excess of imagination in this particular. Thus he says—

It was his firm conviction, founded upon something like a careful examination of history, that in days long gone by, when the unhappy separation of the classes which now existed in this country was not known in the land, there was by far more peace, more real happiness, and more complete security for all classes, than had or could ever exist under such a class system as now prevailed in society. Their images were hostile to anything like a cordial amalgamation. How often were they enabled to come together in amity and affection, as they had done that evening? How often had they seen the three classes meet at the one table, partake of the same enjoyment? And yet, as they had often heard in the days of feudalism, the Barons of England were accustomed to sit at the same table, and partake of the same fare, with those beneath them.

Now, we will undertake to say, "from something like a careful examination of history," that the line between the different classes of society was more distinctly drawn in the "days of feudalism," than they are at present, and the noble kept the plebeian at a far greater distance; the insolent and arrogant protection accorded by the lord of the soil to his serf or retainer, was not amalgamation in our sense of the word. All we know of the social usages for the period confirms our belief. The baron and the serf might sit at the same table, but they were far, very far from being on terms of equality. The rich fare, and the scarce wines—the venison and the "malvoisie" were for the noble and his equals, for those who "sat above the salt." The coarse food, and the thin drink, were the portion of all below it, for the menial and the dependant; and they were coupled with things worse than this, the whip and the discipline of the porter's lodge, for all which we have only to refer to the chroniclers of the social life of those periods, which it is the delight of the Young England school to paint so couleur de rose. It may be relied on as an eternal principle that wealth and power never voluntarily raised poverty and dependence to their own level, either in physical well-being, or anything else; nor did they, then, more than now, willingly descend a step in the social scale. If the rich and the great differed of old from the same classes now, it was only in more gross and undisguised contempt of all below them—the necessary consequence of a less perfect civilisation. They are of the fat, and drank of the strong, and threw the refuse to those who were the necessary tools of their ambition, their pride, and their power. They kept all the advantages they could, and bestowed on others none they could keep to themselves. In war the nobles went to the battle, defended by strong suits of armour, jointed and riveted so as almost to defy danger and death. Who wore the leather skull caps and the buff jerkins, and who were they whom the titled chivalry could hack, and carve, and ride over almost at pleasure?—simply those whom they now address as the "lower classes." But the tendency of time is to level human distinctions; the rich man and the noble still leads the humble one in war as in policy; but he has no longer the rich man's wealth-bought immunity from danger, and both share the peril alike. It is the same in other things; it is the very pressure of the classes below him seeking to attain his own level, that induces that aristocratic exclusiveness of spirit which is so complained of. But let it not be supposed it is an evil only of modern days. It has existed in all ages, and will continue to exist to the end of time.

In short, much of this talk about the superiority of the past is mere twaddle, and we wish to guard any portion of our readers from being influenced by it. Let us shape our course by the necessity of the time in which our lot is cast; we cannot bid time return, and if we could, it would not avail us. Let us toil manfully; but if we can prevent ourselves from sinking to be slaves of the steam-engine, why let us do so. But it must be by institutions and combinations of effort born of present circumstances. The example of all the Barons who signed Magna Charta, and all the laws of all the Plantagenets, will not serve us one jot.

THE House of Commons met from the adjournment on Thursday, for the purpose of being prorogued. The Queen's Speech, which was read by Commission, will be found in another column. The proceedings were rather interesting. In the first place, it was announced that Lord Stanley has quitted the House of Commons—an arena in which his great ability as a debater has often been stimulated, by an irascible temper, into displays which left the hearer at a loss whether most to admire their brilliancy or lament their imprudence. He will be raised to the peerage, thus anticipating the dignity to which he would succeed on the death of his father—the Earl of Derby, and he will still retain the seals of his office of Colonial Secretary.

An active and able leader of the Ministry is wanted in the Peers. The Duke of Wellington was both, but time is inexorable, and of him we may begin to say, Troja fuit. At his advanced age he finds the business of the Government, in addition to that of Commander-in-Chief, too much for him. Another important statement was that made by Sir R. Peel, of the settlement of all the points in dispute between England, with respect to Tahiti, and that "there was no reason to doubt" the sincerity of the declarations of the French Government—that it had no intention of occupying any part of the territory of Morocco. A short discussion ensued on the Irish State Trials, brought on by an unresisted motion of Mr. T. Duncombe's, which was interrupted by the arrival of the Usher of the Black Rod, for the house to appear at the bar of the Lords, which, of course, terminated the proceedings.

LAW OF NUISANCE.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

In your notice to correspondents in the number for Saturday last, you state—"If a person goes to a nuisance he has no remedy." Now this law of yours is different to that which was laid down by the present Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in (I think) Hilary Term of 1838. In giving judgment on a demurrer to a plea on an action for a nuisance, he stated his opinion to be, that every one had a common law right of wholesome air, and that a person could not be deprived of that right, because the person causing the nuisance had occupied his premises before the plaintiff came into the neighbourhood. The action was maintained in consequence of a person carrying on the business of a tallow-chandler.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last the Queen and Prince Albert took an early airing in a pony phaeton, the Princess Royal accompanying her Royal parents. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert went out in a phaeton. The Prince of Prussia, attended by his suite, arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen, having performed the journey from Bristol to the Castle in the short space of two hours and a half.

SUNDAY.—This morning their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Prince of Prussia, and the Court, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle, the Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiating. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended divine service in the parish church. The Queen walked for some time on the terrace. Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Prussia, promenade on the East and North Terraces and in the pleasure grounds. Lord Charles Wellesley (Colonel Marshal) has relieved the Hon. Colonel Grey as the Equerry in Waiting on the Queen, and Major-General Sir Edward Rowker has relieved Colonel Wyld in the duties of Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty rode out in a pony phaeton this morning, accompanied by the Princess Alice. In the afternoon her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Prince of Prussia, went out in an open pony carriage. Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Prussia, went in the morning to shoot in the Royal preserves. In the afternoon the Royal children were taken an airing, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lytton.

TUESDAY.—The Queen walked in the pleasure grounds about the Castle this morning. Her Majesty also rode in the garden chair for some time. Prince Albert and the Prince of Prussia walked out in the forenoon and viewed her Majesty's backhounds, and afterwards returned to the Castle in a pony phaeton. The Royal Family were taken walking and pony exercise. In the afternoon her Majesty held a Privy Council, at which the speech on closing the session was agreed upon.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked this morning in the grounds adjoining the Castle. The garden chair was taken in readiness, when required, in which her Majesty occasionally rode. Her Majesty and the Prince drove out in a pony phaeton. The royal children were also taken out.

THURSDAY, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Major-General Sir Edward Rowker and Lieutenant Colonel Bouverie, left the Castle this morning, between eight and nine o'clock, in one of the royal carriages and four, preceded by outsiders, for the South Station, and proceeded thence to town, to be present at the review in Hyde Park before the Prince Royal of Prussia. His Royal Highness was received at the South Station by Mr. Charles Wellesley and Colonel Berkeley Drummond, who preceded in attendance upon the Prince to town. Upon the Prince Consort's arrival at Paddington (where the royal carriages were in waiting), he was driven to Buckingham Palace, and there received by the Earl of Delaware, the Lord Chamberlain, upon arriving at the grand entrance. His Royal Highness, who left Windsor in plain clothes, dressed himself in military attire at the palace, and rode on horseback to the review in Hyde Park. At a quarter past one o'clock this afternoon, his Royal Highness took his departure from Paddington, by a special train, and reached the Castle at two o'clock to luncheon with the Queen. Her Majesty, attended by the Viscountess Cannock, walked, this morning, in the private grounds of the Castle. The Queen's garden chair was taken into the shrubbery and occasionally used by her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty this morning. The infant royal family were taken for their usual airings in the Menage Park this morning. This afternoon, her Majesty was driven out for an airing, in a pony phaeton, by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, proceeding through the Long Walk into the Great Park. Lord Charles Wellesley, equerry in waiting to her Majesty, and Major General Sir Edward Bouverie, were in attendance upon the Queen and the Prince on horseback. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal and Alice, were taken for an airing this evening, in an open carriage and pair, attended by the Dowager Lady Lytton. It is in consequence of the male and female domestics of the royal household not having become sufficiently proficient in a knowledge of sacred music, under the tuition of Mr. Kincaid, that the services of the lay-clerks and choristers of St. George's Chapel have been commanded at the royal christening to-morrow evening. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Countess Josephine Weymouth, and attended by Lady Charlotte Dundas, will have the honour of joining the royal dinner circle this evening.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S PROPOSED VISIT TO ENGLAND.—Nothing certain seems to be settled for the long-talked-of visit of Louis Philippe to England. The Paris papers abound in contradictory rumours, but it seems likely that the King will come next month. Baron Athalin, the King's Aide-de-Camp, left Paris for London on Wednesday, with letters for several influential persons, and amongst others, says the Constitutionnel, of a letter written by Lady Cowley to the Duke of Wellington.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE RECEPTION OF THE ROYAL CHILDREN AT BRIGHTON.—For some days past workmen have been very busy at the Palace at Brighton, in making the necessary preparations for the reception of the royal children, all of whom, with the exception of the Princess Royal—who, it is said, will accompany her royal parents—are expected to arrive next Tuesday. The nursery is being prepared for them, and everything bespeaks an early visit.

LOUIS PHILIPPE AND LADY ALBEMARLE.—A Paris letter contains the following instance of gallantry on the part of his Majesty the King of the French, for the truth of which the writer pledges himself:—"On Thursday or Friday week, Lady Albemarle wrote to King Louis Philippe, begging his Majesty would have the kindness to inform her as was imminent? The King delayed not a moment to reply to her ladyship, through his first aide-de-camp, that she might make her mind perfectly easy. No war between France and England was imminent, nor indeed likely."

PROPOSED MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—Lord Beaumont is about to negotiate the matrimonial alliance of the Honorable Miss Brewster, daughter of Lord Kilmuir. The Honorable Mrs. A. Craze has returned from the continent. We understand that lady is on the eve of being united to a foreign nobleman, the marriage having been appointed for the present month.

The Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Aberdeen, and Sir Robert and Lady Peel, returned to town on Wednesday from a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

INDISPOSITION OF LORD MELLORNE.—Lord Melbourne was slightly indisposed on Thursday in South-west, which prevented his lordship leaving the house. His lordship will shortly leave town for Brompton, for the season.

Lady Byron, the widow of the deceased poet, visited Newport last week. On walking out on Friday a boat of her husband caught her view in a shop in High-street, in that town, and her ladyship went in and gazed at it for some time.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT TO SCOTLAND.—Some doubt at first existed as to the part from whence her Majesty would embark for Scotland, but it is, we believe, now settled that the embarkation will take place at Woolwich dockyard, on board the royal yacht, on Monday or Tuesday next, and immediately proceed, on a visit to the Duke of Athol, over whose magnificent estates his Royal Highness will enjoy the sports of the field.

The offer of the use of Blair Athol was made by Lord Glenlyon to the Prince Consort during the shooting season this year upon the last visit of the Court to Scotland.

On Wednesday morning four of the royal carriages, and sixteen of the carriage and saddle horses, with a number of pointer dogs, were shipped on board the steam ship London, Captain Ewing, for Dundee. We believe it has not been definitely fixed as to what place her Majesty and her royal Consort will land on Scotland's shores. Granton Pier, near Leith, where her Majesty disembarked on her first visit to her Scottish dominions in 1843, and the port of Dundee, have both been named. Dundee is considered, by many who know the locality, to be preferable to Granton Pier in many respects. There is a safe and commodious roadstead for the Victoria and Albert steam yacht; and her Majesty, after landing, will not have occasion to cross any river; whereas, should the landing take place at Granton Pier, her Majesty will have to cross the Forth to Queensferry. From Dundee to Blair Castle, which is to be the royal residence, the distance is also much shorter. The preparations at Blair Castle for the reception of her Majesty and her illustrious Consort, were completed last week. The Highlanders who formed her Majesty's body guard during her brief visit to Perthshire in 1842, are again to be under arms during the royal stay amongst the picturesque hills of Perthshire and the mountain fastnesses of Athol.

The Edinburgh Journal of Wednesday says:—"The Queen and Prince Albert will embark on board the royal yacht on Tuesday next, and proceed direct to Dundee, and from thence to Blair Athol, the seat of Lord Glenlyon. The Court will encamp in the Highlands for three weeks, during which period Prince Albert will enjoy the sports of grouse-shooting and deer-stalking. The royal visit, in fact, will be one of pure recreation, and, of course, considered as strictly private."

ELECTION OF CITY CHAMBERLAIN.—The election for City Chamberlain, in the room of the late Sir W. Hargrave, took place on Thursday. Sir P. Laurie nominated Alderman Brown, which nomination was seconded by T. A. Barker, Esq. Alderman Hooper proposed Sir Alderman Humphrey. His second was Thomas Simpson, Esq. P. A. Taylor, Esq., proposed Mr. G. Hoppel. W. Wasey, Esq., seconded the nomination. After speeches from the candidates, and from D. W. Harvey, Esq., the show of hands was taken. The numbers seemed pretty equally divided between the two Aldermen, three or four hands only being held up for Mr. Hoppel. The Common Sergeant said that the Sheriff was of opinion that Anthony Brown, Esq., had the majority of the Levy. A poll was demanded, which was opened pro forma.

PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION FOR THE LAWYERS.—It seems that Lord Brougham's new act has excited so much alarm among that very harmless and innocent class, the lawyers, that they met on Monday, at Gray's Inn Coffee-house, for the purpose of forming a Legal Protection Association. In spite of the exciting statements that have been made, however, only about sixty persons were present. It was stated by the chairman (Mr. D. W. W. W.) that the association, which it was desired should act in amity and union with the Law Society already existing, should embrace many objects not carried out by the latter. The chairman spoke of the time and expense at which the solicitor finds his way into the profession, and thence deduced the solicitor's right to call for and obtain protection for his privileges. After professing himself a law reformer, and indulging in some strong personal observations against Lord Brougham for the part he had taken in behalf of poor and unfortunate debtors, he concluded by calling upon the profession to support the proposed association. A resolution, declaring the necessity of, and forming the association, was carried unanimously.

HYDE PARK.—A new grand walk is in progress of formation across the Park, from Grosvenor-gate to the gate opposite the Chinese Exhibition at Knightsbridge, similar to the one formed some time since from Hyde Park-corner. Previously, to the gate opposite Albion-gate, Bayswater. The turf has been already removed, and a stratum of gravel laid down.

HUNTERS AND LAMBERT SUSPENSION BRIDGE.—This undertaking is rapidly approaching towards completion, and if no further alterations should be deemed advisable, the bridge will be opened for the accommodation of the public in a very short period. The entire length across will be about 1350 feet, which makes the bridge the largest of the kind in Europe, excepting one at Fribourg, in Switzerland. The breadth for the purposes of foot passengers will be 14 feet, but it may be widened in the event of the railway from Richmond being formed. There are two buttresses for the support of the suspension chains, of which there will be altogether four. Two have already been placed across the buttresses and a third is in progress of completion. The total cost of undertaking will be £100,000.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—The opening has been deferred till the first week in October. The whole of the walls will be painted, and the monuments thoroughly cleaned and renovated.

FALL OF TWO HOUSES.—At one o'clock on Wednesday morning, two unfinished houses in Seymour-street North, Euston-square, fell down. Providentially no person received any injury.

MORTALITY OF LONDON.—The total number of deaths in the metropolis during the week ending last Saturday, as made up by the Registrar-General, was 708, being less by 148 than the weekly average of the last five years.

SALE OF FOREIGN PROVISIONS.—Messrs. Keding and Hunt, the enterprising gentlemen who have used so much exertion to give the public the benefit of the new tariff, had a sale of foreign provisions on Wednesday, which was very numerously attended. The sale consisted of New York hams, pork selected for the country trade, tongues, smoked beef, family beef, and sausages. The hams produced about 40s. per cwt.; a further quantity of 3025 hams, sold for 37s. The pork, which was a remarkably good article, net, too salt, fetched 30s. per cwt., whilst 100 kegs of ox tongues, which were remarkably good and well-flavoured, produced at the rate of 1s. 11d. to 2s. each. The smoked beef, very fat, sold for 39s. per cwt., and 150 half barrels of family beef, found ready purchasers at 40s. per cwt.; the sausage fetched 9d. per lb., and the undressed tuncle 1s. per lb. The quality of the provisions was very superior to anything heretofore produced from abroad.

FIRE AT ISLINGTON.—On Wednesday morning an alarming fire broke out in the private dwelling-house belonging to Mrs. Jones, situate No. 11, Brighthelm, Liverpool-road, Islington. At the time there were fortunately only three persons in the building, consisting of two female domestics and an infant. After considerable difficulty they were all got out, but not before the flames had gained a great head. The whole of the furniture as well as the building itself was consumed. The origin of the fire is not known.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE HARVEST.—The accounts from all parts of the United Kingdom, this week, of the weather and the harvest, are of the most favourable description. DEATH OF TWO OF THE EARL OF STRATHMORE'S GAMERESSES.—Considerable excitement has been created in the vicinity of Benham Park, Suffolk, the residence of the Earl of Strathmore, in consequence of the suicide of two men in his lordship's employ. The first took place on Saturday last. It appears that Kasey, Lord Strathmore's head gamekeeper, left his cottage on that day, taking a double-barrelled gun with him. He proceeded to a spot near his house where a quantity of bullrushes grew. From the relative positions of the gun and the body, it would seem that he had placed some of the rushes across both the triggers, that by moving his foot, which confined the ends of them, he fired the gun off, having first put the muzzle in his mouth. The head was shattered in a terrible manner, more particularly the left portion, which was almost blown completely away, the brain being found at a distance from the body. His death is ascribed to the annoyance occasioned to the deceased by the predatory acts of footmen. On Sunday another of his lordship's gamekeepers killed himself. His name is Cruik, and the office he held is described to be that of superintendant over the other keepers. It appears that the deceased, on Sunday afternoon (not 24 hours after the miserable and frightful death of his fellow-servant), went into the lower apartment of his own cottage, situated in the park, and with a gun deliberately destroyed himself. Little is known of the cause that can have led him, as well as Kasey, to have thus hurried themselves into eternity. As was the case with Kasey, Cruik appears to have had no family motives for the fatal act, and had, in fact, been some few minutes before in excellent spirits. Of course, all are desirous to discover, if possible, some reasonable and probable cause for the two closely succeeding suicides in the same establishment; and various are the motives that are alleged as the exciting origin of the deeds. A third case of suicide occurred at Halesworth on Monday last. In this instance, the individual was a young lady of great beauty and accomplishments, named Burgess. The cause of the act was said to be disappointment in love. She effected her rash purpose by drowning in the river about a mile below the town. These successive suicides have caused great agitation and regret in the neighbourhood.

RECEPTION OF MR. BELANBY.—According to the local papers, Mr. Belanby has been rather roughly received on his way home. He left London immediately after the trial and passed through Newcastle upon Tyne on his way to Northumberland. His return home, as well as that of some of the witnesses who appeared in his favour on the trial, has been the reverse of welcome. One party, it is said, was stoned from the village; and on Wednesday an effigy was elevated on a pole, and, after being paraded for some time round the neighbourhood, it was set fire to in the presence, and amidst the shoutings of some hundreds of the population. A letter which appeared in the Times newspaper of Saturday last, signed G. S., strongly condemnatory of the jury who tried and acquitted Belanby, has also been reprinted at Alnwick, and extensively circulated. The excitement in the locality of Northumberland, where Belanby and his wife reside, is described as being very great.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Mr. Wm. Gordon, the keeper of Exeter-hall, engaged a machine on Saturday morning, at Brighton, and got into the sea to bathe. He had scarcely put his feet into the water, when, being a person of full habit of body, he was suddenly attacked with apoplexy, and died in the water. He was observed to fall, but before he could be got out, life was extinct. His wife was a witness to the distressing scene. A coroner's inquest was held the same day on the body, when the jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

EXECUTION AT TANTON.—On Wednesday Joel Fisher, was executed at the new drop of Tanton Gash, for the murder of his wife, at Weston-super-Mare, which crime, was committed under circumstances of great atrocity. It will be recollected that he struck the deceased with a large iron bar, and afterwards fetched a cutting knife, with which he nearly severed her head from her body. Shortly before eleven the solemn procession moved towards the scaffold. Fisher waited with a firm step, and did not evince much dejection. On the drop he entered into derisive exercises with deep feeling. The executioner performed his dreadful office, and the murderer was launched into eternity. He appeared to die very soon, not the slightest convulsive struggle being perceptible. At least 5000 people were assembled.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

COMMITTAL FOR MANSLAUGHTER.—On Monday evening an inquest was held at the Grange Inn, Curry-street, before Mr. Riggs, on the body of James Brooker, aged 45, who expired on Saturday in King's College Hospital. It appeared that on Saturday morning deceased was driving a cart laden with potatoes to Covent-garden market, when upon reaching the middle of Great Queen-street he was in the act of passing another cart, driven by Charles Dilla, a carman in the employ of Mr. Thompson, farmer, of Tottenham. Dilla crossed the road with his team, forcing the horses in Brooker's cart upon the pavement. A collision taking place, deceased was crushed between the two wheels of the cart. He was conveyed to King's College Hospital, where, in spite of all that could be done for him, he died. The jury gave a verdict of "Manslaughter against Charles Dilla," who was committed.

VERY SUDDEN DEATH.—On Monday about one o'clock, an awful instance of sudden death occurred in Upper John-street, Hoxton. The deceased, a man about 50 years of age, was engaged in carrying coals to the house of Mr. Smith (No. 14), when, after emptying a sack into the coal cellar, Mrs. Smith observed to him that his nose was bleeding. He endeavoured to reply, but was unable, in consequence of the rapid flow of blood both from his nose and mouth, and had just strength left to grin the death when he fell down and instantly expired.

DEATH FROM CHOKING.—Mr. Waskley on Tuesday held an inquest at the Freemasons' Arms, King's-cross, on the body of Mary Ann Seale, aged 49. It appeared that the deceased, who had an asthmatic complaint, on Thursday last was sitting up in bed, when her husband offered her a cup of tea. She had drunk some, and whilst drinking the remainder she was seized with a cough, became black in the face, and exhibited other symptoms of asphyxiation. A medical man was at once sent for, but before his arrival life was extinct. Verdict, "Natural death."

MELANCHOLY AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Sunday evening, as Mr. Murphy, a commercial gentleman of respectability in the City, was returning from Highgate in a phaeton driven by himself, the horse took fright coming down Highgate-hill, and set off at a fearful pace. Unfortunately, a man named Samuel Rogers, a brewer's labourer, with Mr. and Mrs. Bignell, his uncle and aunt, and Rebecca Heade, one of his cousins, were at that moment walking on the side of the road on which there is no pathway, and when they observed the horse approaching, instead of drawing clear to the fence, they, in their alarm, rushed across the road towards the foot-path. The horse and phaeton, however, came up at the instant, and all four were knocked down. Rogers was killed, the shaft of the vehicle having entered his breast. His friend was seriously injured. Mrs. Bignell had her leg broken, and received other injuries. The other female was severely cut and contused. Mr. Murphy was flung out on the road, where he was found in a state of insensibility. At the inquest a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned, but Mr. Murphy has been bound over to appear at Clerkenwell Police-office to answer any charge that may be brought against him.

The 53d Regiment of Foot, having arrived at Liverpool, from Ireland, it embarked thence on the 3d ult. for Bengal. The depot company of the 53d Foot are shortly to march from Liverpool to Chatham. The depot of the 53d Foot has just removed from Battersea to Farnham, and the 80th Foot has changed quarters, and proceeded from Glasgow to Edinburgh.

THE CHRISTENING OF THE INFANT PRINCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

We received the following account of the christening of the infant Prince, in the Queen's private chapel, at Windsor Castle, and the grand banquet given in celebration of the event by her Majesty, at a late hour this morning:—

WINDSOR, Friday Night.
Carriages, containing her Majesty's visitors, commenced arriving at the Castle as early as eleven o'clock this morning, and continued, with but little intermission until nearly six o'clock this evening.

At three o'clock in the afternoon an immense number of the inhabitants of Windsor, and numerous strangers, were congregated outside of the Castle, waiting to be admitted to view the banqueting-table, in St. George's Hall. After some little delay, the public were admitted, in batches of tens and twenties; but before the doors had been open more than half an hour, an order was issued, forbidding another person to enter the Castle. At this time, there were not less than 800 to 1000 persons waiting on the outside. The order, however, was peremptory, and most rigidly enforced.

It appears that the cause of this great disappointment to the public arose from this simple circumstance:—Several persons who were in St. George's Hall at the time the Queen left the quadrangle in a pony phaeton and pair, driven by Prince Albert, for an airing, ran to the windows, and, perhaps, very indiscreetly, but thoughtlessly, threw them open, in order to have a better view of their Sovereign; this conduct being observed by the Queen, her Majesty immediately commanded Lord Charles Wellesley, the equerry in waiting, to give orders that no more persons should be permitted to enter the Castle.

Several of the members of the Cabinet arrived about four o'clock. At half-past six o'clock this evening, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by her Majesty the Queen Dowager, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Royal Highness Prince William of Prussia, and as many others of the royal and illustrious guests as the chapel could conveniently accommodate, entered the sacred edifice, which was brilliantly lighted up for the occasion, and had a most imposing and magnificent effect. Her Majesty was dressed in a robe of pure white, and looked remarkably well. During the time the company were taking their seats, Dr. Elvey played a voluntary; and, previously to the commencement of the sacred ceremony, the Hymn of Praise, "Oh! be joyful all ye lands," was sung by the full choir.

During the performance of the solemn rite the "Amen" were chanted, accompanied by the organ; and at its conclusion, and before the blessing, the "Hallelujah Chorus" was given by the full choir.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Bishops of Oxford and Norwich, stood in front of the font, which was placed upon a purple velvet cushion, fringed with gold.

The baptismal service was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury; when he came to that part of the service for naming the Prince, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as proxy for his son, Prince George, named his Royal Highness

ALFRED ERNEST ALBERT.

The other sponsors were his Grace the Duke of Wellington, proxy for the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

Upon the conclusion of the baptismal service, his Royal Highness the Prince

Alfred was re-conducted from the chapel, and the Queen, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, and the other royal and illustrious visitors returned.

At eight o'clock the grand banquet took place in St. George's Hall; covers being laid for ninety-five.

At the conclusion of the banquet, her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the whole of the royal and illustrious guests, retired from the Hall of St. George, and proceeded to the Waterloo Gallery, where coffee was served. The company retired at half-past ten o'clock.

WINDSOR CASTLE.—ACCIDENT IN THE WATERLOO GALLERY.—An accident occurred in the Waterloo Gallery, on the afternoon of Thursday last, which had it unfortunately taken place during the evening of yesterday, at the time the splendid apartment was crowded with her Majesty's royal and illustrious guests, might have been attended with the most serious and lamentable results. Five massive chandeliers, of or-molu, and of exquisite workmanship, weighing several hundreds of pounds each, were suspended from the ceiling at about fifteen feet from the floor. These magnificent pieces of furniture, which, it is said, cost from £2000 to £3000 each, are considered to be the most rich and beautiful specimens in the country. While one of the workmen, in the department of the Lord Chamberlain, was engaged, mounted on the top of a high flight of steps, in preparing the chandelier at the western end, on Thursday afternoon, for lighting on the following evening (yesterday), the whole mass gave way, and fell on the floor with a tremendous crash, and breaking into a thousand pieces. Of the several circles of cut plate-glass, upon which were elaborately embossed the Star, Garter, and motto of the Order of the Garter, not one escaped. The whole was smashed to atoms. The man on the steps fortunately escaped; and providentially one of the numerous workmen engaged in the apartment were beneath at the time, or they must have been crushed to death; the chandelier, it is stated, weighs upwards of 7 cwt.

EMBARKATION OF HER MAJESTY FOR SCOTLAND.—We believe it is now settled that her Majesty and Prince Albert are to embark on Monday at Woolwich, for Scotland, on board the royal yacht. Her Majesty will take place in the morning about ten o'clock, and it is probable her Majesty will arrive and embark at an earlier hour, to take advantage of the commencement of the ebb tide. It is said the royal squadron will proceed on the fifth of May and anchor off Dundee. In this arrangement her Majesty will afford great cause of congratulation to many thousands of her subjects resident in and connected with that important manufacturing town, and add to her own pleasure, and the pleasure of her Royal Consort, by the change of scenery the royal party will witness on the banks of the Tay. The Princess Alice and the Dowager Princess are to light in druit of water, that there would be no difficulty in proceeding in these streams as far up the Tay as the city of Perth; the royal party would then be within a short distance of Dundee and the brigs of Athol. Every preparation has been made on board the royal steam yacht Victoria and Albert, Captain Lord Adolphus FitzClarence, for the reception of her Majesty and Prince Albert, and their suite, and also for the coronation of the royal children, should her Majesty purpose to take them with her. Nothing can be more comfortable and convenient than the whole of the arrangements of the nursery; the stoves and the cabins in either side having been fitted up for the accommodation of the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, and their nurses and immediate attendants.

The Duchess of Manchester is seriously ill with an attack of influenza, followed by fever. The duke has returned by express from Scotland to Tanderagee Castle.

THE IRISH STATE PRISONERS.—Mr. Gardiner, one of the agents for the prisoners, started on Thursday evening, express to Ireland with the formal warrants for the discharge of the state prisoners. It is rumored that the Government have anticipated the formal and somewhat tardy process of the law, and have sent over instructions to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to discharge the prisoners.

REVIEW OF THE HOUSEHOLD TROOPS.—On Thursday the household troops, quartered in the metropolis, were reviewed in Hyde Park, by his Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia. At ten o'clock the whole disposable force, consisting of the 1st and 3rd battalions of the Grenadier Guards, the 2d battalion of the Coldstream, the 1st battalion of the Scots Fusilier Guards, and two squadrons of the Life Guards, arrived on the ground. Shortly before eleven o'clock the Duke of Wellington, Lord Salton, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, and Sir George Murray, arrived, and were followed almost immediately by their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Prince of Prussia, the Cavalier Russet (Prussian Minister), Count Kommerow, Count Puckler, Baron Siernitz, Count Nesselrode, and Count Drieschold, who were received with presented arms, the bands playing the national anthem. After their Royal Highnesses and the General Officers had inspected the line, the troops formed into divisions and marched past in slow and quick time; they subsequently went through several evolutions with admirable precision, forming hollow and solid squares, firing by single files, platoons, sections, and subdivisions, and, on being again formed into line, fired several volleys; after which a general salute was given, and the troops were marched back to their respective quarters.

LONDON AND CROYDON RAILWAY.—A meeting of the proprietors of the London and Croydon Railway was held on Thursday, when a dividend of 3s. per share was declared.

ELECTION FOR CHAMBERLAIN.—The poll was resumed on Friday morning at nine o'clock; and at three o'clock, when the poll closed for the day, the gross numbers were:—

Mr. Alderman Brown	..	..	..	..	1670
Mr. Hoppel	..	..	..	..	40

Mr. Alderman Humphrey has retired.

THE ALDERMANIC GOWN OF BILLINGSGATE.—Mr. Thomas Silby, the Sheriff-elect, and tea-dealer, of Ludgate-hill, has purchased the ward of Billingsgate for the aldermanic gown, which will be resigned by Mr. Alderman Brown upon his return as Chamberlain, of which there is now little doubt.

A CHILD BURNED TO DEATH BY ITS MOTHER.—On Tuesday an adjourned inquest took place at the Crown Inn, in the village of Barnack, near Stamford, on the remains of an infant, alleged to have been murdered, and afterwards consumed over a fire by the mother, a woman of the name of Sarah Simpson, the wife of a labouring man living near that town. The following was the verdict of the jury:—"That the prisoner concealed the birth of a child, and that afterwards, on the 26th of August, did secretly dispose of the dead body by burning the same in her dwelling." She was committed for trial.

LEGACY.—Yesterday (Friday) at the vestry of the Marylebone Board of Guardians, a long discussion took place respecting the treatment of pauper lunatics in the county hospitals. It was stated that Hanwell was not a proper place for the reception of incurables, who, it was alleged, should be confined in the workhouses, in order that persons really affected and capable of being cured, might be properly attended to. A committee was appointed, after a very lengthened discussion, to report on the matter, which is not likely to rest quietly until some substantial course shall be pursued.

ARRANGEMENTS OF HOUSES OF BUSINESS.—The most respectable Booksellers, Grocers, Chemists, &c., and other shopkeepers, excepting provision and refreshment shops, have begun now to open at seven in the morning, and close their doors at eight every evening, excepting Saturday night, then one hour later, and they are about making arrangements to close at seven during November, December, January and February.

A WIFE CHARGED WITH ATTEMPTING TO POISON HER HUSBAND.—At Union Hall, yesterday, a woman, named Sarah Dwyer, was charged with attempting to poison her husband. The complainant, who keeps a circulating library at No. 3, Castle-street, Kent-street, in the Borough, stated that his wife was a woman of violent temper, and she had quarrelled with him, for selling a chest of drawers, the preceding day. She first exhibited her anger by dropping a heavy piece of wood on his head from the window. Subsequently, while he was taking his tea, he went into the shop to attend on a customer. On his return, his wife was there, and soon after he had taken a cup, he was violently ill. The prisoner seemed rejoiced at his sufferings, and circulated that she hoped he would throw up his heart, and used other language of a similar description. She then left the room, and went up stairs, when, soon after her departure, he perceived a piece of paper on the spot where the prisoner had previously stood, and on opening it he found it to contain a lump of white stuff, resembling chalk in its appearance, and on pouring the remains of the tea out of the cup into a saucer, he discovered a quantity of white sediment at the bottom of the cup. A chemist, who was sent for, said the paper had contained arsenic. He was still suffering from the effects of what he had drunk, and an antidote having been administered, he recovered sufficiently to be enabled to attend the court that day, although he was still far from being well.—The magistrate told the prisoner the charge affected her life, and asked her what she had to say? The prisoner replied: "I put myself in the hands of the Lord. All I have to say, at present, is, that I am innocent of this charge."—She was remanded till Wednesday.

INCENDIARISM AT DUNSTABLE.—A most destructive fire broke out at this town on Wednesday night. It commenced about ten o'clock at night, in the farm-yard of Mr. Henry Goudie, at a straw-stack in the centre of the farm-yard, and soon rapidly spread to all the adjoining farm buildings, and from thence to the stack-yard, at the same time reaching the barns and other farm premises which Rick-yard of Mr. Howe, farmer. The large Wesleyan chapel, adjoining Mr. Howe'srick, soon caught fire; and, after raging with great fury for about half-an-hour, the roof fell in. By about eleven o'clock the fire was at its greatest height. The flames were seen from a great distance. The number of buildings totally destroyed by the fire amounts to no less than 64, including threshing-barns, stables, cow-houses, pigsties, hen-houses, ricks of wheat, barley, oats, peas, hay, straw, ashles, whitening-sheds, large Wesleyan chapel, &c. It is thought that the damages will not be under £5000. It is, however, fortunate that all the parties are insured at nearly the full amount, with the exception of the Wesleyan chapel, which is not insured for more than £500. It cost about £1200 in the erection. The fire is supposed to have originated through the act of some diabolical incendiary. Fortunately all the valuable horses, &c., were got out unhurt. No live stock was destroyed, with the exception of a few ducks, fowls, and pigeons.

MANSLAUGHTER.—At Bow-street, yesterday (Friday), John Durr, a cabman in the employment of Messrs. Kierstead, was brought before Mr. Justice, charged with having caused the death of Charles Lane. On Saturday last, the prisoner was driving a waggon in Great Queen-street, and in front of him two other waggons were driving along the street. The deceased was walking beside the second waggon, and the prisoner troited his horses to get past him. The first waggon pulled suddenly across the road, and the prisoner had to turn on one side to prevent running into it, and while doing so, the deceased was jammed with great violence between the wheels. When taken up, he was insensible, and believed to be dead, but rallied on arriving at King's College Hospital, where his leg was amputated at the thigh the same night. On Sunday and Monday he, however, got worse, and died on Tuesday from the severe injuries he had sustained. The prisoner said it was perfectly accidental, and he regretted it as much as any one could. He was then committed to Newgate for trial for manslaughter.

GATE OF TANGIER—FLIGHT OF THE POPULATION.

FRANCE AND MOROCCO.

We resume our illustrations of the War in Morocco with an interesting scene of the flight of the inhabitants, by the gate Marshán from the citadel of Tangier, during its recent siege by the French. This celebrated spot, picturesque in itself, and magnificent in its relations—bearing, as it does, the treasury of the city, and being the seat of the local Government—became a point of great importance to the besiegers. It was severely handled, at least, in intention, but it happily escaped with little injury. During the bombardment vast numbers of the population escaped by this gate; and here might be seen an unoffending multitude flying beneath a shower of shells, and forming a sickening episode in the terrific spectacle of war.

On emerging from this gate a splendid view is gained. The eye, glancing forward, across the strait, embraces the majestic sweep of the Spanish coast, with Tarifa, Gibraltar, and the opposite point of Cape Malabatta. To the right spread the white sands of the burning coast of Africa, washed by the emerald seas, but scarcely varied—so immense is their monotony—by the hundred scudding sails of the descendants of the Saltee rovers. At our feet, to the left, lie the town and bay of Tangier; the former glittering with white and brightly-coloured houses, and the latter filled with the thundering navy of France, and the vigilant fleets of other nations.

From this spot, sacred alike to Romans, Moors, and Britons—the only place, after the expulsion of the Moors, on which the sons of the Prophet could freely mingle with the civilised nations of the earth—both Moors and Europeans have been driven.

One hundred and sixty years ago Tangier was in the possession of the English; but Charles II. found the maintenance of a sufficient garrison there to be too expensive; and the nation refusing to grant supplies, the fortifications and mole were blown up. On the retirement of the English, the Moors quickly occupied the place, which has since continued in their possession.

It is a singular fact that "rifles" were introduced into the British service in 1680, and were first used by the Life Guards at the siege of Tangier. It is also remarkable, that about the same period the "Grenadiers" were introduced into the army, and did good service at this memorable siege. According to the quaint language of the day, "a company was formed of men who each carried a large pouch filled with hand-grenades. These men were instructed to ignite the fuses, and to cast the grenades into forts, trenches, or amidst the ranks of their enemies, where the explosion was calculated to do much execution; and the men, deriving their designation from the combustibles with which they were armed, were styled Grenadiers." Although the hand-grenades have long since been laid aside, yet one company, which is designated "The Grenadier Company," continues to form part of every battalion in the English service.

The second illustration is an episode from the Battle of Isly, representing a death-struggle between an Arab standard-bearer and a French soldier. The flag, which, in the original, is striped with three horizontal bands, one of light yellow, and two of light red, and variously embellished with inscriptions from the Koran, is, we believe, a curiosity in this country; and perhaps the Arab sword may be deemed, for the beauty of its shape, to be worthy of imitation. ISLAND OF MOGADORE, ABD-EL-KADER, AND HIS MOORISH ALLIES.

Arab cap is a doubled kerchief, bound round the temples with a fillet of coloured thread.

We perceive by the Moniteur that several Moorish trophies have already been received in Paris. An imposing ceremony took place on Monday at the Hotel des Invalides, where the colours captured at Mogadore were deposited. Colonel Dumas, aide-de-camp of the King, accompanied by Captain Bouet, of the navy, who was selected to convey these trophies to Paris, handed them, in the absence of Marshal Oudinot, Governor of the Invalides, to General Petit, commander of the hotel, who received them in the presence of the military invalids, drawn up under arms in division. The colours, to the number of six, were then carried by as many decorated non-commissioned officers before the Invalids formed in line, who received them with the greatest enthusiasm, the drums in the mean time beating a royal salute. A considerable multitude were present at this affecting military solemnity.

As Marshal Bugeaud's detailed despatch appeared only, in part, in our late edition of last week, we subjoin a few extracts:—
The despatch is dated, "Camp, near Constat Abderrahman, August 17," and the Marshal describes the action as a "great battle." After noticing some preparatory skirmishes, the Marshal says, "I passed a first time the day, at dawn, without meeting the enemy. On arriving, at eight in the morning, on the heights of Djurf-el-Akhdar, we perceived all the Moorish camps still in their places, extending over the slopes of the right bank. All the cavalry composing them had moved forward, in order to attack us at the second passage of the river. Amidst a large mass stationed on the highest part, we perfectly distinguished the group of the Emperor's son, his flag and his parasol—the badge of his command."

The enemy's cavalry being divided by its own movements, and by my march, which cut it in two, deemed the moment come to make an issue upon the capital point, which in my opinion was the camp I supposed to be defended by the infantry and artillery. I ordered Col. Tartas to echelon his nineteen squadrons by the left, so that his last echelon might rest on the right bank of the day.

Colonel Jusuf commanded the first echelon, which consisted of six squadrons of Spahis, very closely supported in the rear by three squadrons of the 4th Chasseurs.

Having put to the sword a good number of horses, Colonel Jusuf attacked that immense camp. After receiving several discharges of artillery, he found it filled with horse and foot soldiers, who disputed every inch of the ground. The reserve of the three squadrons of the 4th Chasseurs arrived—a fresh impulse was imparted—the artillery was captured—and the camp carried.

It was covered with dead bodies and dead horses. The whole artillery, all the provisions and war stores, the tent of the Emperor's son, the tents of all the chiefs, the shops of numerous traders across paying the army—everything, in short, remained in our power. But this bright repulse of the campaign had cost us dear—four officers of the Spahis and Chasseurs had lost their lives in it, and several others were wounded.

At last General Bugeaud, commanding the right wing, seeing the immense danger the Second Regiment of Chasseurs were exposed to detached the battalion of Zouaves, a battalion of the 15th Light Infantry, and the 9th battalion of Chasseurs of Orleans in order to attack the enemy on the side of the mountains. That movement determined their retreat. Colonel Morris then resumed the offensive against them, and executed several successful charges in the pass whereby they were retiring; that episode was one of the most vigorous of the day—550 chasseurs of the 2d combated 6,000 of the enemy's cavalry. Each chasseur brought back a trophy of this engagement—one a flag, another a horse, &c.

It was then noon, the heat was great, the troops of all arms were greatly fatigued. There was no more baggage nor artillery to take, since all was taken. I ordered the pursuit to cease, and led all the troops back to the Sultan's camp. Colonel Jusuf had made me to reserve the tent of the Emperor's son. The standards taken from the enemy had been got together to the number of eighteen, and eleven pieces of artillery, the parasol of the Emperor's son, and a great number of the trophies.

The Moors left on the field of battle at least 800 killed, almost all cavalry; of the infantry, which was not numerous, the greater part escaped from us in consequence of the ravines. This army has, besides, lost almost all its material. It must have had from 1,500 to 2,000 wounded.

Our loss was—four officers killed, and 70 wounded; and 35 sub-officers and soldiers killed, and 80 wounded.

From all accounts of the prisoners and the Arabs, who saw the camp of the enemy, their cavalry cannot be calculated at less than 23,000. They showed themselves very bold, but the confusion rendered their efforts powerless. The boldest stood to be killed. All they wanted to do well was the force of combination and a well-combated infantry to support their movements. With a Government like theirs, it would require several ages to give them the condition of success in battle.

The third scene is the island of Mogadore, viewed from the fortifications of the city. The tower in the foreground is the powder bastion, and the battery adjoining, on which the Moors prided themselves, as they were mounted with brass guns. On the island are

LITERATURE.

THE ART OF MAKING VALENCIENNES LACE. By MADAME DE CONDÉ.

Notwithstanding the variety of patterns, and beauty of fabric, of lace, produced in this country, especially at Nottingham, Buckinghamshire, &c., the costly lace made in Flanders, which is known as "Valenciennes," maintains its ancient superiority. It owes its preeminence from the peculiar strength of fabric, possessing a quality which we are not able to define, but refer to the fair sex, who devote their time to such matters. This we know, that every lady of rank, whether in the ball-room or the saloon, who has a taste for the elegant and récherché, considers Valenciennes lace as an almost indispensable auxiliary to costume. Our English ladies have, until now, occupied themselves merely with the quality of Valenciennes lace; but by aid of the little work before us, they may become proficient in the art of making it. The volume is in miniature, is neat and pretty, its style is modest, clear, gradual, and inviting, replete with instruction for the industrious fair.

By the way, ladies by acquiring the art of lace-making, will better appreciate the labour of the poor; they will no longer refuse the fair claim for a good article, nor will they be deceived in their purchase of it. Lace-making has many advantages. It is a work which requires reflection; memory is brought into active play, skill can be exerted in the change of patterns, drawing may assist as an accessory to sketch new designs.

The writer of this little book, Madame de Condé (who in more prosperous days devoted a portion of her time and income to the founding a school for the indigent in the neighbourhood where she resided), has had the opportunity of acquiring the art of making Valenciennes lace, to which she now turns, in the hope of benefiting herself and family, and we hope that she may have the satisfaction of converting an amusement of happier days into a source of profit for her fatherless children.

THE BACHELOR'S OWN BOOK: being Twenty-four Passages in the Life of Mr. Lambkin, Gent. By GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. D. Bogue.

This is a series of comic etchings, illustrative of the progress which a gentleman, "just come into his property," makes in the world: "each varied scene of coloured life" he is made to appear in; but we think he cuts a better figure on his outset than he ever does afterwards; he "makes his toilet to admiration!" The next scene, "Going a courting," is graphic, and his performance at a pic-nic very ridiculous. His interview with the lawyer is happily and powerfully conceived and executed. The scene with "the kind-hearted cabman" is also good. Altogether, this is a rich specimen of Cruikshank's fertile humour, and must prove a very amusing bagatelle for the drawing-room table. The accessories in the several plates, as usual, are excellent.

THE MEDICAL TIMES.—PHARMACEUTICAL NUMBER.

Within the pages of this valuable journal is to be found, at all times, not only such information as may interest the profession to which it immediately devotes itself, but also an immense mass of facts in chemistry and pharmacy. The Part before us contains more than one hundred closely-printed pages of minute details, the majority of which are useful and important to the operative chemist and druggist.

NEW MUSIC.

THE SACRED PIANIST, &c. By EDWARD CLARE. Books I. and II. R. Cocks and Co.

No. I. commences with the "Morning Hymn" irreverently treated—trip-tac have no connexion with psalmody. The "Evening Hymn," on the next page, is ridiculously handled—ride bars 3 and 5: the latter exhibits a solecism in harmony.

No. II. is of the same character as the former. The arranger's notion of sacred music seems to be on a par with that of the man who compared the organ at Haarlem to a large hurdy-gurdy, and ejaculated in rapture, "How I should like to play Foulez vous danser on that 'ere instrument!"

I DREAM OF ALL THINGS FREE. New Song. Composed by EDWARD CLARE. H. White, Oxford-street.

A pleasing, flowing melody, which would probably have been original a hundred years ago. The first line of the words is sufficiently suggestive to any composer's slumbering fancy. A few careless, consecutive octaves might as well be omitted. In the first bar of the second verse the chord of the sixth and fifth produces a bad effect—in fact the seventh to the fundamental should not have been used at all.

THE ROYAL DUMKA AND BOHEMIAN POLKAS. By EDWARD CLARE. H. White, Oxford-street.

Of all the inflictions that fashion has ever made us suffer under, the Polka-mania is the worst. The gestures of this satyr revel can only be rivalled in beauty by the nomenclature which describes the various kinds of it—Polka—Dumka, &c.: what euphony! As usual, there are no harmonies but those of tonic and dominant alternated, which is variety sufficient for this species of composition (?)

CLARE'S LESSONS IN HARMONY, &c. H. White, Oxford-street. The idea or design of this work is excellent: it presents a very seen a mosque and two batteries, the only two buildings of importance. The fortified rocks on the right form the channel of the harbour to the south.

The annexed engraving shows the Arsenal of Mogadore before the recent bombardment.

Next is a group of Abd-el-Kader and his Moorish allies; showing "the Lion of the Desert," surrounded by his staff and Moorish officers: among the accessories, the pipe-bearer, the tatar in attendance, the standard-bearer, &c., will be readily recognized.

Lastly, is a review of the Moorish troops, outside the walls of Morocco. This spectacle differs wholly from an European notion of a "review." Instead of the formal manoeuvres of our well-disciplined armies, the barbaric habits of the desert give a romantic air of freedom to the meeting. The "review" is not so much, in fact, an inspection, as it is a kind of tourney, in which both inspector and inspected prove, by mimic conflicts, their respective strength and skill. In our engravings, the mob army will be seen forward in picturesque array, witnessing the tilting of picked men of their tribes. Such is a specimen of the exercises by which these semi-barbaric troops seek to prepare themselves for contests with the highly-disciplined armies of Europe.

concise form of instruction to those who will undertake or self-impose the drudgery of what Logier very aptly called "a mock science," namely, Thorough Bass. It is an extract of a larger work entitled "Practical Harmony," in the absence of which the foot-notes or references of the present pages are useless; this is a defect, but otherwise a good deal of information may be gleaned from them. The same author's "Practical Exercises on Pianoforte Preluding," contains nothing worthy of either praise or censure. Preluding is improvising, which cannot be taught by any rules.

TAKE HER: SHE HATH LONG BEEN OURS. Ballad; written by F. W. N. Bayley, Esq.; composed by WELLINGTON G. GUERNSEY. Monro and May.

A very graceful, flowing melody in B flat, well harmonised. If there be any fault in it, it consists in the too-frequently recurring modulation into the dominant of its relative minor, which, in some slight degree, produces an unpleasant monotony. The fifth of the key might have been advantageously resorted to, particularly in the fifteenth and sixteenth bars of the strain.

REMINISCENCES OF BURNS. Fantasia for the pianoforte; composed in honour of the Burns' Festival on the banks of the Doon, and inscribed to the Sons of the Poet. By Ricardo Linter. D'Almaine and Co, Soho-square.

A very brilliant and effective fantasia, upon some of the most popular Scotch airs which are identified with the immortal bard. The treatment of "Scots wha hae," and "Ye banks and braes," pleases us the best, but all the others are also very neatly and cleverly arranged. The lithographed title-page is one of the most beautiful things we have ever seen.

YOU TOLD ME THAT YOU LOV'D ME. Ballad; written by EDWARD MOXHAM; composed by ANNE BLAKE. Chappell, London.

This is a simple flowing melody, not over marked by originality—for we can say of some passages with The Stranger, "I have heard that air before, but it was to other words." It nevertheless cannot fail to please when sung with grace and feeling.

THE PRACTICAL ORGANIST. Edited by J. G. HERZOG. R. Cocks and Co.

This is a truly valuable work, and will prove of vast utility to those who devote their study to the noblest of instruments, and at the same time to the more intellectual parts of melodic counterpoint, with which the various portions of this first number abound. At page 6, there is a little bit of learned affectation shown in the use of the terms "Ionian mode" and "Mixolydian mode"—in the first place, we know not accurately what the ancient Greeks meant by them, and in the next, if we did, there is no application of them to modern harmony, seeing that they did not understand counterpoint! The concluding voluntary contains many passages of ingenious contrivance, and is a composition which reflects the highest credit upon its author, Geissler. The fugue and interweaving of the double subjects are most masterly.

THE CREATION: an Oratorio composed by JOSEPH HAYDN, newly arranged for the Piano Forte by JOHN BISHOP. R. Cocks and Co. This magnificent oratorio was first performed in the year 1798, at the Schatzburg Palace, but did not appear in this country until 1800, when, as Mr. Bishop informs us in his Preface, "the score arrived by a King's messenger from Vienna on Saturday the 22nd of March, at nine o'clock in the evening; was copied into parts by Mr. Thomas Goodwin for 120 performers, rehearsed, and performed at Covent Garden Theatre on the Friday following under the direction of Mr. John Ashley, and Sons." There certainly was no loss of time here.

With Mr. Bishop's accustomed and praiseworthy reverence for a great man's thoughts, he has spared evidently no pains in taking his text from the most authentic sources, and, as he says himself, has endeavoured (succeeded, we would say) to embody every essential point in the original score, published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig; avoiding, on the one hand, the introduction of needless difficulties, and, on the other, the presenting the world with so puerile an arrangement, as to leave no traces of the grandeur of the author's conceptions. One great excellence of Mr. Bishop's compressions from score is the clearness with which he preserves the march of the parts—there is no slovenliness—the orchestral partition might be written back again from his adaptations without any material deviation from the original. This alone would prove the superiority of his ability for the tasks which his liberal and judicious publishers have so successfully employed him in. We hope to see much more at his hands.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—This house is to open on the 1st of October with a strong operatic and ballet company. Amongst the artists already engaged are Madame Balfe, Miss Delcy, Miss Romer, Miss Rainforth, Miss Poole, and the charming Anna Thillon, whom we fear Mr. Maddox will very much miss at the next opening of the Princess's. Carlotta Grisi and Dumilatre, with others of considerable note, will support the ballet. The gentlemen vocalists, with some probable additions, will be Borraai, Stretton, and Harrison.

MR. BALFE.—This prolific and popular composer is now busily engaged, in conjunction with the author of his last libretto (Mr. Bunn), in the composition of a new opera.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—The alterations which the new lessee, Mr.

Webster, of the Haymarket, is making in the interior of this house are most judicious. We have more than once deplored the ignorance of theatrical architects; but in this instance we have every reason to approve of the skill and taste exhibited in the construction of the boxes, the lines of which will all radiate from the centre of the stage, by which every person will be enabled to have a full view of the actors and the scenery. In most of our theatres the plan of the side boxes is quite absurd.

MADAME GRISI.—Great squabbling, disappointment, and rage have taken place between this imperious cantatrice and the managers of the Italian Opera at Paris. The lady, if she could have her way, would have no principal tenor but Mario. Moriani is certainly a dangerous man by his side.

We are glad to find that Covent Garden, which it was feared was for ever closed against theatrical entertainments, has been let to Laurent, by whom it will be opened early in October. M. Laurent originally introduced the Promenade Concerts into this country; and as he has had much experience in theatrical matters, there is no doubt that he will produce an entertainment worthy of patronage. M. Laurent, we hear, begins with Promenade Concerts on a grand scale, and at Christmas he intends to try dramatic performances.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The first of September completed that which the twelfth of August began, and grouse and partridge-shooting have cleared the town of the few good men and true that yachting and cricket had left it. In the sporting circles the solitude is complete, as perfect as it is in the social; which is as entire as anything probably that has yet been accomplished in the way of a vacuum. The river sleeps from the stroke of the lusty wageman, and the red Indian is encamped at Lord's. The metropolitan beau braves the breeze of foreign climes; the metropolitan belle is found by the waters of far Baden-Baden. St. James's is as funereal as though it were St. Sepulchre's; and the echoes of May-Fair grow blue-moulted. Such is town, from which men fly as if the cholera had made head-quarters in Trafalgar-square, and we crave the reader's leave to join in the retreat. It is the classical month for leaving town; Horace turned his back on Rome—"horis Septembrisibus;" an autumn by the Tiber didn't suit his constitution; because, very probably, he had taken enough out of it during the antecedent season. Michaelmas is the countersign of the rural—the pass-word from the city to the shade. It is well—for we are stanch Septemberers—it is well to go forth when filberts and partridges are brown, into the fields which have put on russet, when the very geese are no longer verdant.

And thought but the spirit of Jockies is green.

In short, when there is nothing of that spoony tint to be met with but a green-gage—a vegetable that like a good horse cannot be of a bad colour. It is excellent to rally out on the first of September, bedight, like Master Hawthorn, in "Love in a Village;" but the pleasure is not communicable; you can't transfer the effects of your dog and your gun by mesmeric manipulations to the columns of a newspaper, and thence to the patient-reader. You might send him a brace of birds, indeed, which would be part of their effects (if you are not a Cockney), but the soul-stirring influence of the stubble and the stanch pointer, are things only to be imagined. For this reason, we turn to matters of fact, cordially wishing you lots of sport what time you take your pleasure with.

The nut-brown partridges and brilliant pheasants.

The list of national sports, or contests of skill, science, and manhood, is a meagre one at this season of the year. Yachting and rowing, as far as regards wager-matches, are at an end—cricket nevertheless flourishes, and every day gives rise to displays of the noble game. These, however, bear for the most part, during the present week, more of a local character, than issues in which the public is interested, and therefore do not require especial notice.

The turf has been barren of any affairs of moment. We had the Warwick Autumn Meeting; but its chief feature was a handicap—the Leamington Stakes—won by a three-year-old, carrying 4st. 10lbs. It is a pity Lord Exeter had not named his Algonquin for the Leger, as he would have made a nice companion for Red Deer—now third favourite—handicapped for the Chester Cup at four stone! Rumour is very busy about the past Derby and approaching St. Leger. For the latter it is whispered there is more than one nomination now in the market in the category of Running Rein and Leander. No doubt every suspected animal will be carefully examined. Is it squeamishness that prevents the parties overtly connected with certain four-year-olds that ran in the last Derby and Oaks being requested to refrain from visiting Tattersall's, and other places resorted to by racing gentlemen? There is little doubt now entertained as to Ratan having been made safe—the plot will presently come out, supported by all the characters. In the meantime, Samuel Rogers, his joc, has been suspended from riding for the Duke of Richmond and Lord George Bentinck. It would be premature to give the names of the individuals said to be implicated in the affair; they may be innocent; they are so to be regarded till proved to be guilty. It is fit to observe, however, that they do not now attend Tattersall's. The racing for the approaching week is confined to minor meetings, of which there will be plenty. The Leger, however, will cast its shadows before the all-important issue; of these we shall make our horoscope.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The only betting of any consequence was on the St. Leger, in which we have two or three movements to record. Scott's horses were backed in a hot against the field at even, and Ithuriel and The Princess for large sums at the prices returned below. The other two—for to the misfortune of the innocent public it includes also Hay Mornus and Valerian—were at a discount. If we add that Red Deer was in steady favour at 7 to 1, and that Feigh-a-Ballagh was backed frequently at 11 and 12 to 1, we shall have noticed all the leading points of a very flat afternoon.

THE MARLBOROUGH CLUB AND GEORGE V. THE SOUTH HANTS CLUB AND GROUND.—This most excellent match was played on Thursday and Friday, upon Dray's ground at Southampton. The exhibition of play in every department of this match was a high character. The Marlborough went in first, and was remarkable for the very beautiful display of hitting by Burdett, and the firm and steady play of Dean, between whom the large number of 87 runs were scored, notwithstanding the fine bowling of Mr. Mynn, Day, Sir F. Balfour, Rodie, and Phil. The innings amounted to 143, whilst, such are the chances of the game, in their second "hands" the whole eleven were unable to obtain more than 45. The South Hants side scored 107 and 55, winning the match by five wickets.

THE DOMESTICS OF HIGH ELMS MANSION, WITH SIR J. W. LUBBOCK, BART., AGAINST THE TADSWORTH OF DOWN, KENT, WITH J. SMITH, ESQ.—This match, which was looked forward to with considerable interest, came off on Tuesday last in High Elms Park; the ground was in excellent order and the weather favourable. The game commenced at ten o'clock, by the High Elms side going in, scoring 60 for the first innings. At two o'clock they died, and resumed the game at three o'clock, and finished at six. The result was—First innings, High Elms, 61; Down, 76. Second innings, High Elms, 61; Down, 62. The school children of the parishes of Down, Farnborough, and Cadham, with an assembly of well-dressed persons were present to witness the match. Lady Lubbock, with her usual generosity, distributed 300 buns, with tea and coffee, to the school children of the above parishes; and, in conclusion, the juvenile branches sang "God save the Queen," and "Rule Britannia." It gives us great pleasure to record instances of gentlemen not hesitating to mix with persons of lower station in the truly English game of cricket; it cannot fail to produce benefit to both parties.

On Monday a match was played at the Northampton Ground, Lower-road, Islington, between the Islington and City Clubs; the City Club went in first, and obtained 75 runs. The Islington followed, and made 73. The City Club, in their second innings, increased their score to 231, when their opponents gave up the game in favour of the City.

CRICKET MATCH.—A grand cricket match is to be played on Tushridge Well-ground on Thursday and Friday next. The contending parties will be the married men against the bachelors of all England. The names of the players are—A. Mynn, Esq., and Messrs. Lillywhite, Sewell, Good, Burdett, Hammond, Pickett, Dean, Adams, and Day. The single party consists of R. Kenyon, Esq., W. Mynn, Esq., C. Colson, Esq., and Messrs. Bushby, Hawkins, Butler, Hally, Pick, Miller, Martingell, and Wrennan, who is known in.

THE GREAT SWIMMING MATCH.—On Monday morning the contest between Pesters (the London) and Beunslow (the Oxford champions) came off in the Serpentine, in the presence of a great number of spectators. The conditions of the match were to swim once across to a flag, and return to the starting place. Both were freely harked at even, and the signal for starting being given, the men plunged into the water, and swam away with great swiftness, and kept an equal position for some distance. Pesters was the first who reached the flag on the opposite side; they returned for the winning goal, both making strenuous exertions, Pesters slightly in advance; and, after an admirable contest, Pesters came in the winner by twenty yards. The race came off as early as seven o'clock.

ABUNDANCE OF GAME IN THE ROYAL PRESERVES AT WINDSOR.—Game of every description was never known to be so extremely plentiful in the royal preserves at Windsor, the Norfolk and Farnham farms, in the Home and Great Parks, at Windsor, and at Rhipley farm, as this season. Some idea may be formed of the immense number of pheasants now in the crown preserves, when it is stated that not less than 2,250 pheasants were reared by hand; having been hatched by hand from 100,000 eggs, in the spring, at the several farms belonging to the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, independently of the very large number which were bred wild. These 2,250 pheasants, which were reared chiefly under the superintendence of Mr. Turner, of Virginia Water, her Majesty's head game-keeper, were turned out on the royal preserves at the proper time, and have since thrived amazingly. It is now no unusual sight, while walking, during the evening, in the vicinity of the preserves in the Park, to see from thirty to forty pheasants feeding at the same spot. Hares and partridges are also most plentiful. Their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and Prince William of Prussia bagged upwards of fifty brace of partridges during the short time they shot over the preserves on Monday last, the first day of the season.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

We understand that despatches have been received positively countermanning the embarkation of the 1st battalion of the 6th and 61st Regiments, under orders to India. Even the baggage of the regiments, which were on board, have been directed to be re-embarked, and the chartered ships now at Cove are to proceed to their destination without the troops.

WOODWICH, Sept. 4.—The Edith steam frigate, Commander Walter G. B. Eatwell, commissioned at Woolwich last week, and having a crew of 115 men, has been ordered to be made ready for sea with the greatest despatch. We believe the Edith is intended to form one of the royal squadron to accompany her Majesty to Scotland. The Volcano steam vessel, at present in the river undergoing repair, is ordered to be ready by the 15th instant, and, if completed in time, is expected to form one of the vessels of the royal squadron. The Daedalus, late 40 gun frigate, is now nearly ready for sea, and is to be commissioned. The whole of her guns, forming a very powerful armament, are on board.

We are sorry to announce the death of Colonel Joseph Logan, of the 66th Regiment, with which he had served in India for the last ten years. Col. Logan expired at Dover, on Sunday evening, in his fifty-sixth year.

POLICE.

A TALE OF MYSTERY.—On Tuesday, Martha Boddington, alias Garrett, alias Harris, alias Smith, William Lear, and Edward Collins, were charged at Queen's-square Police-office, with being concerned, with two others not in custody, in stealing a pianoforte, two chests of drawers, and other articles to a considerable amount, the property of the late Alfred Dark. A long investigation took place, in the course of which it appeared that Dark lived in Orchard-street, Westminster, with Eliza Smith, having been separated from his wife, to whom he made an allowance. Dark had been brought home dead, and the goods in question had been removed. Mr. Barrett, the magistrate, did not think the case very strong against the prisoners, and allowed them to be liberated on bail. Since then some further particulars have transpired, but we forbore from going into them minutely, in the present state of the case. A report, it appears, has obtained general belief in the neighbourhood, that a crime, resembling in its leading features the case of Mr. Wenzel, who was murdered by John Thwait, has been committed, and this impression has by no means subsided, although the case has undergone an investigation at Queen's-square Police-court. The opinion of that portion of the detective police who have looked into some circumstances connected with the case, points strongly to the conclusion that a deed of violence has been committed. Last Monday, a man who knew Dark called at the house where he had lived, in Pentonville, and finding it shut up, made inquiry in the neighbourhood. He learned that the previous morning some persons had brought a horse and cart, and had removed a quantity of furniture. The horse on the cart was turned on the wrong side, but this having excited curiosity, a person had, unperceived, turned the horse, and gained possession of the name and residence on it. The individual who was making the inquiry gave information to Mrs. Dark, and ultimately the individual went to Orchard-street, where he saw a man named Lear, an associate of Dark, the woman Eliza Harris, with whom Dark lived, and the servant Eliza Smith. The individual who had received information that Dark was dead made inquiry, and was told by Lear that this was not true. Lear admitted that a dead body had been brought into the place, and that it was lying in the house, but that it was the body of a man who had been killed by Dark in a quarrel about Eliza Harris, and that Dark was out of the way in consequence of the occurrence. Altogether the explanation was so unsatisfactory, that information was given to the police, and the result was, that the above persons were taken into custody. On examining the dead body in the house, it was found to be the body of Alfred Dark, who had apparently met with his death from a gun-shot wound. The explanation now given was, that Dark had been out shooting, and that his gun went off accidentally and killed him. The belief that Dark met his death from foul play, is strengthened from the fact, that Dark was seen in the neighbourhood of Henton with a very large sum of money in his possession.

ANOTHER MAN WITH A CARPET BAG.—At Union Hall Police court on Monday, Peter M. Weller, a fashionably dressed young Irishman, was charged with robbing public-houses and taverns in that district, and also at the west-end of the town. The court was thronged with parties who had been plundered. The rejoined account of the detection of the prisoner will show that he is only guilty of "the man with the carpet bag," who, it will be recollected, rendered himself so notorious a few years ago by the number of robberies he committed. It appeared that on Monday night week the prisoner, with a carpet bag in his hand, lived at the King's Head in the Borough, saying that he had just come off a journey. The next day, the chambermaid seeing him on his knees in one of the adjoining rooms, he pretended to be at prayers, but it was discovered that he had stolen open the boxes, from which he took a sovereign and some articles of jewellery. He was taken into custody in the house, and the stolen articles found in his possession. On the Sunday preceding, the prisoner hired a bed at the Horn of Waterloo, in the Waterloo-road, and the following day, when the family had risen from their beds, and gone down stairs, the prisoner took an opportunity of entering the maid's bedroom, and breaking open the boxes, from which he took money and various articles of jewellery, some of which were found in his possession when taken into custody at the King's Head. Mr. Thomas Robins stated that he lodged at Perry's Coffee-house, Seymour-street, Knightsbridge, and that on last Tuesday week the prisoner came to that house with a carpet bag in his hand, and stated that he had just arrived by the train from Manchester. He engaged a bed, and witness left home early the next morning, and when he returned in the evening he found that his room had been entered in his absence, that his trunk had been forced open, and plundered of five sovereigns, a silver watch with a gold chain, a Chesterfield coat, and two silk handkerchiefs. Upon inquiry, it was found the prisoner had descended the same morning, soon after the departure of witness from the house. The witness here identified the coat worn by the prisoner as his property, and he was compelled to take it off, which he was unwilling to do while at the bar. The best water at the Gloucester Coffee-house in Piccadilly, stated that a well-dressed young man had a bed there, and that when all the inmates had retired to rest, he went into the room of several gentlemen who were sleeping there, and succeeded in robbing them of their purses, containing the sum of £14, a gold watch, and other articles, with which he got clear off. The witness added, that the prisoner resembled the thief, but he would not undertake to swear positively to his person. It was stated that information had appeared in the Blue and City of six different robberies of public houses at Manchester by a man answering the description of the prisoner, with a carpet bag. Mr. Cunningham said that he should commit the prisoner on the three first charges, and that he should be brought up again, and that probably when publicity was given of the examination in the newspapers, other parties who had been robbed would attend. The prisoner requested the return of a proper book found in his possession when he was taken into custody. The application for his restoration was opposed by the publican, who stated that since the prisoner was taken into custody he had ascertained that several robberies had been committed in Dublin by a man answering the prisoner's description, and that he had reason for believing that the prisoner would be found to have been part of the produce of one of them. The prisoner, who seemed very depressed in spirits, was then conveyed back to goal.

HEARTLESS ROBERT BY A PRETENDED SOLICITOR.—At Worship-street, on Monday, Francis Croker, a middle-aged man, of shabby-genteel appearance, was charged with having obtained, by false pretences, the sum of £14, and a gold wedding ring from a young woman named Mary Judd. The complaint stated that she had been living for about three years in the service of a respectable tradesman in the City-road, and a short time ago she became acquainted with a young man who professed a warm regard for her, and, after some correspondence, made her an offer of marriage. She consented to the proposal, and arranged other particulars for the ceremony, which was appointed to take place on August, her lover presented her with a wedding-ring, and provided for the happy occasion; but before the time stated, he thought proper to revoke from the engagement, and had since married another woman. Under these circumstances, she was advised by her friends to seek legal redress for the injury she had sustained, and one of her fellow-servants recommended the prisoner as a person qualified to institute the necessary proceedings on her behalf. The prisoner soon afterwards called upon her, and after representing himself as a solicitor residing in Thatched-roof-house, Islington, said that he was willing to prosecute the suit, but required some security for the payment of his costs, and proposed that she should deposit with him the wedding-ring on that account. She accordingly gave him the ring, which the prisoner took away, and about a week after, he called again, and said he had served the defendant with a copy of a writ, and that everything was going on favourably, but that he had already incurred costs to the amount of fifteen shillings, and on being paid that sum, he would proceed to her the ring which he held as a security. He immediately paid him the money, and the prisoner promised to transmit her back the ring on the following day, but he had failed to do so, and having ascertained that no proceedings whatever had been commenced, witness came to this court on Saturday, to apply for redress, and the magistrate gave directions which resulted in the apprehension of the prisoner.—Holland, one of the warrant-officers of the court, stated that he proceeded that morning to the lodgings of the prisoner, who, on learning the charge against him, admitted, after some hesitation, that he had pledged the ring, upon which he took him into custody. On being searched, several duplicates were found upon him, one of which related to the article in question, which was pledged on the very day it came into his possession. There was also found upon him a letter addressed to the complainant, containing a worthless house ring, and stating that it was the same ring she had deposited in his hands.—Frederick Fox, a pawnbroker's assistant, produced the complainant's ring, and identified the prisoner as having pledged it for £4, in the name of John Smith, on the 15th ult.—The prisoner, in his defence, said that he had been thirty years employed in public offices, and had served articles as a solicitor at Mr. Abbott's, in Chancery-lane, since which he had been a reporter at police-courts, and had occasionally assisted Mr. Gurney, the eminent short-hand writer, but unfortunately he had got over head and ears in difficulty, in consequence of his living with a lady. With respect to the action on the part of the complainant, he said that he had employed a person to do the business for him, and he denied that he had represented himself to be a solicitor.—Mr. Brougham said, he should send the case before a jury, but he should remand the prisoner at present for the production of further evidence. Croker was re-examined on Wednesday, and after some further evidence had been given, was fully committed.

ADAPTATION AND INGENUOUS ROBBERY.—Last week we gave an account of a shameful trick played upon a Mrs. Brandall, of No. 26, Agnes-street, Waterloo-road, by means of which three men contrived to rob the house. Two of them, named William Cooper and George Jackson, alias Costello, have since been apprehended, and were examined at Union-hall on Tuesday, charged with stealing £12 10s. in money, together with six silver spoons, two gold wedding-rings, a gold brooch, a coral brooch and locket, and several other articles, the property of Edward Brandall.—Mrs. Charlotte Brandall stated that her husband was a carpenter. Between two and three o'clock on Tuesday she was informed by Sarah Cooper, the nurse who attended her in her confinement, that two gentlemen wanted to see her on very urgent business. When the nurse entered the room, she was closely followed by a tall, well-dressed man, who said he came to inquire her of something that had befallen her husband. She most anxiously inquired, if he had met with an accident; but the reply was, "No, not an accident, but something worse; he has been taken into custody for robbing his son, players, and I have a search-warrant to examine your house for the stolen property." He then expressed a desire to commence the search, and as she was showing him the way up stairs, she saw another man standing near the street door, and that man was the prisoner Cooper. They went up stairs into the lodgers' rooms, and he wanted her to open the boxes and drawers, but she informed him that she had not the keys. When they got into her room, the man ordered her to open her boxes, and to give him up all the papers therein, as they no doubt would throw some light on the robberies her husband had committed. She then unlocked her drawers, in which there was a green purse, containing £12 10s. He took possession of it, saying that it was part of the produce of the robbery, and he afterwards took six silver spoons, and a small jewel-case, containing two gold wedding-rings, and other articles of jewellery. When he had ransacked the place, he asked her upon her oath, if she had exhibited everything to him; and on her replying in the affirmative, he said that she must be careful of what she said, for that she would have to make the same statement again before their superiors. Having placed the money, spoons, and jewel-case in his pocket, he then inquired for a sheet of writing paper, saying that he should write a letter to the inspector at the Tower-street station-house, where her husband was locked up, requesting that every indulgence might be granted to him consistent with his late custody; and he then proposed that she should take the note to the station-house, adding that probably the inspector would liberate him until the day of examination. He then called the prisoner Cooper, saying that he would accompany her to Tower-street. She said she was afraid she would not be able to go so far. He said that Cooper would assist her, and that the sooner it was done the sooner would her husband be released. Having thrown on her bonnet and shawl, she, with Cooper, left the house, leaving the tall man behind, who said that he would wait their return. When they got to the Hero of Waterloo Tavern, Cooper said there was an officer waiting for him in the tavern, but he should go there, and desired her to wait at a little distance until he came out. He left her, and finding he did not come back, she hastened off to her house, found the street-door wide open, and the tall man gone. She then suspected it was all a plan laid to rob the house, and her suspicions were verified on her husband shortly afterwards returning home.—In reply to Mr. Trull, the complainant said that she should know the tall man who ransacked her drawers again, but that Jackson was not the man; that Jackson, whose real name was Costello, formerly lodged in the same house with her and her husband in Agnes-street.—Sarah Cooper said she could speak positively to the identity of Cooper. Sergeant Langley, of the detective police, stated that he took the prisoners into custody walking together in the Westminster-road. Jackson gave a fictitious name and address. Jackson was a returned transport, and if the prisoners were remanded he should be enabled to obtain further evidence, and very likely succeed in the apprehension of the "tall man" who was such a prominent character in the robbery. The prisoners, who said they should reserve their defence, were remanded.

TWO OMNIBUS DRIVERS COMMITTED TO THE TREADMILL.—At Marlborough-street, on Tuesday, Henry Fowler, the driver and proprietor of a Kensington omnibus, and W. Miles, driver, in the employ of Mr. Halls, jun., part proprietor of a Bristol omnibus, were summoned for furious driving, whereby the lives of her Majesty's subjects had been endangered. Police-constable 183 C proved that he saw the defendants plying down Regent-street, and racing together. When opposite the Reform Club-house, one of the vehicles was forced on the pavement by the other, and went on in this way for some distance before the wheel came again on the road. A gentleman belonging to the club, who was walking in Pall-mall at the time, very nearly sustained an injury in consequence of this occurrence. The defendants both pleaded guilty. Mr. Hardwick said it had already been ascertained that persons guilty were wholly insufficient to restrain drivers of public vehicles from pursuing their dangerous system of competition in total disregard of the lives and safety of their passengers. He should, therefore, in all cases of an aggravated character, at once send the offending parties to prison. The case before him appeared wholly without circumstances of mitigation, and he should at once send upon his determination by sending both defendants to hard labour for one month. The defendants appeared thunderstruck at the decision.

We have to announce the death of Mr. Francis Bailey, F.R.S., President of the Royal Astronomical Society, who expired yesterday week, at his residence in Tavistock-place, Russell-square, in the 71st year of his age. His scientific attainments were of the highest order; he was a doctor of civil law, member of the Royal Irish Academy, a fellow of the Linnean and Geological Societies, and a fellow of the Royal society, having been elected of that body in 1821. His death will be regretted by a large circle of friends and acquaintances, by whom he was deservedly esteemed. Mr. Bailey, it will be recollected, repeated the experiments of Cavendish with the Torricellian tube, with all the improvements of modern artists, and completed the same in 1821.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

SEPTEMBER.

Now comes space the Evening of the year,
With all its sunset glories spread around—
How beautiful the glowing disk appears,
On that high waterfall, whose distant sound,
Murmurs a diapason to the song
Of wailing treble pipes the groves around,
Which black-bird, thrush and woodcock sweetly blow!
Poor innocents! they do it not for show.
O'rgans,—but from some inward thankfulness
That they are free from growing Man's designs,
Who at this season loves his mistress,
On many a partridge-better, and doth consign
The parent, or the offspring bird, or male,
To be hereditary breeders of his kind!

A CONSIDERATION ABOUT CAPTAIN WARNER'S DISCOVERY.

A prophet, of Benslow, H. Jourard, imagines that he has discovered Captain Warner's secret. The destructive power which Captain Warner employed, according to H. Jourard, consists of a conical rocket, made in this way:—The head of it is composed of a hollow iron cone, of great strength, containing a kilogramme of fulminate of mercury, on which is placed the usual charge of the rocket, of which the body is twice as long as the cone in general size. He discharges his projectile from a directing tube from the port-hole of the vessel, and on a level with the water, so that his projectile, skimming along the waves, which support a portion of its weight, fires itself on the side of the enemy's vessel, where it bursts, when the fire reaches the fulminating powder, and making an immense opening in it, sinks it at once. The proper range of this rocket is only three or four miles, but Captain Warner imagines he can send it five or six by discharging it from a cannon.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The Boston Mail says:—"It appears there is a man out in Mississippi named Carey, who goes it strong upon a fife, and who has lately filed the robes of the Concordia Intelligence into fits. Hear how he takes of Carey's execution:—"We have come to the conclusion that out of his life he can get more music, and get it larger and stronger, and more of it, and put more taste in it, and play lower, and go up higher, and give more notes, and catchets, ketches, and sky-rockets, change the keys, and jingle them with better grace, imitate more partridges and young chickens, and render the high notes softer, and the low notes softer, and take off his hat more gracefully while he is doing it, and look at the people while it is going on, on his life, better than any other man living. So mote it be, and so it is."

LETTER OPENING TWO CENTURIES AGO.

It appears by an extract from the journals of the House of Commons, 200 years ago, that the Government of that day, exercised not only the power of ordering the opening of private letters, but of dispatches addressed to the representatives of foreign powers. It is, too, a singular coincidence, that a "Mr. Greave" was then, as now, the chairman of committees, and that there was then, as now, a prominent member—"Mr. Benjamin White," who took part in the discussion. The extract verbatim is as follows:—"The Saturday, August 2, 1645. Prayers. Mr. Greave acquainted the house that a Packet from the King of Portugal, to his resident here, was come to his hands; and, it is thereupon ordered, That the Packet be referred to the Committee of Examinations, to be opened by that Committee: And that the Portugal resident have notice hereof; that the same may be opened in his presence, or in the presence of any of his servants, which he shall think fit to send for that purpose."

A NEW IDEA FOR THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

A recent visitor to the falls of Niagara, makes the following suggestion to the Editor of an American Paper. "The spray which rises from the Horse-shoe Fall to a great height, I think, contains a jet of hydrogen gas, and I regretted much that I had not brought a ball of platinum sponge, which I had prepared, with a tube and with a pin, to place in the jet, thus igniting the gas, and producing a blaze which would surpass in the splendour of its great combustions the great hydrogen walls on the great Kanawha. The fall would make a splendid bonfire; and if I am right in supposing a column of hydrogen to pass upward from this cataract, the blaze would be almost perpetual."

AN UNFORTUNATE WHIST PLAYER.

Reverend Twiss, in his life of Lord Eldon, gives a characteristic anecdote exhibiting great presence of mind in explaining away a seeming inconsistency. Sir Fletcher Norton had the reputation of not adhering strictly to truth. It was imputed to him that he said, "My dear lady is the most unfortunate player at cards that ever was known." She has played at what for twenty years, and never had a trump. "No," said somebody, "how can that be? she must have had a trump when she dealt." "Oh, as to that," said he, "she lost every deal during the whole twenty years."

SHAKESPEARE A RESIDENT IN THE CITY.

In Hunter's "New Illustrations of Shakespeare" appears the following paragraph:—"There is evidence of the most decisive nature that, on October 1, in the fortieth year of Queen Elizabeth, which answers to the year 1598, Shakespeare was one of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Helen, Bishopsgate, and consequently a near neighbour of Crosby Hall. It is an assessment-roll of that date, for levying the first of three entire subsidies which were granted to the Queen in the 29th of her reign. It is valuable, also, inasmuch as it gives us the names of those his neighbours, men with whom he must of necessity have had some intercourse—men, at least, to whom he would himself be an object of curiosity: among them we find Sir John Spenser, Dr. Richard Taylor, Dr. Peter Turner, Dr. Rowland Jordan, all well-known physicians—Doctor Cullimore, Robert Honeywood, and the heads of the wealthy families of Read and Robinsons."

A RELIC OF NAPOLEON.

A gentleman residing at Woolwich has recently become possessed of a manuscript of extraordinary interest—the rough draught of Bonaparte's celebrated letter to the Prince Regent on his surrender to the English, in 1815. In this manuscript there are two or three verbal alterations: in the sentence "M'assesseur sur la cendre Britannique," the words "la cendre" are erased, and "le foyer" substituted; and in the last sentence, "the most powerful, the most constant, and the most generous of my enemies," the words "the most constant" are interlined, being probably an afterthought of the Emperor's. In a note appended to it, General Gourgaud states that it is the "rough draught of the letter which the Emperor sent me to carry from the Isle of Aix, to the Prince Regent of England on the 14th of July, 1815."

LORD BROUGHTON AND LA HARPE.

The Almanach du Mois a monthly review, contains in its last number an anecdote relating to Lord Brougham. "Some years since the noble lord wrote a treatise to prove that the Emperor Alexander had ever proved himself by his conduct to be a true pupil of La Harpe. It is generally known that the Emperor Alexander had for a preceptor General La Harpe, but Lord Brougham believing that it was La Harpe, the author, discovered a number of curious similarities between the master and his pretended pupil. The work having been concluded, Lord Brougham addressed a copy to M. Arago, and requested his opinion on it. 'It is a charming book,' replied M. Arago. 'There is, unfortunately, however, one error, and that is that the father of the Emperor Alexander was not La Harpe the writer, but La Harpe the general.' . . . With that exception, I repeat," said M. Arago, "that your treatise is excellent."

HISTORICAL REMINISCENCES OF MONTECO.

The commercial intercourse between France and Morocco commenced in the reign of Louis XIV. Colbert was the first to encourage the French merchants established on the African coast, at the factory called the Bastion de France, to carry their dealings into the empire of Morocco. The first trade was by barter. At a later period this dealing assumed a more regular course, and continued for a century without any serious differences arising between the two countries. In the reign of Louis XVI., the Emperor having unjustly confiscated the cargo of a French ship at Mogadore, M. de Cheneux, the French Consul-General for the Levant, residing at Constantinople, had orders to go to him, and make strong remonstrances. This mission produced no effect, for the revolution broke out in France, and turned the attention of the Government to more serious things. It was not till long after the expedition to Egypt that the intercourse between the two countries was renewed; but from that time till 1830 it continued upon a friendly footing.

BOW-MEETING AT PRADOE, NEAR OSWESTRY.

Yesterday week, an elegant archery fête was given at Pradoc, the delightful seat of the Hon. Thomas Kemyn, when the Royal British Bowmen made a very interesting display of their prowess. On approaching the scene of festivities, at was exhilarating to the eye and heart to see on the green slopes and knolls those brave tents surrounding the great tent, with their banners floating in the morning breeze; and to catch the distant sounds of music from among the groves, now just beginning to be edged with the golden embroidery of earliest autumn. Scarcely had the beams of the forenoon sun begun to gladden the leaves, and gleam on the sparkling water, when two pretty little vessels displayed their white sails and playful streamers, when splendid squarons began to pour in their white and fashionable guests, who soon filled the sloping lawn, those of the Society being attired in the uniform of "London green." All being suitably received by the hospitable host and hostess, the trumpet sounded to the important business of the day, and the archery commenced with far more than common interest, it being a strenuous contention for the two Royal Prizes given by her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria—that for the ladies being a richly-jewelled turquoise serpent bracelet, value £235; and for the gentlemen a massive sword splendid silver salver, of the same value. The Lady Paramount was Mrs. Richdolph, of Chirk Castle; the Lady Patroness, the lady of the Rev. Thomas Hurst, rector of Westleiden, who at the last bow-meeting won the Prizes for best and Feather, which this day she wore, and right worthily did its brave honours here. The President was John Henson, Esq., of Pilsdon; and the Vice-President Sir William Williams Wynne, Bart. The society consists of 200 members, 57 only of whom were present; but the visitors were unusually numerous, and the day most successful a fine, absolutely without a cloud. The Royal British Bowmen's powerful hand were in attendance, and from time to time poured forth their rich and heart-string strains; particularly a melody composed in the Welsh style, called "Eryr Republianus," composed by Towlshend Manwaring, Esq., M.P., and arranged by Mr. Hughes, which was repeatedly executed; several sets of the most fashionable quadrilles and polkas, to which many of the company danced; and above all, a variety of the incomparable national melodies of their own native mountains. The shooting proceeded with vigour and animation, the ladies taking from target to target the distance of sixty yards, and the gentlemen one hundred. Strong and anxious was the interest excited whenever an arrow pierced near the bull's eye. At two the trumpet sounded to dinner, and the moving tide of well-dressed company advanced slow and gracefully towards the spacious feasting-tent, where, notwithstanding the restrictive rules of the society, four very long tables were sumptuously set out, crowded to excess, and profusion of richness with every delicacy of the season; among which were four branches of venison, and hot pasties of the same, and ten brace of grouse, together with all luscious viands, rich fruits, and rare wines. The number that sat down to these luxuries were 250, besides others who were elsewhere accommodated. The courteous attention of the honourable host and hostess, and their family, were very gratifying. Toasts of loyalty and conviviality followed; and among the songs was one composed and sung by the venerable Mr. Parker, of Oswestry, on the recent happy wedding in the Kenyon family, and in which our commemorative record is thus referred to:—

I have seen it in print, and its credibly stated,
Concerning our How-Meeting feast; and they say,
That we have already been well illustrated,
And published at large in the "News" of the day.

LADIES' BRACELET PRIZE, VALUE £25.

Another ballad, sung by Mr. Harcourt, of Buckinghamshire, and composed by the Rev. the Warden of Ruthin, to an Irish melody, on the legend of St.

Switin, elicited well-merited applause. After the repast, the contest was resumed with redoubled ardour; and after many admirable shots, the royal turquoise serpent bracelet was adjudged to Miss Isabella Thelwall. The massive silver to Thomas Lovett, Esq., of Fernhill. The gold medal for the best shooting of the year, to Miss Thelwall. The silver medal (second best) to Miss Fletcher. And the best shot, Miss Townsend. Tea was then served in the tents, after which the company promenaded in the grounds; and, at length, the carriage, of which there were seventy-six, glided away through the woodland scenery, as the last golden lights of the evening were leaving the smiling uplands.

Among the numerous guests were the Earl and Countess of Powis and the Ladies Herbert; Viscount Clive; Lord Kenyon and the Hon. Lloyd and Mrs. Kenyon; Lord Berwick and the Hon. Misses Hill, and the Hon. Major and Charles Hill; Hon. Captain, Mrs. and Misses Bridgman, and the Hon. George Bridgman; Hon. E. R. B. and Mrs. Frilding; Mr., Hon. Mrs., and the Misses Goddall; Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Lovett; Mr., Hon. Mrs., and Miss Heston; Sir Robert Curle; Sir Baldwin and Lady Leighton; Lady Edwards; General, Mrs., and the Misses Tremethere.

respectable family in the county of Westmeath, and graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, taking a degree of M.A. Subsequently, Mr. Purdon entered into mercantile speculation, and proceeded to Virginia, in America; an enterprise which, we regret to state, did not turn out as profitable as expected. He returned to Ireland, where he married one of the daughters of the late Alderman Archer, treasurer to the old Corporation of the City of Dublin, through whose interest he was nominated Governor of the Richmond Penitentiary, full twenty years since. His condescension, kindness, and good nature, have been duly appreciated by the Liberator and other traversers, for whose accommodation he gave up his private residence, taking one for his family in the immediate vicinity of Richmond.

THE SPHYNX BOAT-CLUB.

The second annual Scullers' Match for the Silver Challenge Sculls and Presentation Pin, came off on Wednesday week, from opposite Chiswick Church to Kew Bridge. Soon after starting, Messrs. Muxworthy and Fincham drew ahead of the other two competitors, and were scull and scull for nearly a quarter of a mile, when Mr. Muxworthy gained the lead, and arrived at Kew Bridge first, by about half-a-minute; Mr. Fincham, 2nd; Mr. Reid, third; and Mr. Adams, fourth. The latter was, at one period, in the second place, but was unable to retain it. The pair of silver sculls engraved above, are elegantly executed in silver: they are retained by the winner for one year, and then again contested for by the Club.

TEMPORARY CHURCH AT KENTISH TOWN, ST. PANCRAS.

The annexed view represents a church of wood which has just been erected in the district of Kentish-Town, St. Pancras, for the use of the congregation, while the parochial chapel is undergoing extensive alterations and enlargement. It is built entirely of wood, on brick foundations, and is the work of Mr. Peter Thompson, of Limehouse, who is largely concerned in preparing buildings of this description, and has a Treasury grant, allowing him to manufacture, free of duty, framed churches, chapels, schools, and dwellings, to export to her Majesty's various colonies. Although of considerable dimensions, and capable of accommodating 500 adults and 300 children, it has been prepared and erected in the course of one month; and was opened for divine service on Sunday last. A description of the building, which has been much admired, and does great credit to Mr. Thompson, may be interesting to our readers.

It consists of a tower, 10 feet square, surmounted by a belfry, forming the entrance to two lobbies, right and left, each 9 feet by 8 feet, communicating with the nave or choir, 60 feet long by 30 feet wide, divided from the side aisles by a range of columns, that support an open framed roof; the side aisles are each 60 feet long and 9 feet wide, thus making the whole width 48 feet. At the end of the nave or choir is the chancel, 30 feet long by 25 feet wide, terminating with a recessed communion, 15 feet wide by 6 feet deep. At the end of one aisle is the vestry, 8 feet by 6 feet; and at the end of the other is the robing-room, of the same dimensions, communicating with the pulpit.

The body of the church receives its light from two ranges of clerestory windows, of "vitreous cloth," the light from which, although subdued in tone, is very brilliant. The walls are formed in compartments, the inside finished with neat oak paper in panels, which has a quiet appearance, well adapted for its intended purpose. The outside panels and the entire of the roof are covered with "Croghan's Patent Asphalted Felt," a non-conductor of both heat and cold; the roofs being covered, as well as all the outside wood and the open roof inside, with "Jeffery's Patent Marine Glue," the colour of which on the wood has a fine rich effect, and it is the most perfect non-absorbent of moisture and non-conductor of electric fluid. The seats are all open benches.

The erection of this church will show that for the very limited sum of about 10s. per sitting, a congregation may be provided with a neat and comfortable church, so planned as to have all the essentials of Christian architecture, until they are enabled to erect structures of greater pretensions and more durable materials. And we think the subject of supplying temporary places of worship in some of our thickly-peopled manufacturing districts, while church building funds are in process of collection, too often a slow and tedious operation, well worthy of the attention of the authorities of the church, and the societies engaged in providing for the spiritual instruction of the people.

TEMPORARY CHURCH, KENTISH TOWN.

BADEN-BADEN.

This celebrated "Spa" is now in high season; and at this moment, probably, its visitors triple the ordinary population.

Baden is situated on the promontory of the Black Forest, between woody hills of the most inviting aspect, and in one of the most charming valleys close to the Oel river, which for a long time formed the frontier between Alemania and Rhenish Prussia. The town is not large; it numbers about six thousand inhabitants, but increases from year to year on account of the great influx of visitors who take the waters. The number of these visitors amounted in the year 1841 to 10,000, of which 3000 were Frenchmen and 2000 Englishmen. During winter there are about three or four hundred. Baden is second in rank to Wiesbaden and the most frequented German Spa. The Germans regard very much that there French manners and the French language are mostly in vogue. In addition to the above visitors, or invalids, immense crowds arrive (particularly on Sundays) from Strasbourg and Carlsruhe, either by steam boats or railway. The air is mild and salubrious.

Among the churches the parish church is the most remarkable. It was built in the 14th century, but burnt to the ground in the year 1688, and rebuilt in 1754. This church contains the tombs of the Catholic Markgraves of Baden since Bernard (1431), and those of Leopold William and Louis William, both celebrated warriors in the wars against the Turks. The former fought at Stahremberg and Mersburg against the Turks, and died in 1671, at Wursach, in Hungary. The latter, Prince Leopoldus, as he is generally called in the popular air, the most distinguished general of his time, made twenty-six campaigns, and was never conquered in the many battles he fought. He was the companion of Prince Eugene of Savoy, and died in 1707. The visitor can have no difficulty in discovering the place where he lies, for a monument, miserably executed by the sculptor Pigalle, at once points out the spot. Behind the church is the Antiquarian Hall, erected in the year 1818, and serves for the preservation of Roman antiquities found here. We see among the many remarkable antiquities a milestone, with the name of Marc Aurelius (Cæsarilla), several stones dedicated to Neptune, several others to Hercules, a bad copy of the altar of Mercury, the original of which is on the Staufenberg, tombs of Roman soldiers, &c. Opposite to the Antiquarian Hall is the Old Spa, near to it the Vapour Bath. Lately there has been erected a new saloon, not to be surpassed in grandeur and elegance; and not far from the Conversation Hall, which is the rendezvous, or the quarter, most frequented by Englishmen. The hot springs, of which there are thirteen, issue from the rock of the Castle Terrace, called

ARMS OF THE GRAND-DUCHY OF BADEN-BADEN.

Schnecken Garten, situated behind the church, and suitable pipes lead the water into the various baths in the town. The degree of temperature varies from 37 degrees to 84 degrees Reaumur (115 degrees to 153 degrees Fahrenheit), and the supply of hot water amounts to about 150,000 gallons per twenty-four hours. The principal spring, very close to the Antiquarian Hall, called the Ursprung (primitive spring), is covered in; the vault is the work of the Romans. The Stahl Bath (steel bath) are on the way to Lichtenthal.

The new castle, built in 1471, embellished in 1579, destroyed in 1689, and partly restored, is situated on a hill which commands the town, affording towards three sides the most magnificent view, viz., the Rheinhall (Rhine Valley), the valleys of Baden, and the environs. There are many paintings, mostly consisting of portraits of the Markgraves of Baden, whose dynasty was extinct in 1771. A part of the edifice is fitted up as a summer habitation for the Grand Duchess Duchess Stephanie, adopted daughter of Napoleon, the daughter of Josephine's brother-in-law, the Viscount de Beaumont, and widow of Grand Duke Charles, who died in 1818.

Contiguous to the castle is a small garden, laid out with exquisite taste. The most remarkable are the subterranean vaults and cells, constructed of stone, and provided with iron doors, regarding the origin of which, history makes no mention, but tradition has a thousand things to relate. At one time it was supposed that these subterranean vaults were Roman baths, at another that they were dungeons. At any rate, there are no visible traces of there ever having been old baths, although there is no doubt that their origin was Roman.

The Grand Duchess Stephanie has also a pavilion in that part of the town called Reck, once a Roman burial-ground: the public have access at any time to the delightful promenades there. Other handsome residences belonging to the Grand Duke Leopold, Duke of Hess, &c., are in the vicinity. The most remarkable and attractive of all places of public amusement are the promenades, the halls of conversation, the assembly rooms, the theatre, and the library, all clustered together, and which were planned by the celebrated Weinbrenner, in the year 1824. The afternoon and evening are the time when the most fashionable and brilliant company is to be seen.

The shady avenue which leads to the Conversation Hall is the banner of Baden. The building itself is divided into a variety of saloons, fitted up in the most splendid style: consisting of drawing rooms, dining-rooms, chess, and play-rooms; the latter are open from ten till one in the morning, and again from three till midnight. A Frenchman, M. Benassat, pays an annual rent of 45,000 florins (£5156) for permission to play; and in addition to the above rent, he has to fit up all the saloons in the whole establishment; this he has done in the most profuse and splendid manner. If we consider that the attendants necessary to keep up the establishment where play is going on requires an additional sum equal to the amount of rent and that Benassat has accumulated an immense fortune, it is easy to perceive what considerable sums the public at Baden must lose. An attentive observer would not be long before remarking that out of ten players, scarcely one is a player, yet the mode of playing is conducted in the fairest manner; they play at roulette and cards. Experienced players prefer the latter, pretending that much is in their favour. (?)

The environs of Baden, in point of beauty, charm, and variety, find no equal. Everywhere the eye perceives valleys enlivened by brooks, shaded groves, and verdant streaks with flowers.

An avenue of oak trees commencing near the Assembly-rooms, near the Palace of the Count Reichenbach, leads to the Convent of Lichtenthal, a distance of about a mile and a half. The convent or nunnery is a building of the thirteenth century, and has escaped the destructive powers of time and war. Close to it is an asylum for orphans, built and endowed by Mr. Stutz, whose celebrity as a tailor has obtained for him in London an immense amount of wealth, and whom the Grand Duke of Baden has raised to the rank of a noble.

The Old Castle, situated on an eminence covered with pine trees and oaks, is accessible only through a steep forest-road; it requires nearly an hour to ascend it; however, a new road is being constructed at present, in order to remove the difficulty of ascent; the Old Castle has existed since the tenth century, and has suffered at various times from the effects of war. The visitor finds close by refreshment rooms and dwelling apartments, and, as he has access to the tower, can behold the most sublime aspect ever presented in German scenery; he views the distant and fertile Rheinhall from Worms till beyond Strasbourg; in the foreground the enchanting Baden, the lovely green of the oak and beech forests, and the sombre green of the pine and fir. Everything here, especially to a German, is grand, and awakens his patriotism for here chivalry, and more recent heroism, has added to the history of the Germans.

We must not omit mentioning the Hunting Castle near Baden, surrounded by hills, and from which, in warm weather, may be seen the Strasbourg Monster, a distance of 30 m. l's. Close to it is the pavilion Favorite, filled with pictures, curious works, and mosaic flooring, an apartment filled with miniatures representing all the men eminent in science and art who have adorned every country. In another apartment there are paintings of the Markgravin and her consort, represented in 75 different costumes. The kitchen is the most remarkable in point of profusion of every possible kind of vessels in glass, porcelain, and sets of service in Dutch porcelain, representing brasts of the forest, birds, and garden fruits. In an opposite direction are the ruins of Yburg, delightful as affording a pleasing view towards the Black Forest, but sufficient to inspire fear and horror to the timid, for to every fragment are attached tales of malignant spirits and the powers of witches who deal "in riddles and affairs of death."

THE SULTAN ABDUL MEDSCHID'S WATCH.

THE SULTAN ABDUL MEDSCHID'S WATCH.

A very superb specimen of watchmaking has just been completed by Messrs. Hart and Son, Cornhill, for the Sultan Abdul Medschid. It is one of two watches, for which an order was given through the Turkish Embassy, about sixteen months ago. The watch is five inches in diameter: it is in a double gold case, the gold being of the standard of twenty-two carats; the back external case, shown in our engraving, is beautifully enamelled with flowers, within a border of arabesque scroll work. This part of the workmanship is truly exquisite; the brilliancy of the colours, and delicacy of the pencilling, surpasses anything of the kind that we have seen of foreign manufacture. The dial, also engraved in our illustration, is white opaque, enamelled on copper, similar to English watches in general; but the figures are Turkish characters. The hands are of blue steel, set with diamonds: one hand represents a dart, and the other a shorter dart, or arrow, with the crescent at one end. The movement is duplex, with a chronometer balance, and jewelled in ten ruby holes. The watch strikes the hours and quarters by itself, as the time represents; which striking is repeated, together with the minutes, by pushing upwards a small gold slide. The inner bottom is of crystal, so as to show the repeating mechanism; and through the crystal are two holes, to wind up the striking part and the movement. Wires, instead of the old method, by a bell, are used; and the sound resembles that of a powerful and harmonious cathedral clock. The pendent, or handle, is formed of five scrolls, shaped pyramidically, and beautifully engraved.

The watch, as a whole, is, perhaps, the most costly and elaborate piece of mechanism to measure time yet produced by English workmen. It has been shown to her Majesty the Queen, and to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, both of whom expressed their high admiration of this splendid triumph of British skill and taste. The companion watch is nearly completed: the price of the pair is 1200 guineas.

THE MAGAZINES FOR SEPTEMBER.

Altogether, the magazines and journals for the present month are a more attractive batch than those of its predecessor.

THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE has a capital frontispiece etching by Leech—an Election Scene—humour at all points. The opening paper is "A New Epile," by John Saunders; a long ramble through some ten pages on the decoration of the new Houses of Parliament: the position of this paper is very questionable, to say the least of it, and the details are very prosy. Miss Toulmin has a pretty September story—"Sweet Revenge." Mr. Laman Blanchard's is a first appearance in this miscellany; and his contribution, "The Mutual Piece-of-Plate Presentation Club," is a sly satire on a practice now missing its mark from its frequency. Miss Padoe has contributed a pleasant trifling in verse, "Psyche, Love, and the Butterfly;" and Mr. Wade introduces a sweet ballad, "Lochin and Eveline," with a few lines of dreamy sadness. "The Jar of Whiskey" is a humorous adventure at Crookston Castle, by Gerald Walton; and there is a piece of "Seasonable Gossip," by James Smith. Our next is the opening of a paper of considerable power, though little novelty of design, entitled

THE MONSTER CITY

BY THE REV. ROBERT JONES.

OVEMBER'S sun, red and large, was fast sinking into a gorgeous resting-place of clouds, and a thin mist, gradually condensing as the day declined, floated through the air, as I sailed in my tiny skiff against the stream of a broad and glorious river. The burning clouds were mirrored in the waters, converting them into an estuary of molten gold.

"Impelled, as it were, by some invisible power, I found myself approaching a mighty and colossal city, whose endless palaces and minarens were bounded only by the clouds. As I neared its domes, ships of gigantic stature skirted the banks of the river, from whose tall towers, and yet, despite our insignificance, our progress was rapid and powerful. A bowing breeze bore us onward. We passed many a tower and tapering spire, whose height was lost in the clouds; and many a temple whose space would have sufficed for a world to worship at its shrine. Passing and repassing us were mighty steam-ships, vomiting their lurid flames on the air, and heating the waters around them into a very storm—huge amphibious monsters, whose powers seemed derived from all the lightnings of heaven being condensed in their furnaces."

A serio-comic Legend of Crutched Friars—"The Mysterious Prediction," is a smart affair. The reviews of books are clever, by way of cabinet; though we could have spared Mr. Wainman's gossip for a page or two of "The Amber Witch," which the Editor regards as akin to "Robinson Crusoe." Our enumeration will, surely, denote this to be a number rich with interest.

THE SPORTING REVIEW is characteristically vigorous throughout. "Goodwood," the Committee on Gaming, Coven Rogatts, the Carp, Training the Race-horse, and Ball in Road, are the leading papers, besides practical information on sporting matters.

THE METROPOLITAN has reached its 161st No.; it opens with an introductory history of London, entitled "Modern History," of no very striking merit: "the World of London," we suspect, has given rise to a world of imitations. The novelties and sketches are of the average merit of this miscellany.

THE NEW MONTHLY continues the best magazine of its class: its sketches are typically humorous, and its tales are full of point and polish. Eliza Cook, the Medical Student, Mrs. Trollope, the author of "Stories of Western," "Four

SOPHOCLES IN FRANCE.

In the history of the drama (par excellence ours) there never was a period more remarkable than the present. Legitimate tragedy and comedy have taken suburban lodgings—English opera has gone over the water (not the Atlantic)—Italian opera has taken such a liking to this country, that it means to visit all the principal towns in the kingdom, not forgetting even that "ultima Thule," Ireland. Fiddling is acquiring acquaintance in all the provincial cities and towns, and popular lectures, "de omnibus rebus," have availed themselves (not the reciters, for they, generally, have nothing to do with them) of being heard at surprisingly immense distances three times in one day. And, after all, what do they tend to? Is it the advancement of any degree, condition, or grade of the dramatic art? Can monologue entertainments supply the place of the "many-colored life," the "varied scene"—can a single portrait interest as much (in the abstract) as the confessions of sentiment and character which the Swan of Avon (who unlike other traditional birds, often sang before his death, has afforded to our delighted feelings? No! we contend that this piece-meal, hybrid sort of performance is the cause of the downfall of the genuine drama. The fanciful, or historical groups of figures that we find in the productions of the old masters are broken up, and made individual subjects, when, perhaps, they were only accessories to a general whole. The Grandes figures in "Hamlet," or the Apollonius in "Romeo and Juliet," like the old moors being cut up, would, no doubt, make very good non-substantive stars, and be able to stand or shine by themselves, but we prefer seeing them in their proper and relative positions, than "shooting madly from their spheres."

Now, while we are running riot with the true drama, and poisoning, at least visiting, our taste with that libellous parody upon it called melodrama, our sentimental neighbours are indulging in a more classic choice and are luxuriating upon the "Antigone" of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's choral music, which, generally speaking is eloquently forcible. The French version produced at the Odéon, in Paris, is from the joint pens of M. M. Maurice and Vauvray (how the French like to hunt the Muses in couples!), and has proved to be eminently successful. Of the three great Greek tragic writers, although "the Bird of Pylæ" may excel in pathos, or as Collins will have it "in pity," yet elegance and superior fancy belong to Sophocles. By the way, a curious remark, on occasion, may be made here. The Greeks, after murder was removed from the stage by Æschylus, could only endure a tragedy narrated; a state of mental anguish to which Racine and all the rest of the try-tragedy writers of France accommodated themselves to, forsooth to be classical!

This was a false delivery, and originated more from the dictates of an individual than from public approbation. It must be granted that the witnessing of real or imaginary homicide cannot be in itself very agreeable; but with reference to the pre-ry, feeling, sympathy, &c., which it may be the means of producing, it must escape censure, and even be thanked as the means of conveying some of the noblest emotions to the head and heart. Shakespeare, whose taste and judgment were worth all the rest of the human world, thought differ only from the Greek and would-be-Hellenic French drawers, and his authority alone is enough to rest upon. Nevertheless, we cannot but applaud the production of the arch-Poet of an inquiry—the new appearance of the rival of Æschylus, although disguised in a French garb; but this is of little consequence; for, as Virgil says, "the pure gold shines through the ungraceful foliage which surrounds it." We rejoice at this resurrection of the old Greek drama by our neighbours; it may have a most wholesome tendency to purify our stage (i.e., the little that is left of it) from gross and disgusting absurdities. Mendelssohn's music to the choruses is very sublime and beautiful, particularly his invocation to Love; but we should like to hear the ancient sonnets which Byron's "Sardanapalus" caught from the lips of his "eloquent Ishtar." Oh! it is vain—

"The mighty grandeur of the long-lit dead,
Are with their echoes silently entombed."

NEW ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, AT NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

This handsome new church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated in Clayton-street, Newcastle, was opened on Wednesday week, with great ceremony and magnificence. In the morning, at eleven o'clock, were assembled seventy priests, with nine bishops. The Rev. Dr. Riddell, of Newcastle, celebrated pontifical high mass at the altar, and the Right Rev. Dr. Gillis, bishop of the Edinburgh diocese, delivered the sermon. Beethoven's mass in C was effectively sung by the choir, including Mrs. Leybourn and Miss Hodgson; and Mr. Redshaw presided at the organ, a powerful and fine-toned instrument, from the manufactory of Mr. Nicholson. In the afternoon, a large body of Catholic clergy and laity partook of luncheon at the Assembly-rooms. Vespers were chanted in the evening, and a sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Dr. Morris. Dr. Newham, President of Ushaw College, presided at the organ. The congregations both in the morning and evening were numerous and most respectable, including several families of distinction from the neighbouring counties, some local magistrates, and members of the corporation. The amount of the collections was £150.

This new ecclesiastical structure is of stone, and presents a close analogy to the pure decorative style. The interior is correspondingly elegant. The first objects which will be noticed are the superb stained windows, executed by Mr. Wailes, of Newcastle. The largest and most striking of these is the gift of Messrs. G. T. Dunn and Thomas Dunn, and Mrs. Margaret and Miss Elizabeth Dunn. The Right Rev. Dr. Riddell gave another; Mr. George Caley, of Saltwell-house, a third; others are memorials of the Rev. Messrs. Worwick and Eyre, deceased; Mr. Wailes contributed a sixth; and Miss Helen Culey a small one, which is placed in the south side chapel. The altar is of Caen stone, and is divided into three compartments, in which are severally represented the annunciation, the coronation, and the adoration of the wise men. The back of the altar is similarly divided, with canopies, and exhibits the resurrection, the crucifixion, and the descent of the Holy Ghost; and on either side of the altar are larger figures of St. Paul and St. Peter. The pulpit and font are both of Caen stone, and exhibit some fine and tasteful ornament. The corbels are busts of angels, each playing a different musical instrument; they give to the upper part of the building a very pleasing effect. The side chapels and chancel are laid with tessellated tiles. Two other altars are intended to be erected, besides which the plan includes a screen, and various other features, yet to be completed. Among these is a tower, 200 feet in height.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF CARY.

THE TRANSLATOR OF DANTE.

Oh! thou who didst by magic disentrance
A kindred spirit from the darksome tomb
Of ancient speech and make him leap the bounds
Of Ages for our music and delight,
Thou goest now the path which he once trode:
And as the shade of Virgil usher'd him
His ghost will show thee the Elysian fields
And mix thee in the converse of the Dead,
(The mighty dead of ages long swept by)
In gratefulness for thy attentive care
To keep the laurel green upon his brow,
And ever to add new lustre to its bloom?
As long as DANTE lives in memory
The name of CARY too shall well remember'd be! W.

MONUMENT OF THE LATE MADAME SOYER.

This monument, which has just been erected, forms one of the most elegant and conspicuous additions to the cemetery at Kensal

MONUMENT TO MADAME SOYER, IN KENSAL GREEN CEMETERY.

Green. The original design of the monument was by M. Soyer himself, who, as is generally known, fills the office of chef de cuisine at the Reform Club-House. The pedestal is rather more than twelve feet in height, and on the top of this stands an heroic figure of Faith, eight feet in height. This figure has the attributes of her office, and is in some degree after the manner of Raphael, religious or scriptural figures. She points with her right hand to Heaven, whilst, in her left, she holds the cross, symbolical of Christianity. The countenance of this figure is calm and composed, full of character and very finely cut. The drapery is magnificent. On the upper portion of the pedestal are two cherubim, which float freely in the air, and are very happily designed and executed. One holds a crown over the head of an effigy of M. Soyer, represented as large as life, on a medallion of white statuary marble; whilst the other holds a branch of palm, emblematical of peace. The medallion is surrounded with a serpent, the emblem of eternity.

Beneath the medallion are suspended a palette and the implements of the delightful art in which Madame Soyer excelled, surrounded with laurels. This noble monument was executed by M. Puyen-brun, of Brussels, one of the principal sculptors to his Belgian Majesty. The medallion was carved after a portrait by M. Simonneau, an artist of whose merit the public are perfectly aware, and father-in-law of Madame Soyer. At the back of the pedestal a space is left for the crown of laurels or funeral wreath presented at the inauguration by the admirable artist M. de Cerito, and made from the celebrated wreath presented to Cerito, at La Scala, at Milan.

The wreath, together with the palette of the artist, will be placed in a glass case, and fixed at the back of the pedestal. The inscription upon the pedestal will be simply the words "To Her," without any addition whatever.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

HERONRY AT CORHAM PARK, NEAR GRAVESEND.

"Heronry" is a word, closely associated in the mind of a genuine Londoner, with regions indistinctly of the past, or scenes of parental grandeur, strange to the present age. But these imaginary objects in his recollection have a from a heronshaw." Heronries are still close neighbours of the metropolis; and the gallant "Heron-awey" may often be seen traversing the ocean of the London smoke. We have been led into these remarks, by what, to ourselves, was a discovery—the existence of a small but very complete heronry in the venerable park of Corham, near Gravesend. Walking, on a recent summer's day near the beautiful river which pours the manse of the Danes, in thatylvan region, we were startled by the loud, yelping cry peculiar to the Ardeidae, and, to our surprise, discovered, immediately over head, a busy colony of genuine "three year elders" busily employed in tending their voracious families. The antiquity of the place, and the heronry importance of the Corhams, were at once determined things. The sword of De Warrenne, despite the proximity of Gravesend, could not have more quickly settled the question. Visions of "ancient England" passed before us. We thought of the days when an Archbishop of York graced his table with six heronshaws; and of the years, too, in which the work's wages of the architect of Windsor Castle, and the price of a single heron were represented by the same coin—a twopenny piece for the bird, and a tweller for the bird. The heron courtship, also, in which the catching of a heron and the catching of a lady's heart, were things coincident, added colour to our reminiscences. Things were felt to be changed; while the birds remained the same—unchanged so more, and at peace.

NASHMYTH'S PATENT STEAM HAMMER.

Among the many proofs which the present Government has given of their desire to adopt every sound practical improvement, which would in any respect add to the efficiency of the naval works of this country, we have much pleasure in bringing before our readers as instance in the above novel machine, which has just been set to work at the Royal Dock-yard, Devonport, for the purpose of forging in the most rapid and perfect manner all descriptions of large wrought iron-work required for the naval service.

The machine is Mr. James Nashmyth's Patent Direct-action Steam Hammer, by means of which, no mass of wrought iron, however large, is beyond the compass of its powers; while such is its manageability, that at one moment it may be beating about the paddle shaft of a 500 horse steam engine, like a much day; or, at another time, forging a nail, or even driving one into a piece of wood with all the simplicity of a joiner's hammer! Under such entire control is this machine, that its power may be increased or diminished to suit any requirements.

Hitherto, all great forge hammers have been indirectly worked, either by steam or water power: that is to say, the rising and falling motion of the hammer has been obtained by having either a complete steam-engine (or waterwheel), with all its complex arrangements of shafts, wheels, and axles required to convert the original up-and-down motion of the piston of the steam engine through all these complex media into rotary motion, which then had to be re-converted into the original up-and-down motion of the prime mover, namely, the piston, so as to give the rising and falling motion to the hammer. But, by this indirect process, not only were vast expense and complexity of machinery required, but also a vast loss of power, by reason of the numerous courses through which the original moving power had to travel to its final destination.

In Mr. Nashmyth's steam hammer, all this complex intermediate machinery is removed; and, by simply attaching the piston rod of an inverted high-pressure cylinder, to a mass of cast iron sliding between two upright guides, we have then "the steam hammer." Nothing can be more simple, inasmuch as the power is brought in contact with the resistance, or hammer, by means of a straight rod. All that has to be done, is to let the steam in under the piston of the cylinder, which is lifted up, together with its attached hammer block, to any required height, when, by its own motion, the steam is let escape and down comes the hammer on the glowing mass, with such vast energy as to exceed all attempts of ordinary forge hammers. In an instant, if required, the height of the fall, as well as its velocity downwards, may be controlled so as to give the most gentle tap. In short, by this novel application of steam, we have obtained the most complete and entire control over percussive force, a condition of mechanical power which had not hitherto been brought under the same command and control, as is the case with all other descriptions of mechaical force. The applications of this machine are almost infinite; its energies are not confined to aiding us in erecting our vast steam marine, being, through its means, enabled, as we now are, to forge paddle-shafts, cranks, and axles, with a degree of rapidity and soundness, as well as magnitude, so much beyond our former powers; but it will also contribute in a most remarkable manner to perfecting the manufacture of wrought iron in all its forms and applications.

The ancient wood-cut will, perhaps, serve to convey to our readers a general idea of the form and arrangement of this important machine. Its velocity may be regulated at pleasure, from 300 strokes per minute to any number under.

In the wood-cut, the high-pressure steam is conveyed by the pipe A from a boiler under the piston in the cylinder B. C is the piston rod, attached to the hammer D, which slides up and down between the two standards, E and F. The hammer (are, d, and the anvil face, g, are at all times parallel to each other. The apparatus at the side, marked X X, is that which regulates the height of the fall of the hammer, as well as its velocity and force, and makes the machine self-acting. It is the anvil, there being abundant clear space all round it.

MILL-HILL GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—On the 28th ult., a number of the former pupils of the Grammar School at Mill-hill, presented to the Trustees of that Institution, a portrait of Thomas Priestly, Esq., who has with great ability filled the office of head-master for more than 20 years. The portrait is a full length, by Mr. Phillips, R.A., and has been placed in the dining-hall, where about 60 of the governors and former pupils of the school partook of an excellent collation. The presentation of the picture, at which were assembled 150 of the present pupils, was a very interesting scene.

MEDICAL REFORM.—On Tuesday evening, a numerous meeting of the members of the College of Surgeons was held at Exeter Hall, for the purpose of adopting measures regarding the conduct of the Council of the College in refusing to grant an interview to the members, respecting a reform in the profession. Shortly after eight o'clock, the chair was taken by Mr. Ashby, of Enfield, who was supported by Mr. Wakley, M.P., and other gentlemen. The chairman addressed the meeting at some length, and denounced the conduct of the Council in refusing to receive the address. He also commented very strongly on the nature of the charter recently granted to the members of the Council, who proposed to withdraw in accordance with the objects, which were carried unanimously.

GRAND.—By recent accounts from the Guano Isles to the north of Cape Town, it appears that from thirty to forty or more ships are constantly taking in cargoes, and that probably not less than 1,000,000 tons of Guano have been already shipped to Great Britain. It is said that one Scotch Merchant is House has already cleared from twenty to five and twenty thousand pounds by this traffic. This Bay has, in consequence, become desolate.—South African Commercial Advertiser.

RETURNING PROSPERITY.—The Leeds Mercury gives from a correspondent the following flattering account of improvement in the state of some of the manufacturing districts:—"I have just passed through Lancashire, and found every symptom of prosperity. Indeed I fear there is some danger of their 'going a head' too fast. I saw several new mills, all apparently first-rate, under construction—three at Preston, two at Blackburn, one or two at Burnley, and some between Burnley and Todmorden; and there may have been others in the district I passed through which escaped my attention."

O'CONNELL'S MANIFESTO.

O'CONNELL is still "pursuing the triumph and partaking the gale" of popular enthusiasm, which the reversal of the judgment on him was so well calculated to produce. A public procession from his prison to his home, attended by thousands on thousands of men, animated by affection for his person, and zeal for the cause he advocates, while they were stimulated by something like indignation at the past, and flushed with hope for the future; public thanksgivings offered by the priests, and in the temples of the faith, of seven millions of people, with all the splendour of the Roman ritual, sanctioned by the Archbishop of Dublin (Dr. Murray), a man hitherto remarkable for the quietude of his political character, generally exhibiting much of the Conservative, and a little of the courtier; the exultation of the capital city of the island, multiplied in every town, village and hamlet; and all crowned by an assembly of what may almost be called the ruling body of Ireland, unexampled for the number attending it, for the spirit and determination displayed in the proceedings, for the adhesion given in by men of rank, wealth, and influence, to the policy of the Conciliation Hall, and last, not least, the Manifesto of O'Connell himself, which we shall notice presently. We have compared the public accounts of all these proceedings, and have checked them by information from private channels, and we can come to but one conclusion—that, taken altogether, they form one of those crises in public affairs, that, for good or for evil, influence the course of the future history of a nation.

The crisis has not found the leader of the movement unprepared for it. His speech of Monday last may be considered his Manifesto; it shadows forth, if it does not distinctly trace, the course of his policy for the future. Never was such a speech made before by a liberated state prisoner in the face of the Government that prosecuted him. He has evidently little fear of another "thirty-six yards" indictment, for his language is as decided as ever; and, for a "conspirator," he states his views with singular openness. The principal points are these:—The counts alleging the illegality of the meetings having failed, he has entertained the idea of holding the gathering (suspended by proclamation) at Clontarf; but on second thoughts he considers enough has been done to assert the principle of their legality, and he therefore refers the holding or the not holding the meeting to a committee, his own opinion being against it; the meeting at Clontarf, then, we may take it, will not be held. He states that when the proclamation was issued against the meeting, had it not been for the interposition of Sir Edward Blakeney the people would have been fired on. This is to be proved, and inquired into in Parliament. There is evidently exciting work cutting out for next session.

He quotes with approbation a passage from a work written by Mr. Grey Porter, a "Protestant gentleman, the High Sheriff of a Protestant county":—"The union of 1801, 41 Geo. III., chap. 47, does, and always will, draw away from Ireland her men of skill, genius, capital, and rank—all who raise, strengthen, and distinguish a nation. A federal union between Great Britain and Ireland is inevitable, and most desirable for both islands." Some will consider this an abatement of the claim for "Total Repeal."

He has decided on the plan, interrupted last year, of what is to be called the Preservative Society, consisting of three hundred gentlemen sitting in Dublin, as a sort of training school for the members of the future Federal Parliament. It is to be so organised as to be perfectly "within the law."

He threatens an impeachment of the Attorney-General and Irish Judges for injustice, misconduct, and illegality of proceeding in the trials, and states this curious fact, that the Chief Justice, supposed to be impartial, borrowed the brief of the Attorney-General—the paid prosecutor—to charge the jury from! The tampering with the jury lists, and the admission of newspapers as evidence, will also be included as the grounds of the impeachment. He will not succeed in this—and probably knows he will not—but it asserts a principle recognised by the law; and that he should be in a position to use such a threat, without its appearing ridiculous, is one of the greatest proofs of the increase of power he has gained by the prosecution, or rather the mismanagement of it.

The whole of these displays of public feeling, these gatherings of thousands by the most exciting of subjects—politics and national feeling—have passed off without one breach of the peace of any kind. The time is not very distant when such feelings would have stained the earth with blood. The obedience of the people to their leaders is something marvellous, and is not the least significant feature of the times. The absence of that bitterness of tone against England and English injustice which was formerly the staple of Repeal harangues, is a sign of the better temper that springs from better knowledge. In proportion as the Orange party has sunk in influence in both countries, so has the disposition to rely on the justice of England increased in the bulk of the Irish nation. And unless Repeal is stripped of its attractions by better government, the Liberal party in England bid fair to become in some degree supporters of O'Connell; they will vindicate in him their jealousy of any interference with the purity of trial by jury, to the still greater embarrassment of the Ministry. The prosecution was a piece of mismanagement from beginning to end.

Much of all that has taken place will be sneered at, more of it will excite that wonder which is content to marvel at a phenomenon without comprehending it, and some things will be condemned. Thus the ascribing the release of the popular champion to the influence of the prayers of the Church, will be set down as superstition; the returning thanks for his deliverance has been called an indecent and ostentatious farce; and the universal jubilee which the nation has presented, will appear to the less impulsive Englishman as excessive, and more than the occasion justifies. But all these things are but the outward expression of deep inward feelings; they are the expression of national emotions, that will be the spring of actions; no ruler or statesman can disregard such indications; the man who has no responsibility may laugh and sneer as he pleases, his carelessness can have no consequences. But the ruler must study these feelings, if he wishes to direct or modify them; and if he neglects to do so, the chances are that they will govern him. It is useless to ask how intense popular excitement has been produced; it exists, and must be met; if mischievous, it must be met and prevented from increasing. But how? That is just the question which at this moment embarrasses the Government. It is evident the Ministry was not prepared for this turn of affairs; and the not having contemplated it as at least possible, was an error in policy that has had the effect of throwing an immense advantage into the hands of their opponent, who will not be slow to make the most of it.

O'CONNELL AT THE BALCONY, IN MEAGHER-SQUARE, DUBLIN.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

PARIS, Tuesday evening.

The Jockey and the other new Clubs of Paris, to which the French resort with all the enthusiasm they have for novelty and English imitation, are now the only lively centres of society. How melancholy tales are in the mouths of all the white-gloved lions—many of their volatile collectors have become denuded of their feathers in the pursuit of departed wealth, and of fashion, and of the noted watering places whither they have flocked: for these that treacherous goddess Fortune holds the dice-box and the roulette, and has entrapped our leading scoundrels. Several of the most marvellous of the latter are said to be held in quest for their fellow-two at Baden Baden, where peddlery, pleasure, and fashion still reign paramount, filling the pockets of the exiled scoundrels of Paris, and of the Grand Duke, who drives with them the wages of sin. What creates still more regret is the death of the Duke d'Orleans, so long resident in Paris, and who united in his person the titles and the wealth of the greatest houses of Spain, by his maternal uncle, the Count-General, President of the Council of Castile, First Minister of Ferdinand VII.; he was Duke of Infantado. His paternal grandmother was the Dowager Duchess of Osmuna, from whom he inherited the immense riches of the house of Benavente. The property of these three illustrious families put into his single possession an annual revenue exceeding two million francs. He appeared in London at the Queen's drawing-room with three Solitaires plus in his breast valued at £100,000. His brother, the Marquis de Torrepalma, who spent the last season in London, which he has just left, inherits, with the immense fortune and domains of his race, all the amiable qualities of his lamented brother.

A city is the natural element of a Frenchman, just as water is of a fish; therefore, Paris is even now not deserted like London. But the grand promenades miss their titled and distinguished crowds. In the Champs Elysees, all the carriages and bric-a-bracs you perceive belong to the well-known millionnaire American family, the T—s. They are the most dashing denizens in Paris; you may judge of their style of living by their railing on hotel from the King's sister, for which alone they pay £2000 per annum. Their only rival in the Champs Elysees is M. Thiers. There you behold him daily in the grande after, the Bateau-Rouge of Paris, reclining in his magnificent cabriolet, after the happy deliverance of six volumes of his new "History of Napoleon," which he has just conveyed to the publisher's hands, in exchange for £25,000. His countenance is the index of the times. Lately you behold him smiling with deep enjoyment, for France was going to war with England; but yesterday his visage was overcast, for peace is restored.

There are many English visitors in Paris—but there are but few persons of note, except those who are on the wing to Italy; and the British crowd of former years is not to be seen on the Boulevards. The hostile feeling to England prevailing here is the cause, for the war party had but just passed off: it was intense! The message of Louis Philippe sent to the Congress of Aachen, arrested its course. The journals have not told all the truth. This century lady—this once celebrated belle, and because of many an anecdote of gallantry—wrote a letter in alarm to one of the ladies of honour at the Palace, to inquire whether she should sell off her jewels and chattels, and fly to England? Louis Philippe, who knows her ladyship, and who saw the letter, sent word to our eccentric countrywoman, "not to be afraid, because as long as he would be on the throne, there would be no war with England." Nothing shows more clearly that the race of the noble and mighty lords of former days has passed away, than the social position of those who now give all the grand fêtes. A few days since a worthy mercer, M. Papin, who made a fortune of some millions in one of the darkest corners of Paris, gave an entertainment worthy of a Prince at his chateau and manor, in the environs. It commenced with theatricals—the play was performed in an ancient chapel, metamorphosed for the occasion into an elegant saloon, in which each of the crowd of guests had a stall to himself. After the play, at two o'clock in the morning, came a sumptuous supper; then the park, of three hundred acres, became suddenly illuminated. Whilst the young elegants and elegantes danced, the rest promenade amongst the dazzling arcades. At five in the morning, the scene was changed—the male dancers became spiritism, and the rabbits, hares, and partridges the music had not ceased, met with sudden deaths.

Speaking of sporting, nothing could be more extraordinary to an Englishman than the dings of the 1st of September near Paris. The entire plain of St. Denis was covered with Cockney sportsmen, who, according to their notions, had nothing else to do but to expose powder and shot because it was Sunday! The reports of guns so quickly followed each other, that you might imagine it was the skirmish preceding a grand battle.

As part is the image of war, and one far more accessible in reality to citizens-soldiers. With the latter, Prince de Joinville is now in immense favour; all repeat his command at Megadere. Just as he had left the Admiral's cabin, a cannon ball entered: "Oh!" said the Prince, "Death is better: he came to give me a call, and not finding me at home, left me his visiting card."

A very interesting sitting of the Académie has just taken place, to distribute the prizes of Virtue and Eloquence. The former was bestowed on M. Ha-el, a prodigious who has been successfully "a Jack of all trades"—amongst others a President and the manager of several theatres. The celebrated writer and orator, now one of the French Ministers, M. Villermain, was the first spokesman, and alone with all his glory, until that witty personage, M. de la Roche, and his friend, in his address he combined the most profound reflections with the most spirited jests, and his supercilious brethren, "the faculty," will no longer say that he is only fit to write fables. The crowded assembly, consisting of the noblest and most distinguished men of France, and of the fairest and most elegant leaders of fashion, were thrown into rapture.

The gay ensembles of Paris are terming with high society, but Versailles is the shoddy shade of the Académie. There all the noble and fashionable deities have lately performed in the beautiful chapel of the palace, an oratorio, written expressly by Alari, Halévy, and Prince de la Moskwa. Naught can be imagined more admirable than the manner in which the solos were sung by Countess de Murat, de Merlin, the Barons de Jalescourt, &c., supported by a choir composed of the leaders of French fashion, and accompanied by the orchestra of the Grand Opera. It did not go off, however, without some secret heart burnings, and gnashing of teeth. The composers were indignant at their score having been corrected and changed underneath, to suit one of the fair singers, and the body of four choristers were enraged at the prohibited admission of a young married lady, whose beauty and costumes are as surpassingly attractive to the eyes, as her voice is torturing to the ears.

The grand event of the week has been the production of a translation of Rosmini's "Oratio," at the Académie de Musique. It met with momentary success—because it was found tolerable, and it was exposed to be intolerable. Piffet, the leech, wrote the French poetry, although it is an express condition of the lease of the theatre, that neither leech nor leader of the orchestra shall produce any of his works on the stage.

The postman, has Death, will never wait a man's leisure to depart; so that the only other piece of news I can convey to you is, that the Duke of Brunswick is publishing, in Paris, his memoirs, written in the German language. What a Pandora's box it will be!

FRANCE.

Our advice from France this week are of a more pacific character. Indeed, the war fever which has raged in Paris for some time past seems gradually to have subsided. The Paris papers are barren of political news, but they nevertheless contain several matters of interest. The Moniteur publishes a report from the Prince de Joinville, dated on board the Pluton steamer, Megadere, Aug. 21, in which he gives a detailed account of his operations before Tangier and Megadere; but it is not worth while to repeat it entire, as it does not contain any new fact, so far as the attack is concerned. There are, however, some passages of importance. For instance, the Prince confirms the statement made on the part of the French ministerial prints, that there was no desire to occupy Tangier. The Prince in this report, which is addressed to the Minister of Marine, says, "You know what object I attacked Tangier. According to your instructions I was not to occupy it. My object was obtained the moment that, by the silence of its batteries, the town acknowledged itself vanquished. As I have already had the honour to inform you, the quarter in which were the residences of the Europeans was scrupulously respected. The town was on fire in several places from the rockets thrown from the steamer Rubis. Throughout the day every man revelled his fellow in zeal and coolness. I have nothing but praise to bestow. At the point of day the posts of the ships were marked by buoys. Captain Desquasse acquitted himself of this duty, which was attended with risk, with his usual courage and intelligence. We have 3 killed and 17 wounded. The ships have sustained some slight damage. The Suffren, which was the worst treated, received sixteen balls. The enemy's loss is stated at 153 killed and 309 wounded. The business being done, the steam-boats towed the ships to their mooring grounds. The 7th was passed in restoring the ships to a condition to go to sea."

The Prince commences his account of the attack upon Megadere thus:—"I had communicated to all the captains a plan of attack, and assigned to each his post, once that the signal to execute the orders was given. I am only an eye-witness, endeavouring to act the part of a faithful historian, and relate with a lively admiration, and a profound acknowledgment, with what zeal, what devotedness, and what intelligence, on the part of every one, the orders were executed."

After describing the result of the firing in terms similar to those already published, but with more amplification, the Prince concludes his report in these terms:—"On the 16th the steamers Amorce, Pluton, and Gascogne, and the brig Cassard and Pandour laid their broadsides in front of the tongue of sand on which are the forts of the marine that I was extremely desirous of making myself master of; their cross fire cut off the communications of the town with these forts. Under this protection, Commandant Hemioux and Captain E. Bouet headed a column of 600 men for landing. But everything had been deserted on our approach, and the landing was effected without resistance. All that remained to be done was to complete the work of destruction which had been commenced. The result of the day was the spiking of the guns, and throwing them over the ramparts, the demolition of the embrasures, the inundation of the powder stores, and the taking away three standards and nine or ten bronze guns as trophies. I have left entire the vast warehouses of the customs, which are full of merchandise of all kinds; we most otherwise have burned them, and I was afraid that the fire might reach too rapidly the immense stores of powder and shells in the casemates of the forts. I then sent back the troops and the crews. We were masters of the town and fort, the town batteries were no longer to be feared, and I considered our operations as terminated. After our departure the town, being without defence, was taken by the Kabyles of the interior, who set fire to it. The sack of this unhappy town is complete; the inhabitants have fled in all directions. In a few days there will remain of the beautiful town, which Muley-Adherman called his beloved town, only the walls, ridged with balls and blackened by fire. The lesson is a severe one. I will not name any person, for to name all who did their duty with courage, intelligence, and devotedness, would be to name everybody. I will merely call your attention to the families of the men who were killed, and to the future fate of the wounded, and also to the comfort of all who, at the sole name of France, have so nobly accepted the hard duty of keeping garrison in the island of Megadere."

A postscript to this report, dated the 25th, says—"On the 23d our establishment on the island was completed, and I sent away to Cadix a part of the squadron. In the course of the day a gun was fired from one of the towers of the town commanding the country, and the ball having fallen in the midst of us in the port, we destroyed with shells the houses near this tower. I then sent Lieutenant Touchard, the chief of my staff, with 100 men, to fix scaling ladders against the tower. The detachment scaled the wall without opposition, and spiked the last guns that could play upon us. From the height of the tower the town could be seen; it appeared deserted, and horribly devastated. This operation, which was not absolutely necessary, has had the advantage of showing the garrison of the island that, with its own forces and the resources of the local station, it keeps the town completely at its mercy."

The Paris journals abound in available commentaries upon the subject of the events at Tahiti, and in some of them we find the most absurd reports of the views and demands both of the French and English Governments with a view to the settlement of the question. Some of these statements are so ridiculous, and so obviously untrue, that we are surprised they could be entertained even by so credulous a class as the French journalists. The most important thing is to know that the difference have been amicably arranged.

According to the Revue de Paris, Commodore Trep Nicolas and the Commander of the French forces in the Pacific are to act as arbitrators in fixing the amount of the compensation to be awarded to Mr. Prithard, who, it is said, is to have another consular appointment to the Navigators' Islands, a group considerably to the westward.

The favourable decision of the House of Lords in the O'Connell case appears to have created almost as much excitement in Paris as in Dublin. The news has almost thrown the question of peace or war into the shade. We can only find room for an extract from the Nation, and it is hardly necessary to say, that some allowance must be made for the well-known tendencies of that journal. It says—"O'Connell has frequently shown himself ungrateful to France, but he must acknowledge that it is to the French people he is now indebted for not longer remaining in the attitude of a vanquished man. If the dispositions of the people of France had not, in spite of their Government, inspired the oppressors of Ireland with a salutary fear, O'Connell would still be in prison. It is to us, I know, and to our democratic influence that Ireland owes the emancipation of the Catholics, and the United Kingdom the bill of Reform. This fact is enough to justify us for what we said yesterday, that the French Revolution, which has spread so many advantages through the world, would still find, if necessary, powerful auxiliaries amongst the subjects of the most hostile Governments. Ireland, in case of a war with England, would be with us an ally dangerous to our eternal enemy. The concession concealed under the acquittal of O'Connell would not prevent him from recollecting that he has everything to gain by the success of France. We believe that the increasing difficulties will cause the English Government, which is aware how necessary the Irish forces are for her, to give Ireland a home to grow, as is vulgarly said, in order that she should not take part with France. The release of O'Connell is a proof of this prudent disposition."

The Semaphore of Toulon says—"Ministerial orders have been received for putting out large steamships upon a war footing, and for inspecting with care the batteries on our shores; but as to the armaments of the ships in disposition and commission, which have been lately talked of, no arrangements have been made tending to confirm them. It is not certain that the Prince de Joinville will come to Toulon, as announced several days ago; because, according to recent despatches from the Minister of the Marine, the Prince's squadron is to be repaired at Cadix, where his Royal Highness will wait the further instructions of the Government. The transport Aube is appointed to carry out the requisite stores for refitting his squadron."

The papers contain accounts of the loss of one of the largest of the French war-steamer, the Greenland, on the west coast of Morocco, on some rocks about three leagues from Larache, on the 25th ult. The steamer immediately commenced an attack upon the vessel, which had lasted full four hours, when, fortunately, the steamer Vedette arrived to her assistance, succeeded in dispersing the Moorish soldiers, and rescued on board the crew, and such things as could be saved from the wreck. In the afternoon the Prince de Joinville, in the Pluton, also arrived on that part of the coast; and finding it impossible to float the Greenland, caused her to be destroyed by fire. The Greenland was built at Rochefort. She cost £20,000. Lieutenant Benson, who was in command of the Greenland, is to appear before a court-martial.

The Charbon endeavours to be facetious upon the occasion of the release of Mr. O'Connell. It says that as there is now no prospect of John Bull exercising his liberality upon the French, he intends to fall foul of the Irish. Our contemporary also laughs at the idea of the Court of Peers annulling a sentence after a great portion of it has been carried into execution.

SPAIN.

Our accounts from Madrid of the 4th instant, confirm the report of the settlement of the differences between the Spanish Government and Morocco. The following is a semi-official statement of the conditions:—

"A dispatch has been received at Madrid from Morocco, announcing that the Emperor has acquiesced in all the demands of Spain. The concessions made are:—

- "1. The severe punishment of the Arab who caused the consular agent to be assassinated.
- "2. Our Government will receive indemnities for all the acts of piracy which have been committed on Spanish vessels.
- "3. Two leagues of territory are to be granted to Spain beyond the lines of Ceuta.
- "4. The Spanish flag shall be saluted by the Moroccan cannon.

"It is thought that the Government will not hesitate to ratify this arrangement, which will appear immediately in the Gazette. The troops which were assembling to form part of the Moroccan expedition are already ordered to march back into the interior.

"This conclusion of our differences with the Emperor of Morocco is generally attributed to the good offices and intervention of Mr. Balwer."

The elections in Madrid continued to be favourable to the Moderados, whose candidates, Messrs. Martinez de la Rosa, Alcalá Galiano, the Duke de Castro Terreno, the Marquis de Miraflores, &c., had obtained upwards of 500 votes. The Absolutists were still left in an insignificant minority.

Travelling in Spain continues highly insecure, and several notable examples of it have recently occurred. The diligence to La Granja, which was full of passengers to see the waterworks play, on the Saint's day of the Princess Louise, was robbed between San Lorenzo and La Granja, the passengers, twenty in number, being completely stripped of everything, even to the greater part of the clothes on their backs. Another diligence was stopped near Nueces, Arragon, a few days ago, and the passengers, as usual obliged to get out, and lie with their faces on the ground while the robbers plundered and packed up all the clothes and baggage they thought it worth while to take, which was done in the most lecherous manner, loading three of the mules belonging to the diligence. The robbers then left, first taking the papers of the travellers, whose joint contents only amounted to about one hundred dollars; but they did not use them, which is usually the case when they are not satisfied with the amount of their booty.

PORTUGAL.

Our accounts from Lisbon, which are to the 3rd instant, do not notice the occurrence of anything important. Several other protests have been made against the late decrees, and amongst them, one from Vacasont Ponte Areada, a peer of the realm, and likewise one of her Majesty's staunchest supporters.

It was reported that the Chambers are positively to open on the 16th instant, the circular having already been forwarded to the deputies to that effect. The Royal Family have arrived at Belem, from Cintra, where her Majesty will continue to reside some time, in order that the children may enjoy the benefit of the sea air and baths.

It is stated positively that the Portuguese Government have, through the mediation of the Pope, been endeavouring to prevail upon Don Miguel to make a formal and public renunciation of his right to the throne, in return for which they have offered not only to settle upon him a pension of 600,000 francs (£14,000) per annum, but, moreover, to count it back from 1834, and pay up the arrears from that period. It appears, however, that Don Miguel has scouted every proposal to that effect, and declared in the most positive terms that he never will give up his claim to the throne of Portugal.

ITALY.

According to a letter from Ancona, dated Aug. 25, some of the members of the fraternity of Young Italy are organising a fresh insurrection there. The letter says:—"About three weeks ago it was reported that a cutter, under the Greek flag, had sailed from Malta, in the direction of Corfu, having on board some persons suspected of being in connexion with the Young Italy committee in London. It now unfortunately appears that these incorrigible enemies of peace, who unscrupulously hunt to destruction the dupes of their wild schemes, are preparing a new expedition, this time destined for the Roman States. Salvatore Fata, who is intrusted with the management of the expedition, is to board the cutter above-mentioned, and is instructed to hire Albanian banditti on the Greek coasts, and to effect a landing at some point of which they may gain possession. It is reported that a captain formerly in the Neapolitan service, has been endeavouring to stir up insurrection in Calabria, and that he has, as yet, eluded all the vigilance of the authorities, who are searching for him. In Romagna, especially in Imola and Forlì, some excitement appears to prevail among certain individuals suspected by the Government, and the authorities are said to have traced out a plot in which the well-known Modenian Nicolo Fabriz plays a part. The mass of the population is, however, peaceably disposed; they form a correct estimate of what they are to expect from these revolutionists—what prospects are held out to them by the fixed idea and the fanaticism of these erring men. Some considerable sums have been recently sent from Miraflores to Corfu and Calabria to the Directors of the London Committee of Giovine Italia."

EGYPT.

The Overland Mail has brought accounts from Alexandria to the 30th ult. At that time everything continued quiet in Egypt, and the Pacha remained at Alexandria, attending as usual to the affairs of his country, and his late ill-humour had quite passed over, and was altogether forgotten. The Nile had risen to its proper height, and will afford an abundant harvest. The new crops had already commenced coming down. It appears that the Egyptian government are making arrangements to take into their own hands the transit of Indian passengers and light merchandise through Egypt, and the Pacha seems bent on carrying out the railroad across the Isthmus of Suez, proposed by Messrs. Galloway, as an efficient means of insuring expeditions, cheap, and comfortable conveyances over the desert. It is deemed desirable by persons well-informed on the subject, that our Government should give instructions to their representative in Egypt to counterbalance the Pacha in this project, particularly as England will reap such mighty advantage from it, and without cost.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

By the Overland Mail we have received letters and papers from India and China. The mail was dispatched from Bombay, by the Semiramis steamer, on the 19th July, and, in consequence of her putting back, with an additional mail of the 21st July, departed on the 24 August, per Semiramis, which mails reached Suva on the 28th August, per Cleopatra, from Aden. She also brings the Calcutta mail of the 15th July, per Scindus, which reached Suva on the 17th August. The latest dates are—Alexandria, 31st August; Calcutta, 19th July; Ceylon, 11th July. China—Macao, 27th May; Canton, 6th May; Hong Kong and Swatow, 21st June. Delhi, 20th July; Lahore, 26th June; Madras, 20th July; Manila and Mauritius, 1st June; Saigon, 25th June, and Singapore, 13th June.

The London mail of June 7th reached Bombay, per Semiramis steamer, on the 9th July. The news is not of great importance. We subjoin a summary of it.

The despatches containing Lord Ellenborough's recall reached Calcutta on the 15th June. A council was immediately convened, when the Hon. Mr. Burt was sworn into the office of Governor-General, vacated by the first of the Court of Directors. The measure appeared to be expected by his lordship, who had previously provided himself with a private residence five miles from Government House. It took the people of India in general by surprise. General Cooper and many of the officers of the Presidency division have invited him to a dinner, and her Majesty's 39th Regiment have subscribed £150 for a testimonial to him.

The Hindustan, having Sir Henry Hardinge on board, left Aden at noon on the 6th of July. Whilst there, his Excellency visited all the fortifications, held a levee, examined the garrison, &c. He was much pleased with Aden, admired the harbour greatly, and considered the troops as healthy that he could have imagined they had just landed from England. The Hindustan touched at Madras on her way to Calcutta on the 26th of July. His Excellency did not land there, but received a letter from Lord Ellenborough, who announced his intention of not leaving Calcutta until after his arrival, which would be about the 24th of July.

The detachments in the 66th regiment of Bengal Native Infantry reached a crisis on the 23rd of June; the men refused their pay, insulted and buffeted their officers with bricks and stones, and fell into a state of total insubordination. The refractory regiment was subsequently compelled to quit Shikarpore, and to march to Sukkur, which it reached on the 26th of June; 39 of the ringleaders have been arrested. The 66th Bengal Native Regiment took the station at Shikarpore on the 24th. The mutineers have been ordered to march to Delhi, where it is expected they will be punished and disbanded.

A party of 40 cavalry, sent out about 12 miles from Shikarpore to protect a body of grain-cutters, was attacked by some Belooches in the pay of Shere Mahomed, in consequence of the neglect of the native officers commanding, who returned from the road to smoke with their soldiers. The grain-cutters, and 12 men and one native officer, were killed by the assailants. This had produced a stringent order from Sir Charles Napier.

Scinde was otherwise tranquil. There was still some fever, and it was said that Sir Charles Napier had suffered from some attacks of it.

The intelligence from Afghanistan is still conflicting, and but of little moment. Dost Mahomed appears to have almost finally put down the opposition so determinedly shown him by the numerous petty chiefs around his capital, and his present position will now be greatly augmented from the fact of his son, Uzbak, having arrived at Cabul from his excursion to Jelalabad.

The report of the attack on Herat, by the two sons of Shah Kamran, assisted by the King of Persia, was still current; and one report was that the princes had come up with him, routed his army, and put him to death. The King of Bokhara was still apprehensive of a visit from the Persians, while the chief of Candahar is said to threaten Herat.

Gwalior was perfectly tranquil, but nothing of any moment had occurred. It seems doubtful, as yet, if the city of Bhoranpore has been given back to the Mahabars.

There is nothing of moment from the other parts of India.

The following telegraphic despatch, dated "Marselles, Sept. 8, six o'clock in the evening," brings the latest news from India:—

"The Indian packet-boat arrived last night. We are informed from Singapore, dated July 2, that the French Ambassador had just arrived, together with two frigates; and that at the same time Sir H. Pottinger had set out for Suva, by the Driver packet-boat."

"We learn from Bombay, of the 31st of July, that tranquillity prevailed throughout India; that the affairs of Scinde, of Cabul, and of the Panjab, had experienced no important change; that an envoy from the Celestial Empire, named Keyning, charged with despatches to the French and American Ambassadors, had arrived at Suva on the 21st of June."

"Count Ratti Manenti arrived at Malia on the 4th inst., where he was put into quarantine."

"We may add from another source, that Lord Ellenborough was to leave Calcutta on his homeward journey in the Tennasseram steamer. It was thought that the 1st of August would be the day of his lordship's departure."

At Aden, on the 10th of August, much alarm was caused by the expectation of an attack from the Arabs, 15,000 of whom were said to be under arms on the opposite shore. All officers were ordered into campments. Some Arabs were seen reconnoitring in the night; but dispersed on a few shots being fired.

CHINA.

The accounts from China are to the 31st of June. Sir Henry Pottinger was about to take his departure for Bombay, on his way to England.

It is stated that a visit of the French frigate Alcmene to Canton and Shanghai had occasioned much excitement amongst the Chinese along the coast, so that it was considered eminently desirable that a strong naval force should be kept in the north for the protection of British life and property against the outbreaks of the mob. The American and French men-of-war Brandywine, St. Louis, Cleopatra, and Alcmene, had arrived almost simultaneously in the Chinese waters. At Canton the populace continued very unruly, manifesting on every occasion which presented itself, a spirit of extreme discontent at the presence of foreigners. An arrow, as a wind vane, had been placed on the top of the United States flag-staff, and great umbrage had been taken at this by the Chinese—on what ground is not explained. On the 6th of May the American Consul, Mr. Forster, had caused the obnoxious weathercock to be taken down. While a party of sailors were engaged to this, a riot commenced among the rabble, some of whom pushed themselves into the square, and threatened mischief. The mob afterwards broke into the square of the American Factory, and endeavoured to pull down the United States flag. They were resisted, and a Chinaman, who turned out to be an innocent and unconcerned shopkeeper, was shot. At ten p.m. the Chinese soldiers made their appearance and cleared the square. The populace continued in a great state of excitement, and Canton was placarded with threatening notices that the factories would be attacked and burned. The Chinese authorities appear to have no power whatever over the mob, and it seems to be thought that unless some strong and decided measures are taken by us, there will be no safety for either life or property at Canton.

NEWS FROM TAHITI.

The following extract of a letter, dated Valparaiso, May 31, 1844, to a friend in England, from a late resident in Tahiti, contains an account of some proceedings between the French and the natives in that island up to the middle of April, of which no mention was made in the last accounts.

"A battle was fought at Tairahua on the 24th of March. The French took a native married woman and ran away with her to the fort they were building at Tairahua. The woman screamed and called to her husband to rescue her; her husband, with seven more natives, immediately took up their clubs and guns and ran into the fort, where there were twenty soldiers, and took the fort from them, and killed all the French soldiers that were there. The next morning the French left the Embuscade, that was at anchor near there, and went and fell upon the natives, but were completely routed by them. The Tahitians were decidedly the conquerors in that battle."

"About three weeks after, the governor went with two more ships of war, the frigates Uranie and the steamer, and fired all along the coast till they got to Mahana, the place where the natives were. Captain Henry endeavoured to persuade the governor not to go, but he would go, and said he went to retrieve the honour of France. Captain Henry took them up the back of the native fort, by a bye path about three miles long, and fired into the fort on the natives from the top of the hill at the back of the fort. While the Tahitians were scrambling up the mountains to them, the ships fired grape shot on them, and killed several. The French suffered a great loss, though they will not own it. Four of their officers were killed in the last battle."

"Pomare was waiting patiently for the news from England. The natives were determined not to go back to their stations till they heard from England."

"All the missionaries, except four, had been constrained to leave the island, in consequence of the distressing state of affairs."

THE COURT AND HAU TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent left Frogmore this afternoon, between twelve and one o'clock, in an open carriage and four, with outriders, for Clarence House, St. James's, accompanied by the Countess Josephine Wratiaslaw, and attended by Lady Charlotte Dundas. Colonel Sir George Cowper (query in waiting to her Royal Highness), left for Clarence House at an early hour this morning, proceeding from blough to Paddington by the Great Western Railway. The Royal Duchess will take her departure from town on Saturday next, for Witley Court, Wiltshire, upon a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager. The Countess Wratiaslaw, Lady Charlotte Dundas, and Sir George Cowper, will proceed with her Royal Highness into Wiltshire. The Duchess of Kent will return to Frogmore on the 1st or 2nd proximo; the period which is at present fixed upon for the arrival of the Court at the Castle from the north. Mr. Brown, warden to the Royal Household, at Windsor Castle, accompanied the infant Royal Family to Brighton, on Tuesday last, at the express command of the Queen. It being the first time of the Prince Alfred leaving the Castle, her Majesty was gracious that his Royal Highness should be attended, throughout the journey, by a medical man, and Mr. Brown (who returned to Windsor yesterday) had the honour of being selected for that purpose. Immediately upon

Mr. Brown's return he waited on the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore House, to report to her Royal Highness that the infant Prince bore the journey remarkably well, and that the whole of the royal infants were in excellent health. The following members of the royal household will be in attendance upon the Royal Family during their sojourn at the Pavilion, at Brighton:—The Dowager Lady Lyttelton (governess to the Princess Royal), Col. the Hon. Charles Grey (equerry in waiting to the Queen), and the Hon. C. A. Murray (the master of the household). Mr. Norton (the superintendent of the household) will neither proceed to Scotland nor to the Pavilion. Several changes are spoken of as likely soon to take place in the household of the Sovereign.

ARRIVAL OF THE ROYAL CHILDREN IN BRIGHTON.—A special train, consisting of her Majesty's carriage, between two other first-class carriages, and a couple of carriage-trucks, bearing two of her Majesty's private carriages, arrived at the Brighton terminus, on Tuesday afternoon, at a quarter to six o'clock. Arrangements had been made for the reception of the royal party, a part of the platform being carpeted. Six of her Majesty's horses were in waiting, and in about five minutes, there were attached to the royal carriages, and the Prince of Wales and his royal brother and sister, together with Lady Lyttelton, left the terminus, and entered the Palace gates at five minutes to six o'clock.

THE QUEEN'S DOWAGERS.—We are happy to state that her Majesty the Queen Dowager arrived safely at Witley Court, Worcestershire, on Monday evening, between five and six o'clock, where she was warmly greeted by all the most influential inhabitants of the surrounding neighbourhood.

DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE OF PRUSSIA.—On Saturday last a splendid dinner was given to the Prince Royal of Prussia at the Crown and Sceptre, Greenwich. The health of the Prince was proposed in the course of the evening, and in acknowledging the compliment, the Prince expressed his deep sense of the kind reception he had met with in England. He added that the hospitality and kindness which he had experienced from her most gracious Majesty and Prince Albert, and the friendly feelings with which he had been greeted by all classes of society in various parts of the Kingdom, alike demanded his grateful acknowledgments, and he might truly say, that his second visit to England must ever rank pre-eminent among the pleasing recollections of his future years. His Highness embarked in the evening on board the Lightning steamer for Ostend. His Royal Highness arrived at Ostend at eleven o'clock on Sunday night, after a very favourable passage from England in the Lightning steamer. His Royal Highness was received at the pier by his Majesty the King of the Belgians and Baron V. Armin, the Prussian Minister at the Court of Brussels.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO HER MAJESTY.—We learn from good authority that Louis Philippe's visit to the Queen will certainly take place early next month. It is said that some of his suite have already arrived in England to make arrangements connected with the royal visit. Her Majesty will stay at Windsor, and it is doubtful whether he will remain at all in London. His Majesty will embark at Treport on the 24 of October, and proceed at once from Portsmouth to Windsor. The Queen of the French will not accompany his Majesty; but it is expected that King Louis Philippe will be attended by two of his Ministers, and by his youngest son, the Duke de Montpensier.

CONTEMPORARY ROYAL MARRIAGE.—We are informed by our Paris correspondent that the Duke d'Angoulême is about to marry the Princess de Salern, sister of the King of the Two Sicilies.

Lord Palmerston and the Marquis of Lansdowne are at Windsor.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The Hon. Mrs. Evelyn, the accomplished niece to the late Mrs. Fitcher, is very shortly to be married to the Marquis de la Force, grandson to the Duke de la Force. The family is nearly allied to the House of Orleans, and bears one of the most ancient as well as historical names of France. The marriage is to take place in Paris during the course of the present month.

Lord Beaumont was married on Monday morning to the Hon. Miss Brown, daughter of Lord Kilgobbin.

The contemplated marriage between H. Tufnell, Esq., M.P. for Devonport, and the Hon. Miss Bray, daughter of General Lord Stafford, G.C.B., is, we understand, fixed to take place on the 20th of next month.

Lord John Russell arrived at Frankfurt on Saturday last.

The Duchess of Manchester continues indisposed by an attack of fever at Tredrags Castle, near Armagh, where the family are staying.

ALARMING ILLNESS OF MISS PEEL.—We regret to state that Miss Peel, the daughter of Sir Robert Peel, is dangerously indisposed at Drayton Manor. Sir Robert was prevented from accompanying her Majesty to Scotland in consequence of this calamity. The malady of the youthful invalid is a fever of the worst form, it having originated from a cold. Miss Peel was taken ill on Thursday week, and the disorder has gradually increased ever since. The throat is much affected. On Tuesday, Miss Peel passed a favourable night and was certainly improving, although at present her recovery cannot be positively pronounced. At the first consultation of the medical gentlemen, so serious was the condition of their patient that they were desirous that Sir Robert and Lady Peel should prepare themselves for the worst. The accounts received from Drayton Manor on Thursday morning were rather more favourable; the fever has in some degree abated, and Miss Peel is considered a little better, although not out of danger. The pulse still continues very high; it has reached 150, and is now about 100.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE BRITISH ARCHAEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—This new institution assembled at Canterbury on Monday, under the presidency of Lord Albert Conyngham. The association already numbers several hundred, and is daily increasing in force, including all ranks, from the ducal peer to the working antiquary. A variety of most interesting papers, by Dr. Bray, Sir Wm. Betham, J. Bateman, Esq., jun., the Rev. John Bathurst Deane, J. Britten, Esq., and other learned and scientific gentlemen, on subjects connected with the history, architecture, and peculiarities of the primeval, medieval, and subsequent stages of the history of Britain, from the earliest known period of its existence as an empire, were read. Lord Albert Conyngham having invited the meeting to accompany him, for the purpose of inspecting certain gold ornaments of great value, found in barrows in this country, the whole body adjourned, and a most brilliant conversation terminated the business of the day.

SEVERE FIRE AT BRADFORD.—On Sunday morning a large fire occurred at the valuable mill belonging to Messrs. Holdenworth, at Greenspice, near Bradford, Yorkshire, the whole of which, in the short space of two hours, totally destroyed, together with their contents and extensive machinery. The loss of property is reported to be £6,500, the chief portion of which is insured.

PAKES FOR THE PEOPLE.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of the working classes of Manchester and Salford was held at the Free Trade Hall in the former town, for the purpose of adopting measures in furtherance of the important object of finding places for the healthful recreation of the people. Sir Robert Peel has contributed the sum of £100 for the purpose. The following letter from the right hon. baronet, couched in terms the most graceful, as well as indicative of the greatest anxiety for the welfare of the working classes, was read to the meeting, and excited great enthusiasm.

"Gentlemen,—Although I have no longer any personal connection with the area of Manchester, by property or other local tie, yet, considering Manchester is to be the metropolis of a district, to the industry of which I and my family are under very deep obligations, and most heartily approving of the wise and benevolent design to provide for those who are doomed to almost incessant toil the means of healthful recreation and harmless enjoyment, I willingly contribute to the furtherance of that design, and offer my cordial wishes for its success.

"I regard my name may be added to the subscription which has been announced for this purpose for the sum of £100.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant.

"ROBERT PEEL.

The same well-deserved compliment was paid to the announcement of a contribution of a similar sum by Lord Francis Egerton. Several gentlemen enlarged upon the necessity of providing public walks for the people, and several resolutions in support of that object were agreed to. [Although England has made some advances of late years in providing places where the people may take air and exercise, yet we are considerably behind our continental neighbours in this respect. In France, for instance, there is scarcely the most miserable town but has its place, where all classes promenade some time in the day, almost as a matter of necessity. It is true that in the metropolis there are the parks, and considerable expense has been incurred in St. James's Park, for instance, but these places of recreation are too distant from each other. In this overcrowded metropolis there should be parks, or public promenades, at each extremity.]

THE THUNDER-STORM OF SUNDAY LAST.—The thunder-storm which visited the metropolis on Sunday evening last, has done a good deal of damage in different parts of the country. At Brighton the storm lasted with unabated violence for upwards of two hours; the lightning was very vivid, the thunder kept up a continued din, and rain fell in torrents, running like a river down the streets leading to the centre of the town. In the midst of the storm, the excursion train started to London, but owing to the alarming appearance of the weather, a great many remained behind rather than face the storm. The excursion train from the Haslemere station was delayed two hours, and on its return it stuck fast in Clayton Tunnel for upwards of an hour, the train being too heavy for the engine. The storm raged with equal violence through the whole country of Sussex. During the storm, a fire ball fell on the buildings of a farm, called Gustin, in the parish of Ash, near Sandwich, the property of Mr. Coleman; and although the engines from Sandwich and Canterbury were sent for, they arrived too late to save any portion of the property, except the farm-house, which was detached from the buildings. Two farms filled with corn, a bean-stack, and all the out-buildings, were entirely destroyed, also a valuable short-horn bull, a calf, and a pig. A woman who witnessed the storm saw a ball of fire fall on the barn. An appalling instance of the effects of lightning occurred near Darby on Friday evening, during the storm, by which one poor fellow was instantly killed, and another had a most miraculous escape from death. Between five and six o'clock, as a number of men employed by Mr. Eches were at work in a field on the Linton-road, a heavy thunder-bolt came on, and two of the men took shelter under a tree, where they had been only a few minutes when they were both struck by the electric fluid. One of them, named Samuels, was killed on the spot, and the other, Mr. Eches's servant man, John Pegg, was knocked down and rendered insensible.

MURDER AT DORSET.—Considerable consternation was manifested at Dorset and Canterbury on Monday, by the discovery of the murder of a policeman at Dorset, in which three parties, surnames of the name of Clark, who are natives of Canterbury, were implicated. These individuals, it appeared, went on an excursion for the day, remaining till a late hour at night, when they got embroiled with the police, the three being intoxicated. The result was an affray, in which Police-constable Hammond lost his life, another of the same force being also seriously injured. The parties made their escape, but were subsequently apprehended, the one who was foremost in the affray being taken at Canterbury on Monday morning.

INCENDIARY FIRE IN HEDYBROOK.—Last week some persons set fire to a barn in the occupation of Mr. Page, of Lower Caldecott, an extensive farmer, and who is also landlord of the King's Head Inn at that place. The flames broke out soon after eleven o'clock, and spread rapidly over the entire of the homestead before the alarm was given. A number of labourers quickly collected, and generally evinced a readiness to assist, but, owing to the difficulty of obtaining water, their efforts were of comparatively little use. By great exertion a small portion of the property was saved. The loss is, however, very considerable. Nearly the whole of the newly-harvested crop was destroyed, consisting of the produce of between three and four acres of wheat in the straw, three acres of barley, also in the straw, some live stock and the whole of the farm buildings. The premises were left safe at eight o'clock, when the labourers quitted work. The tenant, who is uninsured, will be a heavy loser. The farm is the property of Mr. Hogg, who had the farm-buildings insured.

INUNDATION AND LOSS OF LIFE AT STOCKPORT.—Yesterday week there was a heavy storm at Stockport, which was attended with lamentable results. The principal damage occurred at Hazel-grove, about three miles from the town, where was a large reservoir of water, at one end of which, ten feet from it, was a wall, about as many feet high and nearly forty yards long. A stream commencing with the reservoir became prodigiously swollen, and there being no sufficient outlet for the water, it overflowed and pressed against the wall, forcing in large quantities round its ends. A number of persons incautiously crept under the wall for shelter, when at the moment the force of the water swept the wall from its foundation for the length of about thirty yards, carrying a great number of the unfortunate people away with the current, many of whom were buried under the ruins of the wall. Thirteen were very severely injured, and six of them are dead. The names of the latter are as follows:—Jane Cheatham, aged fourteen years, daughter of William Cheatham of Stockport, Little-moor, brickmaker; her skull was fractured and her right thigh broken. Mary Cope, aged sixteen years, daughter of John Cope, planer. Ann Jackson, aged sixteen years, daughter of John Jackson, brickmaker. Deceased was tender of dyer's frames in the card-room. Jane Goaling, aged twelve years, daughter of Robert Goaling, weaver. Deceased was a piecer; her skull and thigh fractured. Jane Hibbert, aged fourteen years, daughter of Booth Hibbert, silk weaver. Deceased was a tenter of Throstley; she was bruised about her head and other parts of her body. Her body was washed down the stream, and was found two fields off from the place of the accident. John Morris, aged fifteen years, son of Thomas Morris, shoemaker, deceased, was injured about the head and arms. At the inquest a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned in all the cases. At Womb Through the Maclefield canal overflowed its banks, filling some of the coal-pits, putting out the engine fire, and setting several carts and horses adrift. At Hope-green, on the Maclefield-road, a wall, running parallel with a brook which skirts the road, was at one point forced down by the water. The "Express" Pottery coach was passing at the moment, and was near being upset by the rush of water.

INCENDIARISM IN KENT.—Yesterday week between two and three o'clock, a fire broke out in the stackyard of Mr. John Stephens, an extensive farmer at Farnborough, but in consequence of timely alarm, being given it was confined to the haystack where it broke out, and not more than six loads of hay were consumed. Some circumstances having been discovered, implicating a man named Thomas Madin, he was apprehended, and after an examination before Lord Sydney at Bromley, he was committed for trial on the charge of having set fire to the stack. Madin was tried at the last Summer Assizes at Winchester, for feloniously cutting and wounding a man named King, when it was proved that he had gone into the shop of the prosecutor, snatched a knife off the counter, and stabbed him with it. The defence set up being insanity, the jury acquitted the prisoner upon the ground, and he was ordered by the Court to be detained in safe custody. It is not known how he obtained his liberation.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

LANEABLE COLLISION AND LOSS OF LIFE IN THE IRISH CHANNEL.—On Tuesday morning, soon after two o'clock, the Dublin mail iron steam ship Iron Duke (600 tons burthen), came into collision with the brig Parana (300 tons), outward bound from Liverpool for Montreal, about three leagues to the eastward of Point Lynes Light, by which the latter vessel was nearly cut in two, and so sudden was the accident that six of her crew, including her commander (out of eleven on board in all) were thrown into the water, and perished. The brig, it appears, had a light on her poop, and her mate also elevated the hinnacle light in his hand, and shouted towards the steamer when he saw her coming rapidly into dangerous proximity; but, as he conjectured, "he was not heard, owing probably to the noise of the engines, and the steamer, before the brig could effectually alter her course, ran into her abreast of the fore hatch. The night was thick, and there seems no reason to attribute blame to either party from the information yet received. The names of those saved from the brig were—William Hichell, mate (badly hurt); William Cover and John Martin, seamen; John Craig, cook and steward. Another man was also saved. Those deceased were—Wilson, the captain; Alexander Stewart, second mate; George Coates, seaman; also the carpenter and two ordinary seamen. The captain was, it is stated, a married man, and has left his wife and five children in Liverpool. A subscription was immediately entered into on board the steamer, on behalf of the survivors, and, we learn, very soon amounted to £400.

A CHILD BURNED TO DEATH.—On Wednesday, Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road, on the body of Bridget Cooney, aged two and a half years, whose parents reside at No. 6, James's-street, Westminster-square. It appeared that in the brief temporary absence of the mother on Monday morning, the deceased, dressed only in her night gown, approached the fire as near as to ignite it, and the consequence was nearly costing alive. The child was instantly brought to that hospital, and died in three or four hours afterwards. The Coroner remarked that children were frequently roasted alive by the ignition of so light a garment as a cotton night gown. The surest remedy possible for burns, particularly as a first application, was pure flour when it could be had, and no family should be without it. Verdict, "Accidental death."

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Monday a fatal accident occurred to a female, the name of Bailey, at the Alderley station of the Manchester Railway. It appeared that she was getting out of the carriage, at the Alderley station, and, by some accident, slipped and fell on the rails. The carriages were in motion, and two of them passed over her head, and killed her on the spot. She has left a husband and three children.

ALARMING ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday, about ten o'clock in the forenoon, as Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. Ebdy, residing at 24, Vauxhall-walk, were passing in a four-wheel phaeton through Bridge-street, Westminster, the horse suddenly took fright, and in passing the corner of Abingdon-street the phaeton turned over and threw them with great violence on the ground, dragging them some distance. Mrs. Bennett, who appeared to be the most injured, was taken up in a shocking state, her face dreadfully lacerated, bleeding profusely, and quite in a state of insensibility. Mr. Bennett had both his shoulders dislocated; and Mr. and Mrs. Ebdy were very much disfigured. They were instantly removed to Westminster Hospital, and after every attention had been paid to them, it was found that Mrs. Bennett was not in a proper state to proceed home, and lies in a very dangerous condition.

SUICIDE OF CAPTAIN DIXON.—On Monday an adjourned inquest was held at the Pimlico Arms, Kensington, on the body of Capt. Henry Stanley Dixon, 88th Foot, who it appeared committed suicide by cutting his throat on the previous Thursday. A gentleman, whose name did not transpire, but who said he was a brother officer of the deceased, said that he had been for the last fourteen years on terms of the greatest intimacy with the deceased. He was of eccentric habits, but was a man of strong mind until he was afflicted, when he became depressed. Deceased was subject to paralysis of the brain, which affected his eyes. Deceased used to call it his severe affliction. The jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased died by his own act, but as to the state of his mind at the time there was not sufficient evidence before them to show it."

ACCIDENT ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—On Monday night, about eight o'clock, a pilot-engine was running along the line from Brighton towards the Godstone station; when near the latter station the luggage train was proceeding slowly towards London, and before the driver of the pilot-engine could stop, his engine came with fearful violence against the luggage train and completely knocked three of the carriages off the line, doing them considerable damage. Fortunately, no person was on them at the time. Owing to the accident the train did not arrive at the London terminus until four o'clock on Tuesday morning, instead of nine the preceding night, the regular time.

A WIDOWED FLEETMASTER.—Peter M. Walter, of whose robberies we gave an account last week, was arraigned at the Surrey Sessions on Tuesday, and pleaded guilty to two indictments, charging him with robberies at public-houses. The prisoner, it may be recollected, had supported himself during the last twelve months by plundering West-end hotels, and was also known to have committed several other robberies in Dublin. The number of robberies committed by the prisoner, in the most daring manner, is astonishing, and would form a complete Newgate Calendar by themselves. The Court said, it was a very bad case, and sentenced the prisoner to seven years' transportation.

MYSTERIOUS SUICIDE.—Yesterday week, as the steam-boat Waterman No. 7 left Woolwich on her voyage to London, among her passengers was a gentleman respectfully attired, and accompanied by a lady. They were observed by the other passengers to be engaged in earnest conversation, and the lady appeared very much excited. When the vessel was between Charlton and Waltham-point, the gentleman gave his walking-stick to the lady, walked deliberately to the stern of the boat, and jumped overboard. Mr. W. Phillips, the master, immediately ordered the engines to be reversed. Every effort was made to save him, but, though he was observed to struggle for some time in the water, he ultimately sunk before assistance reached him. The lady appeared distressed. She positively refused to give either name or address. It was afterwards ascertained that the name of the young man is Henry Terry. His parents, with whom he was residing, are in affluent circumstances, and live in Clarendon-square, Somerset-town. The deceased is 24 years of age, and would shortly have come into the possession of considerable property. An inquest was held on the body of Mr. Terry on Wednesday night, at the Mitre, Waltham. Mr. Thomas Terry, of No. 43, Clarendon-square, St. Pancras, said the deceased was his brother, and resided with his father and himself. The last time he saw his brother alive was on Monday week last. For some time past there had been a great alteration in him, which had been produced by being led away by a disreputable character. On the Monday he appeared very desponding, and on witness asking him what was the matter he put his hand up to his head, and said it is here. The jury returned a verdict "That the deceased destroyed himself, labouring at the time under temporary insanity."

THE CHURCH.

I stood within a massive pile,
Of ancient days the centre,
Through pillared arch and lengthening aisle,
I gazed with awe and longing
Pondering man's solemn rite,
The substance o'er the marble ground
Their purpled hues flung,
And hallowed arches gleamed around,
And hallowed hues were hung,
Who would not love, methought, to lie
Entombed within this fane of gorgeous majesty.

Cradled upon the mighty deep
A lonely vessel lay;
The sails were hoisted in a sigh,
Awaiting their own play.
I marked that vessel's gathered throng,
While, in his watery bed,
Unfathom'd Ocean's waves among,
They smothered the dead.
And 'ere I wished beneath the wave,
Amid that giant solitude, to find a grave.

Once more, where rustic tombs were round
I stood at evening's fall,
While darkness o'er each grassy mound
Second silence lowly fell.
The stars from out the kindling sky
Their gentle radiance shed,
And soft the night seemed to sigh
Its requiem o'er the dead.
Musing in that lone hour, I prayed
That I might there, at last, in calm repose be laid.

Yes, let me make my last abode
Beneath the church's guardian shade;
In artless state and quietude
Within her sheltering precincts laid.
No need that epitaphs be disclosed,
And tell my last repose;
The turf my monument shall be,
You know each my escape.
Kind Nature shall each opening spring
Answer her voice in ceaseless bring,
And woe in flowers, that gently warm,
Her spring upon my grave.

THE EXPENSE OF RAILWAYS.

The London and Blackwall Railway cost £325,070 per mile, which is the highest cost of any railway in the kingdom. The Greenwich comes next for expensiveness, and cost £264,733. The three lines which were executed at the lowest cost per mile are the Abingdon and Farnham, the Aylesbury Junction, and the Hayle Railways, which severally cost £93,300, £87,100, and £69,400 per mile. The London and Birmingham cost £153,700 per mile; the Great Western, £135,330; and the South-Western, £137,750. The Liverpool and Manchester cost £11,320 per mile; the Manchester and Leeds, £109,500; and the London and Brighton, £64,370.

IMPORTATION OF QUICKSILVER FROM CHINA.

We see by the papers just received from India, that there is a prospect of obtaining large quantities of quicksilver from China, some of the provinces of which have been long known to yield it in considerable abundance. One of the main novelties in the Chinese import consists in the mode of package, the metal being simply poured into a piece of bamboo, about a foot long and three inches thick, having each end firmly closed with resin. This rude form of package is found quite as serviceable as the iron bottle in which mercury is usually brought, while it is lighter, and in every way more convenient for shipment.

LOUIS ELDON'S DEFINITION OF TASTE.

James Boswell called upon me at my chambers in Lincoln's-inn, desiring to know what would be my definition of taste. I told him I must decline informing him how I should define it; because I knew he would publish what I said would be my definition of it, and I did not choose to subject my notion of it to public criticism. He continued, however, his importunities in frequent calls, and, in one, complained much that I would not give him my definition of taste, as he had that morning got Henry Dundas's (afterwards Lord Melville), Sir Archibald Macdonald's, and John Anstruther's definitions of taste. "Well, then," I said, "Boswell, we must have an end of this. Taste, according to my definition, is the judgment which Dundas, Macdonald, Anstruther, and you, manifested, when you determined to quit Scotland and come into the south. You may publish this if you please."—Life of Lord Eldon.

CULTIVATION OF SILK IN ENGLAND.

Mrs. Whitby, a lady residing at Newlands, near Lyngdon, Hampshire, recently forwarded to the Royal Agricultural Society a specimen of silk grown and wound off at her residence. In the communication accompanying the silk she states that she has for some years been a cultivator of the mulberry and a rearer of silk-worms. She considers that the mulberry tree is frequently exposed to as severe cold in winter in the neighbourhood of Milan as it is in England; and her own experiments have since shown that it will live very well through an English winter. Mrs. Whitby also states that the hatching of the eggs is carried on in a room heated to the temperature of about 70 degrees by an Argon stove; and she finds it better to have the process of hatching begun about a month later than it is usually begun in France and Italy.

PROVERBS OF THE CHINESE.

The tombs open every moment, and close for ever.—It is from what people say that we judge of the value of their silence.—Memory rather cumberstons with than supplies it; a thousand recollections are not worth one thought.—With money the dead can be made to speak; without it even the dumb will not be silent.—Whoever seeks nothing but how to do men good can never be deceived by them.—Captain Piddington's Chinese Pro.

INCREASE IN THE GROWTH OF COFFEE.

We find in a Paris paper some interesting particulars of the increase of the growth of coffee in all producing countries. It is augmenting every year. The sum total of the crops of last year is 450 millions of pounds—being an excess of 10 per cent. over that of the preceding year. This quantity has been produced by the following countries, in these proportions:—Brazil, 170 millions of lbs.; Java, 140 millions; Cuba, 45 millions; St. Domingo, 34 millions; Porto Rico and Lagayra, 30 millions; the English West Indies, 10 millions; the East Indies and Mocha, 6 millions; the French Colonies, 4 millions; and the Dutch West Indies, 3 millions. About 5-12ths of this quantity has been exported for consumption in the United States.

THE GAS LIGHTS OF LONDON AND THE ENVIRONS.

The following curious statistics, prepared by one of the principal gas companies, will give some idea of the means at present employed for lighting London and its suburbs:—There are eighteen public gas-works, conducted by twelve companies; their capital amounts to upwards of £2,500,000, employed in pipes, tanks, &c. The revenue derivable therefrom is estimated at £450,000 per annum. There are about 150,000 tons of coals used annually; there are 1,450,000,000 cubic feet of gas made; 134,300 private lights, 30,400 public lights; 200 lamp-lighters; 175 gasometers, several of them double, and capable of storing 5,500,000 feet; and about 2500 persons are employed in various ways.

THE VISIBLE SIGN OF BAPTISM.

At a Sunday-school examination a few days ago, a little girl being asked by her catechist, "What is the outward visible sign or form in baptism?" innocently replied, "Please, Sir, the baby."

IMPORTANT ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERY.

A very remarkable discovery has recently been made by M. Bessel, of Konigsberg, which opens out new views to the constitution of the sidereal universe. By a long and laborious examination of the places of Sirius and Procyon, as deduced from the observations of different astronomers since the year 1755 (the epoch of Bradley's observation), including his own, carried on at the Konigsberg Observatory, he has come to the conclusion that the proper motions of these two stars are not uniform, but deviate from that law—the former in right ascension, and the latter in declination in a very sensible degree. Astronomers will at once perceive the importance of this conclusion, which proves that the stars describe orbits in space, under the influence of dynamical laws and central forces.

ANECDOTE OF MRS. SIDDON.

There is a striking anecdote of Mrs. Siddons. When standing before the Apollo Belvedere, then in the gallery of the Louvre, she exclaimed, after a long pause of silent admiration, "How great must be the Being who created the genius which produced such a form as this!" a thought characteristic of her mind, but more fitly inspired by the works of Michael Angelo than by those of any artist the world has yet seen. They have impressed upon them a character of greatness, of durability, of sublimity of invention and consummate skill in contrivance, which fills the contemplative mind, and leads it irresistibly from the created up to the Creator.

THE LAW OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE IN AMERICA.

An American paper gives an account of a trial for breach of promise of marriage, in which the judge laid down a strange doctrine:—"A case was recently tried in Rutland, Vermont, North America, in which a Miss Mason recovered 1450 dollars of a Mr. Hastings for a breach of a marriage contract. The curiosity of the thing is this—the Vermont judge charged the jury that no explicit promise was necessary to bind the parties to a marriage contract, but that long continued attentions or intimacy with a female was as good evidence of intended matrimony as a special contract. The principle of the case undoubtedly is, that if H. eloped did not promise, he ought to have done so—the law holds him responsible for the non-performance of his duty."

THOMAS CAMPBELL, THE POET.

It is well known that Campbell's own favourite poem, of all his compositions, was his "Geirade." "I once heard him say, 'I never like to see my name before 'The Pleasures of Hope'; why, I cannot tell you, unless it was that when young, I was always greeted among my friends as Mr. Campbell, author of 'The Pleasures of Hope.' Good morning to you, Mr. Campbell, author of 'The Pleasures of Hope.' When I got married, I was married as the author of 'The Pleasures of Hope'; and when I became a father, my son was the son of the author of 'The Pleasures of Hope.' A kind of grim smile, ill-subdued, we are afraid, stole over our features, when, standing beside the poet's grave, we read the inscription on his coffin—"Thomas Campbell, L.L.D., author of 'The Pleasures of Hope,' died June 15, 1844, aged 67." The poet's dislike occurred to our memory—there was no getting the better of the thought.—Fraser's Magazine.

THE WATER MELON IN AUSTRALIA.

So abundant is this delicious fruit in South Australia, that it may be had at half-a-crown the hundred weight. The variety of appearance, size, and flavour, adapt themselves to all palates, and compensate for the comparative scarcity of tree fruits, but which give promise of soon becoming as cheap as in any part of the world. The quantity of melons consumed by all classes and ages would astonish the most lavish consumers of fruit in the mother country.—Adelaide Observer.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The Paris correspondent of a New York paper states, that the Parisian editors cannot possibly spell the name of Mr. Fredinphuyes, whilst the name of Mr. Folk is printed "Polque, Polke, Polbe, Polque, and finally, Polka, the new jig."

ANTI-PATHIES OF GREAT MEN.

The greatest and cleverest of men have their weaknesses. Peter the Great could not touch a lizard; Marshal Baze almost swooned if a cat came too near him; and it is well known that King Gustavus Adolphus had a particular antipathy to spiders.

LIBERATION OF MR. O'CONNELL, AND THE OTHER STATE PRISONERS, AT DUBLIN.

ARRIVAL OF THE NEWS AT THE PENITENTIARY.

It was to be expected that the reversal of the sentence of the Irish Court of Queen's Bench, by the House of Peers, would lead to great exultation and excitement in Ireland. The private letters and the Irish papers are filled with accounts of the rejoicings which have taken place. We supply from the most authentic sources a consecutive description of the whole proceedings that have taken place since the news arrived in Ireland.

The arrival of the Medusa at Kingstown is thus described by a Whig writer:—"The Solicitors, Mr. Mahoney, Mr. Ford, and Mr. Cantwell, and Mr. O'Hagan, one of the counsel for the traversers, were recognised, and when it was known that they cheered, a cheer burst from the multitude so vehement, so earnest, and so fierce, that in its excitement of exultation it pierced the ear as if it were a shriek. 'O'Connell is free!' was rung forth by the antiphonal voice of Mr. Ford, and the word 'free' was echoed back again in an hundred voices. Men rushed tumultuously forward to the very brink of the pier, and seemed ready to bound across the space of waters that yet separated them from those who came the messengers of such joyful tidings. All was confusion, all excitement upon shore; whilst the only words that could be heard were 'free,' 'free,' 'is O'Connell free?' and whilst men bounded and shouted aloud for joy, there was not a woman present whose hands did not seem clasped together, as if she were engaged in prayer. At last the vessel reached the land, and then the flag-bearers, jumping on shore, displayed them fully to view, and as the words were repeated by the tongues of many men aloud, shouts and blessings rung around from every side. The appearance of the flags seemed to produce a magical effect."

An immense multitude, of course, went to Richmond gaol, and the same writer thus describes the way in which O'Connell received the news:—

"Upon being conducted to Mr. O'Connell's apartments, I found him and his friends in the very flash of the triumph, which was now officially, it may be said, announced to them. Large as the apartments are allotted to Mr. O'Connell's use, they were swarming now with a crowd. He bore the intelligence with the same calmness that it was manifest he would have shown had it been of an opposite nature. His lip, and his eye, and the cordial grasp of his hand, showed his joy, and how deeply he felt the sympathy exhibited towards him, but he was not in the slightest degree shaken by the intelligence. I might truly say that I could see him but for a moment, for he was overwhelmed with congratulations upon gratulations, that came pouring in upon him, in fresh accessions of old and steadfast friends, who rushed to his place of confinement to bid him joy. Upon turning to look at the other traversers, I perceived that none had suffered from their confinement."

Our first engraving represents the scene outside the Penitentiary, at the moment of the arrival of the news.

At length dinner was announced, and comparative quiet was for some time restored. It was during the time that Mr. O'Connell, with his son, and the families of the traversers, with some of his most attached friends, were dining, that a gentleman was seen hurrying into the room, evidently much excited, and saying, "Good God! can it be true?" He fell exhausted into a chair, and it was some time before he recovered. When he had done so, he was merely able to say, or rather to sob forth, as he grasped the hand of Mr. O'Connell, "I come, sir, to congratulate you on what I heard."

It turned out that this gentleman was Mr. Pardon, the Governor of Richmond Penitentiary, who is a political opponent of Mr. O'Connell. So much for the occurrences in the prison.

THE PROCESSION FROM THE PRISON TO MR. O'CONNELL'S HOUSE.

On Friday evening Mr. Garthan arrived with the order for the discharge of the prisoners. It was arranged that there should be a procession from the prison to Mr. O'Connell's house on the next day (Saturday last). This procession is described as a "monster mob," and according to all the accounts it was a gathering of no ordinary description. The Chronicle correspondent says:—

"Never in Dublin was there such a procession seen, either for the numbers that it included, or that witnessed it, or for the respectability and wealth of those who either participated in it, or manifested their delight in witnessing it. The great climax to its magnificence was, however, the moment in which Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by his son John, and the Rev. Dr. Milroy, Mr. Duffy, Mr. Steele, Mr. Ray, Doctor Gray, and Mr. Barrett, emerged from the prison gates, to take part in it. A movement from those who could see from the parapet of the prison into the inner court, intimated to those outside that Mr. O'Connell was about to appear. The crowds, which up to that time had been cheering loudly, paused; the silence seemed to run with the rapidity of electricity along the line. There was a dead silence. It continued for at least five minutes; and then, when at length O'Connell was conducted from the gaol by Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., a sudden cheer burst forth, but it was instantly suppressed, as if it were premature. A low, deep, and thrilling murmur seemed to be uttered by the thousands that were witnessing the scene; it was the suppressed exclamation of men who were struggling with their feelings, and endeavouring to master them. At length Mr. O'Connell, with Mr. John O'Connell and the Rev. Dr. Milroy, were seen ascending the triumphal car; and then came forth a shout, so loud, so long, so vehement, and so enthusiastic, that even the man of firmest nerve must for the moment have felt himself shaken by it. Wherever the eye could reach upon the space beneath it, was occupied by a human being, and each and all were sending forth a peal of acclamation. The shout of those in front of the prison was caught up along the whole line of procession, and for at least five minutes the air seemed to be rent with a thunderburst of joyful cheerings, that came reverberating back upon the utterers, making every heart beat quicker, and every eye glance brighter. The cheers continued; and then Mr. O'Connell, who wore on his head a bright green velvet cap, rose and waved it two or three times round his head, when again and again were the acclamations renewed—each time appearing to increase in fervour and in strength. There could not have been less than five hundred thousand persons gathered together for this national festival; and, as Mr. O'Connell looked down on it, and saw the civic officers coming thus to greet him, and so many of those who enjoy the respect of their fellow-citizens coming thus to do homage to him, that scene of which Cicero boasts so much to his friend Atticus, of the welcome given to him, must have appeared poor in comparison. The carriage in which Mr. O'Connell sat on this occasion was of the most magnificent description. Dr. Gray, his lady and family, occupied the next carriage. Mr. Barrett, Mr. Duffy, and Mr. Ray next; and Mr. Steele sat in the third from the triumphal car. Each of these gentlemen was warmly applauded as he took his seat. The next carriage in the procession contained the solicitors for the defence, bearing the monster indictment."

Another writer gives an account of the procession in these terms:—"The ovation commenced at two o'clock. First came the trades of Dublin, each preceded by the banner of its body, and a band playing such music as only temperance bands can play, and generally with much discrimination, selecting rather difficult pieces for their performance, and eschewing all national airs. The banners were usually displayed from coaches, intended to hold four, but contriving to allow from sixteen to eighteen to fit into, and hang on by them. Thus they came on:—bricklayers (with a painting of the Bank of Ireland, and the supererogation of 'Our old House at Home'); slaters, woclen operatives (in a small open car); sailors (with a picture of Brian Boru's 'milling' the Danes at Clontarf); coachmakers, tailors (with a very gorgeous equipage, six horses, postillions, and outriders); tinsmiths, displaying, as their sign, a man with a tin helmet on his head, and a fish cover of the same metal on his arm, otherwise unassumingly attired in a blue coat and white trousers; and other bodies of tradesmen too numerous to mention, with their appropriate emblems and banners. Next came a great number of Repeal wardens, bearing wands, and carrying respectable-looking coaches and carriages. After them drove the committee of the trades' political unions; the members of it attired in green sashes and scarfs, and bearing wands with green flags in their hands. Next in order were the various members of the corporation, aldermen, town-councillors, and officers, dressed in their robes of office and cocked hats, glittering with chains, and furred from head to foot. The majority of these gentlemen were in their own carriages, into each of which were packed as many of the owners' friends as could find standing room, several private vehicles being mixed up through the order of their procession. Then came the private carriages of the Lord Mayor, who was in full dress; and then, preceded by a confused mass of wand-bearers, the triumphal chariot itself, surrounded by a mob so dense that it was with great difficulty that the six splendid dappled greys could force the cumbersome vehicle along, which every instant seemed to become a second car of Juggernaut, and crush some of its adherents. More vehicles, a few horsemen, multitudes of hack cars and pedicabrians, a tail of old women and little boys, followed; and so the monster procession, after winding its slow length along through the greater part of Dublin, and causing a total cessation of business in the line of its progress, terminated."

The next engraving shows the procession at the moment of passing the Bank, when Mr. O'Connell pointed most significantly to the building. It is a fact worthy of notice, that there was not, in the immense assemblage, a single individual intoxicated; each guild was followed by a temperance band, with their badges, and the majority of persons who composed each band were dressed in military uniform.

The third illustration shows the triumphal chariot on its progress to Merriion-square. It was surrounded by a crowd so dense, that it was with great difficulty the six splendid dappled greys could force the cumbersome vehicle along. This vast vehicle originally figured so far back as 1832, at the chairing of Mr. O'Connell in that year. It is apparently constituted of a large platform, bearing three stories, arranged like steps of stairs, and profusely decorated with purple velvet, gold fringes, gilt-headed nails, bows, and paintings. On the top stair were two large arm-chairs, covered with purple velvet and gilding in (or rather standing before) which were placed Mr. O'Connell and his son John. The honourable gentleman stood up to his full height, with his head slightly thrown back, and waved his velvet cap and bowed incessantly, whilst at intervals his lips were seen to move. On the second stair was seated the Rev. Dr. Milley, and on the lowest range sat Mr. D. O'Connell, junior; an Irish harper attired in the full dress of the days "when Malachi wore the collar of gold" "useless" playing on a genuine Irish harp, and two young gentlemen (who we understood were Mr. O'Connell's grandsons) dressed in tunics of green velvet with caps of the same material and white feathers. The smaller engraving shows the chariot itself.

Mr. O'Connell reached Merriion-square at half-past five o'clock, where he was received with several rounds of enthusiastic applause. Having ascended to the balcony, he proceeded to address such portion of the procession as occupied the space in front of his house. He began by saying that this was "A great day for Ireland, and a day of justice. (Cheers.) All the people of Ireland ever desired was justice, and they had now got an instalment of it. The plans of the wicked, and the conspiracy of the oppressor, the foul mismanagement of the jury list, the base conspiracy against the lives, the liberties, and the constitutional rights of the public, had all, blessed be God, been defeated. Justice had thus far been obtained, and Ireland might if she deserved it be free. (Cheers.) But, did he doubt the people of Ireland deserving it? No, if he did he should be the most base as well as stupid of mankind. How could he doubt this? Had they not made the mighty experiment of meeting in tens and twenties of thousands—nay, in millions—meeting, too, in the tranquillity of the open day, with a strength that would bear down the armies of the world (cheers); but with a meekness, mildness, and gentleness of demeanour, that allowed them to be managed as if they were but a mere flock of children. (Cheers.) One meeting alone remained unassailed—that of Clontarf. (Great shouting.) Some of the ministers of power had, he feared, a scheme to dye that day in gore, to deluge the soil with the blood of the people; but the people disappointed them. (Cheers.) He issued his counter-proclamation, and it was obeyed. (Cheers.) The people declined to put themselves in danger. Had the law since declared that they had been acting illegally? No, it durst not do that, but it had spelt out illegality from a number of legal meetings. (Cheers.) Their Clontarf meeting had not taken place as yet, but it would be for the Repeal Association, who had the confidence of the Irish people, to determine whether it might not be necessary for the sake of public principle that that meeting should yet be held. (Great cheering.) He hoped they might conclude that it would not be necessary, but if the cause of liberty required it, they would all go there peaceably and unarmed, and return with an increased determination that Ireland should be a nation. (Cheers.) Then if they did not take that step what were they to do? Why, everything that could be necessary to procure repeal. They would adopt no detail without being perfectly advised as to its propriety and legality. They said that he was no lawyer or else had grown so old as to have forgotten his law, but he was young enough both in law and in fact for them yet. (Cheers.) He had often boasted that those who followed his advice had never been brought into jeopardy, but those who taunted him with that now turned round and said 'Doctor, cure thyself,' alleging that he who advised others well had misadvised himself. They said he was guilty of a conspiracy! His answer was, they lied. (Cheers.) It was not he alone who said that, it was Lord Chief Justice Denham of the House of Peers who said it. (Loud cheering.) If he (Mr. O'Connell) had wished his vanity to be indulged, and to prove his skill as a lawyer, he could not have devised a plan better calculated to effect his object than the events which had occurred." (Cheers.) The bun, and learned gentlemen continued to address the people assembled amidst torrents of rain, for some time, as portrayed in the engraving upon the first page of the present number. The procession then quietly dispersed.

The last illustration, at page 155, is a scene of the excitement general throughout Dublin. In the evening many streets were partially illuminated, particularly in the Liberties, Denmark-street, Lifford-street, Moore-street, and several others were also lighted up. Indeed, there were few streets where some houses did not appear to be "bright arrayed;" everything passed off with the utmost quiet, and we understood that during the entire day or night not so much as one person was taken into custody on any charge arising out of the brilliant and unsurpassed spectacle of the day.

There was no cessation to the excitement on Sunday. On that day high mass was celebrated at the Roman Catholic church, Marlborough-street, by "Archbishop Murray," and a number of the clergy, as an offering of thanksgiving for the liberation of Mr. O'Connell and his "fellow-martyrs." The chapel, which is capable of containing at least 3000 persons without inconvenience, was crammed to suffocation. Archbishop Murray officiated as "high priest," Mr. O'Connell, with his late fellow-prisoners, and a few of their friends, were provided with seats near the altar. Dr. Miley, in his sermon, decried at great length upon the advantages accruing from devotion to the "Virgin Mary," whose cult they were that day celebrating, and defended what is sometimes called "the doctrine of image worship." He eulogized the "patriotism" and "sacredness" of Mr. O'Connell, and, after a glowing description of "the privations" he endured for his country, and for the "cause of liberty and freedom," declared his conviction that the liberator, by whose untiring efforts so many thousands and millions had been released from slavery, was himself set free by an all-wise Providence, through the interposition and intercession of the Church. The Lord Mayor was present, and went and returned in state on the occasion.

The religious ceremonies of the day were not terminated until two o'clock. At that time Mr. O'Connell left the church, and was accompanied by hundreds on his way home, all testifying, by their cheers, the delight they felt in seeing him once more restored to liberty.

O'CONNELL'S SPEECH AT THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

Considerable attention was directed to the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday. The Cordillier Hall is hardly necessary to say presented a scene of vast excitement. From an early hour large crowds of persons, most of whom were decently-dressed women, assembled around the doors, which were soon thrown open to the accumulating masses, and instantly that portion of the gallery set apart for the humble members of the Association, as well as the body of the Hall, was thronged by a dense assemblage. The attendance of ladies was not less numerous, and the great pressure which their arrival urged them to inflict upon each other caused some distressing scenes around the doors. Mr. O'Connell's appearance was greeted most rapturously. For nearly ten minutes cheering and applause, which was not surpassed in intensity either at Tara or Mullaghmast, continued to peal through the hall. Mr. O'Connell acknowledged it by repeatedly bowing around him, kissing his hands to the ladies in the gallery, and placing the crown of his hat on his breast. As he was thus engaged, Mr. Smith O'Brien rushed to the front of the platform, causing if possible an increase in the clamour, and seizing Mr. O'Connell's hand, clutched it vigorously for some moments. Mr. O'Connell then caught Mr. S. O'Brien's hand, and placed it on his heart, whereat the very building trembled and quaked beneath the redoubled cheering and stamping.

At length the business of the day began. On the motion of Mr. O'Connell, the Lord Mayor of Dublin took the chair. Mr. Somerset Butler, M.P., the Hon. George Hely Hutchinson, brother of Lord Donoughmore, and Captain Moulton, an Orangeman, were enrolled as members of the association. Mr. O'Connell then made a long speech, which must have disappointed those who believed that he would receive the decision of the House of Lords in a meek and conciliatory spirit. This speech, on the contrary, was more energetic and denunciatory than usual. The hon. and learned gentleman began by referring to the progress of the trial, and contended that it was an unfair one. He said the triumph was the triumph of the honest and best of causes, and asserted that the present Government meditated treason to the throne when they attempted by means of the trial to suppress public opinion. The proceedings, however, had only hastened repeal. Mr. O'Connell said:

"What chance, I ask, would the repeal cause have if these proceedings had been allowed? (Cheers.) It would, to be sure, have some chance from the progress of public opinion; but now, in our peaceful way and tranquil night, united, but determined to violate no law, we remain, without a particle of individualism, as in our monster meetings, but with a continued and thorough conviction, that repeal is absolutely necessary for Ireland. (Hurrah, and loud cheers, which continued for several minutes.) There is no impediment now in the way of the peaceful and triumphant termination of the repeal movement. The constitutional right is free—the guarantee of trial by jury is secured, and will protect us, and, standing on one and on the other, I here announce that the universal feeling of the Irish people, from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear, and from Connemara to the Hill of Howth, is in favour of the great national cause of repeal, and must to any man of common sense and common honesty appear too strong to render any amount of resistance to it permanently successful." (Cheers.)

Mr. O'Connell asserted that the decision in his favour was the act of God:—"I repeat it is not the work of man. It is a blessing bestowed by Providence on the faithful people of Ireland. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) There is no superstition in regarding it as the gift of Providence; no enthusiasm in bowing before the throne of God and accepting it as his act. I would not introduce such a topic here if it were contrary to the principles or doctrine of any religious sect represented here. But it is not. It is the doctrine of the Protestant church, as well as of the Catholic church, that God interposes with the concerns of man."

After commenting upon the judgments pronounced by those English judges who were in favour of the continuation of the sentence, Mr. O'Connell characterized their opinion in three terms:—

"Their decision is, in fact, founded on a lie. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) There is no other way of calling it. They called it a presumption of law. I will not waste so much of my breath as to describe it in as roundabout a manner. It was a lie, and I will call it so. It was known to be a lie, and yet the judgment so founded was sought to be supported by Lord Lyndhurst and that innumerable wretch Brougham (groans), on this footing, that the lie was supposed to be true, and that we were to be punished against the fact, and in contradiction of the record itself; for the sentence was set forth in the record, 'for the offences aforesaid.'"

Next came a recantation of his abuse of the Whigs:—

"And now I am going (said Mr. O'Connell) to make an atonement to a class of public men whom I have often assailed, and who certainly, in some things, deserved to be assailed—namely, the Whigs. But, after all, how infinitely superior are they to the Tory party! The principle of Toryism is double. It takes away as much of public right from each individual as it can, and it amalgamates all together for the benefit of the aristocracy; but where Toryism is most terrific is in its anxiety to do the great injustice of putting partisans upon the bench of justice."

The next part of Mr. O'Connell's speech was a comparison between Whig and Tory judges; and, after praising the Northing Garonie, he alluded to what had taken place between Mr. Shell and Sir R. Peel. He said:—

"I confess I was angry at my friend Mr. Shell asking a request for me from Peel, that looked like requiring a favour; and he ought to have known me better than to think I could possibly receive anything having the appearance of a boon from such hands. No; I would rather have rotted in the gaol than owe my liberation to the pretended clemency of Peel. (Loud cheers.) From this spot I told you, before entering the prison, that there should be no compromise or shrinking; and there has been none. (Renewed cheering.) The entire of us would perish in gaol rather than receive as a favour the slightest concession from the present Ministers." (Cheers.)

Mr. O'Connell talked then of the power of the Repealers, which, he said, was greater than that possessed by any monarch in Europe; and next indulged in a philippic against Mr. Smith, the Attorney-General for Ireland, and gave this interpretation of the reason for including his son John O'Connell in the indictment:—

"Oh, malignant virgatus-crucis on two legs (loud cheers and laughter), it was John O'Connell's opposition to you at Youghal—his defeat of you at Youghal—his opposition to you before the committee, and his overthrow of you there, that caused him to be placed in the indictment! (Hear, hear.) I saw that he had reasonable grounds for his animosity to me. I had impeached his father, and I succeeded in one stage of that impeachment, and I respect his filial piety (great laughter) that made him persecute me; but the very spirit that would animate such enmity should make him leave out my son."

Mr. O'Connell accused the Government of great folly for circulating the idea that Ireland was in a peturbed state, and said some of the speeches of the ministers emboldened France.

"Think you that they had no effect on the old diplomatist Louis Philippe? or that if they had not been used, and if the weakness of England with regard to Ireland were not known in France, that Thiers would not have remained untouched—that Mignet would not still be unimpaired—and that the points of Quixada would not be untainted with Moorish blood?" (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Edward Sugden then came in for an epithet.

"I want to know (said Mr. O'Connell), will Sugden, that cursed confounded little English dog (cheers and laughter)—will that curish, cantankerous little gentleman, I ask, venture to supersede Mr. Grey Porter? (Cheers.) I call him a cur, because he barked at us when he dared not bite. (Cheers.) He has not the courage to supersede Mr. Porter for writing his pamphlet. He would not venture to set towards a gentleman of that high station as he has done towards some poor county magistrates." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. O'Connell proceeded to allude to what was now necessary to be done to procure Repeal. There were three subjects on which he said some decision must be made:—

"The first relates to the meeting at Clontarf. (Cheers for some minutes.) That meeting was called legally. It was illegally suppressed. (Cheers.) We are bound to adhere to principles, and it is now to be considered whether that rule extends so far, or whether it has been sufficiently vindicated without calling the meeting. (Cheers.) For some time I did think that it was absolutely necessary to call it to vindicate a great principle, but on reflecting deeply on what has occurred in the House of Lords, and the vindication of its legality put on eternal record by Denman (cheers), Cottenham (cheers), and Campbell (cheers), I began to doubt that it was necessary. What I mean to do is, upon this day, to propose that it be referred to a select committee whether or not it is necessary to hold the Clontarf meeting. (Cheers.) I do not wish to prejudice the decision, but I must say, that my opinion is against the calling of that meeting. The next point I wish to lay before you is with reference to a plan which I frequently proposed last year. I mean the collection of the Preservative Society for Ireland, consisting of a body of 300 gentlemen sitting in Dublin,

(Great applause.) My plan, which I have deeply considered, is shortly this,—that 300 gentlemen from the various counties in Ireland should meet on a certain day in Dublin, (cheers,) and that their title to meet should be the handing in of £100 each—that they should have a treasure of their own, and have the working of their own funds. (Cheers.) I do not intend that they shall imitate any thing, but that they shall control everything, and that the Repeal Association shall be completely governed by them, and not venture upon any act without their previous sanction. (Cheers.) And now I come to my third plan, and it is one to which I am greatly attached. I want to procure impeachments of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, and of Her Majesty's Attorney General in this country; on these grounds (great applause for some moments.) The first ground is that of the monster indictment which was preferred against me—35 yards of an indictment. (Cheers and laughter.) Lord Denman has well described it as a document calculated to prevent a man from defending himself. Such an indictment no poor man could escape from. We were backed by the repeal rent (cheers), but if such an indictment were preferred against a poor man, where could he get a brief of it for his counsel? Why it would cost him ten times more money than ever he saw to do so. (Cheers.) Sugden planned it—Peel has adopted it, (groans and hisses.) Impeachment, I say, then, is our only remedy. (Loud cheers.) No man is safe from such a monster indictment. What ought the Court to have done with it? I say an honest court should have quashed it again and again, if necessary, and have said to the Attorney General in the words of Lord Denman, "Pick out your counts and do not subvert the bench beneath the number of your accusations." (Cheers.) The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench did not refuse to receive it; nay, more, they countenanced it; and, proceeding as they commenced, refused us copies of the witnesses' names, the caption of the indictment, and other privileges which we should have received as a matter of course in England. (Groans.) By their conduct they made this monster indictment a badge of their own lock, and I say there is no use whatever in the doctrine of impeachments if we have not the judges of the Queen's Bench brought before a proper tribunal to answer for their conduct. (Cheers.) Ah! I do not fear their prisons. (Tremendous cheering.) I am a freeborn British subject, standing in this place defending my rights, and I do accuse those men of injustice. (Renewed applause.) I am here to call upon the people of England to aid me in impeaching those men. (Cheers.)

Mr. O'Connell then bitterly condemned the conduct of the Irish Chief Justice:—

"I ask you," said he, "did it ever occur at any trial before this, that the Chief Justice borrowed the Attorney-General's brief to make out his case and charge from? (Cries of "No," and groans.) You saw him do so. (Loud cries of "We did," and groans.) Now, I do say, that this is a fact which must and shall be heard. (Cheers.) I care not—no!—for the authority of the Lord Chief Justice. (Loud cheers.)"

He then put forth the following statement, in support of impeachment, which made great sensation:—

"One of the articles of impeachment shall be this fact. Perin did well here. (Cheers.) But here, I have something for you. I know a man who was offered to have his fortune made, if he would give some particular information. (Sensations.) The information did not exist, and therefore he could not give it; but I shall be able to prove that the expression, 'Your fortune shall be made' was used on the occasion in question, and that by a witness of the first credit and respectability. (Cheers.) Again I say, that if that jury had been left to itself, it never could have returned such a verdict. I say it emphatically, that some one helped them in making up this verdict. (Cheers and groans.)"

Mr. O'Connell announced his determination to have atonement for his imprisonment:—

"I have been three months in gaol. (Cheers and laughter.) I want to know, do they think I am to submit patiently to this? I am not acting from any feeling of resentment or revenge. I spent an exceedingly pleasant three months (cheers,) pleasant to me, after the first fortnight, I was secure from those apprehensions of an outbreak which had disturbed my rest for five months previously (cheers,) during which time I never slept quietly. (Renewed cheers.) I do not complain of my imprisonment—pleasant comparisons to man ever had. We had, too, the blessing and the honour of the sweet companionship of our fellow captives—the talent and power of fearless entertainment. No set of men ever lived in more social harmony. Well, I am not vexed for this, but I am determined on atonement. (Cheers.) I defy Virgil South to wipe away his injustice. I defy England to do us justice here, or compensate for the harassing of our families, and our and their hours and days and weeks of suspense. Will they do nothing to remedy these things?"

In the concluding part of his address, Mr. O'Connell announced his intention to ascertain if the English people would back him in his attempt at impeachment:—

"From this spot I call on England to join me. I mean to propose that a select committee be formed, of which I shall cheerfully make one, to go through all the principal towns of England about two months before the meeting of Parliament, to obtain an answer to this appeal. We will say, 'Here is injustice done. A packed jury, an unjust judgment, sentence inflicted before its right is ascertained, and innocent men imprisoned. Englishmen, I will test you; I will see whether you will join me, one and all.' It is not, I will come back, and say to your Parliament, 'Look no more to the pretences of John Bull; look alone to your Parliament in College street.' (Cheers.) If they did not approve of this, I will go at any rate. I ask you, are the Ministers to escape? (Groans and yells.) Is Sir James Graham to escape? (Loud cries of "No, no," and groaning and hissing.) He who had the unparalleled impudence in the absence of two members of the house to call them convicted conspirators. (A roan, "He's a liar." Cheers.) Why you seem to be as usual as Sir James Graham himself. (Laughter.) I do not call him that, but I do term him a foul-mouthed, low-down, low-down, (shouts of applause and laughter.) I come to what I did in the house. He produced Sir R. Peel's declaration before his face. He had that paper before his eyes, and yet he had the power of face, the audacity, the intensity of falsehood to say, according to newspaper reports, that he had a fair trial. (Several voices—"He's a liar.") To be sure he is. (Great cheering and loud laughter.) There's a British Minister for you—the Premier of the first country and the world. (Groans and laughter.) With a packed jury, some-sided Chief Justice, the exclusion of juries and evidence of justice, he ventured to say we had a fair trial. Oh, a very fair trial, sweet Sir Robert! (Groans.) Ah, my good man, you were wrong to call him a liar. He thinks what we got was a very fair trial for an Irish Catholic. (Cheering and groans.) That foul falsehood, however, identified him with the whole of the proceedings here, and the Union is but a mockery indeed if the English people do not join us in hurling Peel from office, and driving him from power, as Ministerial leader in Parliament."

The night hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid applause nearly as protracted, and quite as enthusiastic, as that which greeted his opening address.

Our latest accounts from Dublin say, that the enthusiasm with which the news of Mr. O'Connell's release was received throughout the provinces is "beyond description." The following account may be taken as a specimen. The Cork Southern Reporter says:—"Soon after midnight thousands of people began to parade the principal streets, carrying lighted tar-barrels, and preceded, in one case, by over sixty women with lighted flambeaux, which they waved in the air, the effect of which was singularly picturesque. Several temperance bands accompanied them, playing national and popular airs, and as they passed each house or public edifice which was illuminated, they gave several hearty rounds of cheers."

"We have received accounts from several parts of the country, all of which acquiesce with the exultation of the people on the receipt of the intelligence which restores to liberty the liberator of millions of his countrymen. A respectable correspondent, writing this morning from Malton, says:—

"On last night, Fiddis, Knapton, Malton, and the entire of the country, as far as the eye could reach, was brilliantly illuminated. Joy beamed in every countenance for O'Connell's triumph. A meeting is to be held this day in Malton to appoint a number of persons to keep order and prevent the least annoyance during the illuminations this evening; extensive preparations are making for the occasion in that town."

"In London the populace carried lighted tar-barrels through the principal streets, and by the most enthusiastic popular demonstrations evinced their participation in the general feeling of joy and gladness. The bells all about Gove and for miles in that direction, towards Youghal and along the coast, were illuminated with bonfires, and the people thronged around them in joyous excitement."

There have also been illuminations in various places in Ireland. Many "emonstrations" have also taken place in the provincial towns of England. At Manchester, for instance, there were manifestations of rejoicing, such as illuminations, processions, &c., by the Irish part of the population, to commemorate the reversal of the judgment upon Mr. O'Connell and his fellow prisoners; and, with one or two trifling exceptions, these exhibitions have passed off peaceably.

The Friends of Repeal in Dublin have resolved that a grand public banquet shall be given on the 19th instant, to O'Connell and his late fellow captives, "in commemoration of their liberation from their recent unjust imprisonment." It is likely that the banquet will take place in the Rotunda, or in the King's-room, in the Mansion-house.

One of the first acts of Mr. O'Connell, on leaving the Richmond Penitentiary, was, to forward his own subscription of £25 to the Duncombe testimonial, the regulations of that prison having prevented him from doing so earlier.

The Repeal rent for the last week amounted to £275 17s. 6d.

BANQUET TO SIR R. SALE.—A splendid banquet was given in Londonderry to Sir R. Sale, yesterday week, at which W. Hackett, Esq., the Mayor of that city, presided. Sir R. Sale, rising to reply to his health, was received with warm and reiterated applause, and in a brief but mostly style returned thanks. He expressed himself deeply grateful to the ladies and gentlemen who had honoured him with so marked a compliment. To a soldier to be appreciated by his fellow-countrymen was his dearest reward; but to receive the cordial welcome of a company of true-born Irishmen was, if possible, more gratifying. "The health of Lady Sale" was proposed, when the company rose, and drank in with the warmest applause, the ladies in the gallery waving their handkerchiefs. The cheering continued some minutes. Captain Lawrence, who had been a prisoner of Akbar Khan, together with Lady Sale, briefly returned thanks for her ladyship, at the request of Sir R. Sale. The evening passed in the most agreeable manner.

ROBBERY AT SOUTHAMPTON.—A few nights ago some valuable property was stolen from the premises of Mr. Barter, jeweller, High-street, Southampton. The thieves carried off with them eight valuable jewelled gold watches, 35 silver lever watches, and about 60 other silver watches. Also, 35 gold wedding rings, 20 fancy gold rings, 20 diamond rings, a number of diamond pins, and other articles of jewellery.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Solinas," Dublin.—Marchal Mardonnid, Duke of Tarentum, was of Scotch descent, and was born in 1765. He entered the army as a Lieutenant in the Irish regiment of Dillon; he embraced the principles of the French Revolution, but without imputing himself by violence of conduct; and, at the battle of Jemappes, he may be said to have laid the foundation of his fame. Napoleon made him a Marshal in the field of Wagram, and soon after created him Duke of Tarentum. Our correspondent may readily find a memoir of this distinguished man in the volume entitled "The Court and Camp of Bonaparte."

"A Constant Reader,"—The term "entire," applied to beer, is intended to denote that it is unwatered. It has been in use nearly a century and a quarter; for, about 1721, Harwood, a London brewer, first applied it to a malt liquor intended to unite the flavours of ale and beer, or ale, beer, and twopenny, he called his liquor "entire," or "entire stuff," a name intended to intimate that it was drawn from one cask or butt only.

"S,"—Scop's Fables in rhyme would be strangely misplaced in a newspaper.

"A. C. R.," Dublin.—We infer from the specimen sent, that the translation of the old Irish MS. will not suit our journal.

"A Subscriber," Louth.—Messrs. Robinson, Parsons, and Co. (Old Bank), Oxford, draw upon Messrs. Condit and Co., as do several other Provincial Bankers, for the aid of whom we have not space; but our correspondent will find them in the "Post-office London Directory." We believe the oldest private banking establishment in London to be that of Messrs. Child and Co., Temple-lane. (See "Giltart on Banking.")

"A Constant Reader," Capet.—Mrs. Parker's "Prize Distribution" is one of the "Picture Galleries" lately introduced by Government, and allowed to be decided within a stated time, by an Act of Parliament passed during the Session just ended.

"And,"—The lines commencing "The lovely young Lavinia," are from "Thomson's Seasons—Summer."

"An Old Subscriber,"—Water, generally.

"Peter-familiar,"—We have more than once called attention to the subject suggested by our correspondent.

"The Proprietor of Gold's Hotel, Ballinacree, will be entitled to the Large Print, on the terms named.

"A Young Attorney's Clerk,"—The owner of the soil may prosecute for stealing apples.

"A Subscriber from June 9,"—The Large Print will be obtainable, by order, of any news-agent.

"H. R.," Worcester.—The Large Engraving is nearly completed.

"W. I. M.," Harwich.—Declined for want of room.

"P. O. C.," Darlington.—Letters received in London by the railway train about 5 o'clock, a.m., are delivered at 9 o'clock; and those which arrive at half-past 1, are delivered between 4 and 5 o'clock.

"J. K.," Manchester.—"Obey,"—We have not room.

"Letter,"—The New Three-and-a-half per Cent. Dividends will be paid on the 15th of October and the 15th of April.

"D. S.," Perthshire.—The crowded state of our columns alone prevents our inserting the recent decision of Perth, in respect of "the Right of Sepulture in Parishial Burial Grounds."

"M. F.," Birmingham.—It is difficult to procure a berth on board one of her Majesty's ships, unless the applicant has been bred to the sea.

"L. U.,"—The fees can be legally demanded.

"A Constant Reader,"—At the completion of the Banks' returns, we may, possibly, insert them.

"A Constant Reader," Liverpool.—The letter on the Civilization of Central Africa reached us too late.

"A Subscriber," Portsmouth.—Parliament was prorogued on the 4th of September.

"J. H.," Exeter, should address a letter of inquiry to the Admiralty.

"An Antiquary," Parliament.—We must decline.

"A Constant Reader," London, should read some of the recent charges of the Bishop of London.

"F. R.,"—We have not room.

"H. M. H.,"—Mr. R. L. Jones is an active member of the Royal Exchange Committee.

"Renar," Cambridge.—Maps of railways are now so easily obtained, that to engrave them in our journal would be a sacrifice of space.

"J. S.," Gloucestershire.—Perhaps.

"Irish Genius,"—We have not room for an engraving of the cap.

"The Secretary of the Temperance Society, Louth, will only find the information he seeks in the Parliamentary Census Returns.

"S. H.," Bath.—We have not room at present.

"A Subscriber," X. N. X., should write to Mr. E. Palmer, Newcastle-street.

"Young King," County Kidare.—We shall resume the tales in a future number.

"Phaeton," is recommended not to purchase one of the new velocipedes.

"Cerastium," may best ascertain the information he seeks, by applying to the clergyman of his parish.

"Hibernian,"—We cannot insert the congratulatory address.

"T. S.," Newcastle.—We cannot help the colonel's want of courtesy.

"Zoroaster,"—The Large Print may be had, price 1s.

"A. H. P.," Lambeth.—We do not know the name of the architect of the new Catholic church at Newcastle.

"H. W.," Plymouth, will find an engraving of Armstrong's Hydro-electric Machine in the Magazine of Science, Vol. V.

"Bela," Bradford.—The expense of the advertisement will be 7s.

"H. R.," Wakefield.—We do not know where the picture of Adam and Eve is exhibiting. To dispose of it by lottery would be illegal.

"Adrian S.," offers in the wing and navy take precedence of Messieurs. "Vesper" will find a Popular History of Secret Societies in the Library of Entertaining Knowledge.

"An Old Subscriber,"—The monument to the Princess Charlotte, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, has been too often engraved to be repeated in our journal.

"Junius," Leadenhall-street.—The first railway constructed for locomotive engines in England was between Stockton and Darlington, in 1825.

"An Ingenious (but we take leave to add a modest) Star Gazer" is informed that the planet which has so much puzzled his "circle" is Jupiter, in the constellation Pegasus.

"A Constant Subscriber," Guildford.—The comet is visible with a telescope, in a westerly direction; and a good time for an amateur inspection is from 9 to 11 P.M. It is leaving the earth and approaching the sun, and appears now to be nothing more than a faint nebula.

"The Queen's Second Visit to Scotland,"—Next week we shall resume our illustrations of her Majesty's Second Visit.

"A," We have to explain to our readers the non-insertion of the announced illustrations of the meeting of the British Antiquological Association, at Canterbury. Mr. Fairbairn, F.S.A., having offered to furnish the requisite sketches, was engaged to do so, but at this moment we have received neither sketches nor communication from him. In the meantime we have listened, from our report at Canterbury, that Archbishop Burnes has stated Mr. Fairbairn to have given an unqualified contradiction to the public announcement we had been induced to issue in consequence of the arrangement we had made with Mr. Fairbairn. We, however, leave him to explain his conduct. It happens that we have an abundance of subjects of more immediate and general interest, but we extend the above explanation due to our Scottish readers.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1844.

Tux Tahitian and Morocco agitations are dying out. Diplomats are the very men, of all others, to linger out a dispute till it dies a natural death of sheer exhaustion; a course of protocols and diplomatic notes, exchanged according to all the forms of the etiquette in such cases established, would give time for the warmest excitement to evaporate. And it is, on the whole, fortunate it is so. It gives both sides time to reflect, and reflection sees many circumstances in another light; and more particularly it sees that war is a tremendous evil—a game that must be a losing one to both the parties to it. The French journals still keep up a splutter of words, and there is much editorial fury poured upon the head of Guizot, for the terms on which the has been accommodated. But with forty-eight editors in prison, and all grumbling or abuse pretty well prohibited, except that of England and the English, we can excuse our French brethren of the press if their exasperation finds vent through the only channel open to it. Besides, it keeps up the war fever, under the influence of which the Chambers vote, and people pay, for new regiments for Africa, and for ships for Tangier expeditions and Mogadore bombardments, from whence can be gathered martial renown and consequent popularity to the Princes of the Orleans dynasty. There can be little doubt that all this anger of the journals against England is permitted by Louis Philippe, just as the Conservative party here permitted unmeasured abuse of the New Poor-law as long as it suited their purpose; it was dropped the moment the party acquired the power to destroy the system they had so denounced. The policy that forgets the obligations of principle was the mainspring of the movement in both cases. And as statesmen perfectly understand each other, we have no doubt Earl Aberdeen estimates the Parisian Philipics at about their real worth; he will not be frightened with false fire, or be driven into a war by hard words, which are meant less to provoke England, than to accumulate "political capital," out of a very sensitive, but on the subject of war in general, and of war with England in particular, a not very reflecting people.

The news from the Mediterranean has not stated any fresh act of hostility on the part of the French fleet. De Joinville has of late been busier with the pen than the sword; he has written a second despatch, containing a more detailed account of the taking of Mogadore. The first was a well-written document, and the present is drawn up in a clear and business-like manner. If the Prince is actuated by that hatred of England which has been ascribed to him, he certainly keeps the feeling under while writing these despatches, in which he has plenty of opportunities of expressing it, directly or indirectly. He has either remarkable prudence or great self-denial when he takes up the pen. It is stated by the Paris journals that orders have been given to the French naval force not to occupy Tangier or any other places on the coast; but we cannot reconcile the statement with the preparations made for the continued possession of Mogadore.

The more pacific state of the relations between the two countries has caused Louis Philippe to resume his purpose of visiting our gracious Queen at Windsor; an intention stated to have been abandoned. Preparations for the event have already been commenced.

MANCHESTER and Birmingham are busy towns, very hives of industry; their establishments are triumphs of manufacturing and mechanical skill. But though fully engaged in business, they are not wholly absorbed in it; they are doing something for health and amusement, as well as for occupation. In Birmingham we had to notice last week the proceedings of the dinner of the Athenic Institution, at which Lord J. Manners presided. The present week has produced a display of public spirit at Manchester still more gratifying, inasmuch as the object contemplated is more general and comprehensive. A public meeting was held on Wednesday evening, principally composed of the working classes engaged in manufacturing occupations, though several gentlemen who take a lively interest in the welfare of the operatives were also present. The object for which they had met was to assist the efforts making to establish public walks and playgrounds, where they can be made convenient to the access of those engaged in occupations that make the cool air and the green turf something more than pleasures—things absolutely necessary to the preservation of the health, without which the hardworking independent workman becomes the abject, dependent pauper. These great towns have grown up out of mere hamlets; and as their population has increased, no provision has been made for promenades or open spaces at convenient distances; the "village green" was built over or closed in, but no other place was provided instead of it; and hence by little and little our towns have grown up into unsightly masses of brick and mortar, piercing the sky with those "tall chimnies," which, however much they may speak of wealth-creating power, are by no means so conducive to salubrity. There has been also too much encroachment in another direction; the spirit of exclusiveness among the owners of land, and too keen a desire to maintain the integrity of game preserves, have led to the blocking up of old paths and the inclosure of commons, both producing the common result of driving the poor man from the field and park to the dust and traffic of the "King's Highway." Thus shut out in the country, and hemmed in in the town, there was nothing for the operative to do but to sink under the toil of his condition, and the want of all the opportunities of relaxation and exercise he ought to command, or to make some exertions to regain a little of what past generations have lost. And most happy are we to see that these exertions are being made, and with good prospect of success; noblemen and gentlemen having come forward with subscriptions of large amounts, and among them, we congratulate the operatives of Manchester on the readiness and good feeling with which Sir R. Peel has entered into their plans, and the liberality with which he has assisted them. His subscription of £1000 is a munificent gift, and intimates by its amount the Premier's appreciation of the importance of the object. Considering the immense amount of public wealth created at such towns as Manchester and Birmingham, we think a Parliamentary grant might be well bestowed in aid of local efforts. We do not see why London should monopolize all of the limited amount the Government applies to public improvements that partake of the ornamental. But local enterprise is the surest support, and it is on this the inhabitants must mainly depend. London is so well provided in this way already, however, that we think it might spare something to the assistance of the workmen of Manchester; and we feel great pleasure in placing at the disposal of their committee a donation of TEN GUINEAS from the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

THE increase of commercial intercourse between nations is continually giving rise to new questions in what may be called the code of social morality. The cheapness and rapidity of our steam communication with America, has brought us in contact with an evil that pervades the whole of the States; we allude to the distinction between the black and white races, so strictly kept, that no amount of wealth, virtue, and education, can in America raise the coloured man to a level with the white, while scarcely any amount of crime, worthlessness, and profligacy, can sink the white man to the social degradation of the black. Even the Abolitionists, who would give the negro race liberty (a cheap generosity be it said in passing, as it would be at no expense to themselves), are said to feel the same prejudice. Throughout the States, but in the South especially, to walk the same street as the whites is the extent of what the black race may do in company with the superior caste. In all other places, churches, chapels, theatres, taverns, the two classes are carefully separated. In England we know nothing of all this; the black man, if he has property and education, is the perfect equal of the white man of the same status. A box at the Opera, or a dinner at the Clarendon, are equally at his disposal—if he can pay for them. We decide everything on the common sense commercial principle. It is not so in America, and a sable Cressus might die of starvation, if he insisted on eating his dinner in the public room of an hotel, and nowhere else. And the Americans are trying to inoculate us with the same prejudices.

In July last, on board one of the vessels of the British and North American Mail Steam-packet Company, a gentleman of colour was excluded from the use of the saloon during the voyage, having paid full fare.

The same thing has been done before, on board the American liners; but, as they are conducted on the national system, we have no right to blame the captains and owners, for following the general practice, indefensible as it seems. But, in the present case, the steamer is a British one, and we think the concession made to the prejudices of "Southern gentlemen," a very unwise one; it is, moreover, directly contrary to the spirit of our laws. It has been introduced, too, we understand, on board the packets of the Cunard line. The annoyance that a few coloured gentlemen may experience on board, will cease the moment they land, for the "Southern gentlemen" will not make much impression on the inhabitants of these three kingdoms. But we are sorry it should have been begun anywhere, under the sanction of Englishmen. We hold that any man whose personal deportment is unoffending, and who can pay for what he wishes, has a perfect right to any accommodation his means can command, without any other restrictions than those which the usages of society impose upon all.

POSTSCRIPT.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AT DUNDEE.

We are glad to announce that the Royal Squadron was signalled for Broughty Ferry, at half-past three o'clock, a.m., on Wednesday. The authorities of Dundee, warned by the fate of the Edinburgh magistracy, had made every preparation in case of such an event. As soon as the arrival was known, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired from Broughty Ferry, but the salute was not thrown up.

The Queen, however, did not disembark till the morning was more advanced. At half-past eight, her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Princess Royal (in her nurse's arms), and her suite, left the Royal yacht, and entered the state barge, which was steered by Lord Adolphus FitzClarence.

At a quarter to nine o'clock, she landed at the quay, where she was received by the authorities. No salute was fired, but this had been determined on for sufficient reasons.

The Royal party included the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Jersey, and their suites. The Black Eagle, the St. Albans, and the Volcano steamers accompanied the Royal yacht.

When her Majesty stepped ashore the yards were manned, and the scene was animated by the cheering of the tars. Nor were the spectators a hindrance. They cheered most loyally. In a few minutes her Majesty had reached her carriage, and the Royal party drove off through the town, amidst the sincere cheers of the people. Some were heard to grumble that the carriage was a close one, and that the Queen could not be seen; and, what was to them perhaps as mortifying, that she could not see all the gay preparations made for her.

The Royal carriage was accompanied by a town procession, and by the authorities, and proceeded with the Queen to Dalhousie church, where they took leave of her Majesty, who proceeded at a rapid rate on to Blair Atholl, which place she would reach in less than four hours from the time she left Dundee, or about two o'clock.

A guard of honour of the 66th Regiment was in readiness to receive her Majesty on landing, and parties of the Scots Greys were stationed at intervals of six miles on the road to Blair Atholl, which is fifty miles from Dundee, in order to escort her Majesty as she passed along. A guard of 200 Highlanders, who have been under drill for some time by Lord Glenlyon, will attend her Majesty at Blair Atholl. Great preparations are already made at the castle for her Majesty's accommodation.

A third edition of the Scotsman gives the following account of the debarkation of the royal party. Among the noblemen and gentlemen present on the quay were—The Earl of Argyll, the Earl of Morton, Lord Ogilvie, Lord Duncan, Sir Neil Douglas (Commander of the Forces in Scotland), Sir James Ramsay of Banch, Colonel Dalgleish, Mr. Lindsay Carnegie, Mr. Wedderburn of Paisley, Mr. Claydon of Invergowrie, Sheriff L'Amey, Sheriff Subintendant Henderson, Mr. Wedderburn of Beith, Mr. Proctor of Glamis, Mr. Ogilvie of Ruthven, Mr. Guthrie younger of Guthrie, Mr. Balfour Ogilvie of Tansidale, Mr. John Graham, also the town clergy, and deputations with addresses from the neighbouring towns of St. Andrews, Arbroath, Brechin, and Montrose.

At twenty minutes past eight, the Royal standard on the yacht was lowered, and a gun fired, indicating that her Majesty was about to leave the vessel. At half-past eight, the Royal barge was seen approaching, and in a few minutes more it touched the landing-place, where Lord Charles Wellesley and Colonel Bowater attended to assist. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert stepped out upon the covered barge, and assisted her Majesty to do so. The Princess Royal was lifted out of the barge by her attendants, and the party began to ascend the covered steps to the quay, her Majesty leaning on the right arm of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who held in his left hand the Princess Royal. Her Majesty was very neatly and plainly dressed in mourning, a black dress and scarf trimmed with French ermine or gauze, with a plain neat black bonnet, with ermine flowers. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert had on a dark-coloured coat, with light trousers, and a white hat, round which was a simple band of ermine. The Princess Royal was dressed similarly to the Queen, but with a white straw bonnet, trimmed with plain black silk ribbons.

While her Majesty, the Prince and Princess, were ascending the steps, the feeling of royalty seemed almost lost in the touching domestic-like appearance the party presented. Her Majesty was received by the Provost, Mr. Duncan, the member for Dundee, and authorities, on the quay, to whom she graciously bowed and smiled, and also to the crowds around, from whom tremendous acclamations resounded on all sides, mingled with the ringing of the saluting guns and the ringing of the town bells.

The Royal party was followed by the Earls of Aberdeen and Liverpool; and to the former of these noble lords the addresses to her Majesty, and the address and burgess tickets for Prince Albert, were given in charge by the magistrates. They were followed by the rest of the royal suite. At the end of the covered way, her Majesty and Prince Albert entered the first carriage; the Princess Royal, with the Ladies in Waiting, in the second; Lord Aberdeen and Liverpool, and the suite following in two other carriages. They then passed on under the Triumphal Arch, escorted by the Scots Greys, and the procession followed in the pre-arranged order, and by the same route.

Along the whole line, great crowds of people were to be seen; and the windows, balconies, and scaffolds were all very closely filled. The rush upon the street was very considerable, but, on the whole, excellent order was preserved. Her Majesty looked exceedingly well, and was very calm and composed. The Prince is much improved in appearance, being stouter and more manly-looking than when last in Scotland.

ARRIVAL AT BLAIR ATHOLL.

A late account announces the arrival of the Royal Party at Blair Atholl at three o'clock on Wednesday. Her Majesty was received at the Castle by a body of Lord Glenlyon's clansmen, attired in the Highland dress. Her Majesty appeared somewhat pale, but this may be attributed to the effects arising from the fatigue of a long journey. The Prince looked remarkably well, and appeared to have been but slightly inconvenienced by the sea voyage. The travelling chariot, with its Royal Occupants, was followed by four other vehicles containing the Princess Royal, Lord Liverpool, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Charles Wellesley, and the remaining members of her Majesty's suite, including Lord Glenlyon, who had arrived in with the Royal carriage shortly after it left Dundee.

On arriving at the principal entrance of the mansion, her Majesty was received by Lady Glenlyon, who was accompanied by the Young Master of Glenlyon and Mrs. Home Drummond, her ladyship's mother. Four companies of forty each, consisting of his lordship's clansmen, attired in the Highland dress, were drawn up by the side of the terrace, the pipers, in full Highland costume, greeting her Majesty with the pibroch. The clansmen were commanded by Lord Glenlyon, assisted by the Major of the corps, the Hon. James Murray. The first company was commanded by Captain Drummond, with his Lieutenant, the Hon. W. Drummond; the second, by Captain Charles Drummond, with his Lieutenant, Sir David Dundas; the third, by Oswald of Dundas, with his Lieutenant, Sir David Dundas; the fourth, by Stewart of Urquhart, with his Lieutenant, Sir David Dundas, the owner of the magnificent mansion which is situated in one of the most picturesque spots in Scotland, just before entering the pass of Killiecrankie. Her Majesty appeared much pleased with the manifestations of loyalty with which she was greeted; and after addressing a few remarks to Lady Glenlyon, entered the mansion, accompanied by Prince Albert.

Within a few minutes, however, after the arrival of the Royal party, the Prince came out into the front of the mansion, accompanied by his noble host, with Lord Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, and Lord Charles Wellesley. His Royal Highness inspected the Highlanders, keeping his hat off, as he walked through the ranks, a mark of courtesy which will not be unappreciated by those fine fellows, and which evidently afforded them no small gratification.

The clansmen then marched round before the Prince, headed by the pipers playing the pibroch; and then her Majesty appeared at the window, and seemed much delighted at the picturesque appearance of her Highland subjects.

Lord and Lady Glenlyon have been invited to join the royal dinner party, which will be strictly private.

health and strength. On Thursday morning Miss Peel was considered better, after having passed a favourable night; and at length all danger could not be said to have subsided, yet her medical attendants were not satisfied that their patient was progressing towards recovery as favourably as could be expected. The following is an extract from a letter written by the Premier on Thursday evening, and received on Friday at the right hon. baronet's town residence. "We trust the report is still more favourable to-day (Yesterday). We are less uneasy, but there is still fever."

The Duke of Grafton, we regret to learn, has been of late indisposed.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—Letters have been received in town from Germany, which we are happy to announce, state that the Attorney General (Sir W. Follett) is considered to be better, and that his health is daily improving.

MR. FREDERICK SANDERSON, eldest son of Sir Edward Sanderston, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, died on Thursday at Thames Ditton. He had been ill for some time.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Thursday Viscountess Grimston, M.P. for Hertfordshire, was married to Miss Elizabeth Joanna Weyland, daughter of Major Weyland. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester came to town from New Palace expressly to be at the nuptials.

REMOVED RESIDENCE OF THE IRISH JUDGES.—The Lord Chief Justice Eyre and the Irish Attorney-General are said to be in London, waiting Sir Robert Peel's return from Devon. The position in which the Chief of the Irish Bench and the Chief of the Irish Bar are placed by the recent decision of the House of Lords, has led to the conclusion, that the object of three functionaries is to place the resignation of their respective offices in the Premier's hands.

STATE OF IRELAND.—Our accounts from Ireland of Wednesday, represent affairs to be stagnant for the present, and there was to be no meeting of a political nature until Saturday next (to-day), when a motion respecting the imprisonment of the Repealers will be submitted to the consideration of the corporation of the city of Dublin.

OPENING LETTERS AT THE POST-OFFICE.—The letter carriers, Tapson, Saunders, Long, Bell, Walker, Shinner, and Crookall (who have been in the habit of opening the letters of sporting gentlemen), have been dismissed by the Postmaster-General.

MR. THOMAS MATTHEW, of Castleknock, County Cork, brother of the "Apostle of Temperance," died suddenly on Monday. He was attacked with palsy while superintending some drainage work on Saturday. His brother was with him in his dying moments.

CRICKET.—On Thursday a grand match, which occupied the whole of the week, was concluded at Nottingham. It excited much interest in consequence of six gentlemen of the county, with five players selected from all England, having challenged the best eleven players in the county. The players selected from England were Pich, Hillier, Dean, Bos, and A. Myer, Esq. The gentlemen went in first, and scored 179 and 55, making 235 in the whole, of which Hillier scored 1 and 61; Dean, 35 and 7; A. Myer, Esq., 10 and 10; Bos, 31 and 0; Pich, 20 and 10; F. Noyes, Esq., 28 and 5; G. Galloway, Esq., 4 and 0; Williams, Esq., 11 and 6; Smith, Esq., 8 and 0; H. Mather, Esq., 2 and 0; and W. Mather, Esq., 1 and 0. On the players' side, 125 and 95 were got, making 220, of which, Guy got 7 and 6; Hart, 24 and 3; Clark, 25 and 5; Buttery, 3 and 11; S. Parr, 3 and 4; S. Parr, 6 and 0; G. Parr, 29 and 5; Chapman, 16 and 2; S. Hoyle, 9 and 27; Jarvis, 2 and 2. The gentlemen thus won this handsomely contested match by only 12 runs. The umpires were Barker, of Lord's Ground, and Dukes, of Leicester.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—Yesterday, Emily Jackson, a servant girl in the employ of Mr. Farnbrother, printer, 31, Newmarket, was brought before Mr. Justice, at Bow-street Police-Office, charged with having stolen £100 10s. in gold, the property of Captain Conyngham. She did not appear more than seventeen years of age, and cried bitterly. It appears that Captain Conyngham rents the top floor of the house occupied by Mr. Farnbrother, and yesterday morning, at a quarter to nine, the wife of Mr. Conyngham entered a purse containing £100 in gold from her drawers in the chamber. She directly gave it to the Police Office in Bow-street, and in the afternoon Sergeant Poole, of the F division, proceeded to the house, and asked her some questions among the other domestics. She repeatedly declared she had not touched the money, and left the room crying. While the officer was talking with her maid, Mr. Farnbrother, who returned with a small bag hanging to her finger, and gave it to Poole, saying she had found it. It was found to contain £100 10s. in gold, being 10s. more than Mrs. Conyngham had said. The prisoner said she knew nothing more of it, than that she had found the money in the water-closet while cleaning it out.—Mr. Justice remanded her.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Wednesday afternoon a private of the Royal Marines, of the guard in the dockyard at Woolwich, named John Powell, fell down suddenly in the yard, and in a few minutes expired. The body was removed to the Marine Hospital. The deceased was an old soldier, and had seen some service.

DISCOVERY OF A MURDERED CHILD IN SPRING GARDENS.—At a late hour on Thursday night, police-constable Terry, of the A division, discovered a large brown paper parcel on the step of one of the houses in Spring Gardens. Upon opening the parcel, about ten or twelve wrappings of fine linen were removed, and the dead body of a male infant was discovered in an advanced state of decomposition. The child was dressed in a beautifully worked long robe, and a rich lace cap, and had evidently belonged to some person moving in a respectable sphere of life. The infant presented all the appearances of having been murdered, and the body was conveyed to St. Martin's workhouse.

FOREIGN.

HANOVER, Sept. 6.—We have received to-day the melancholy intelligence that his Excellency the Minister Baron von Schell had died at his seat, Scherzenburg.

RUSSIA.—A letter from Alexandria states that a treaty, the terms of which may be traced to 1803, is about to be concluded, by which England will obtain possession of the port of Suva, the right of free passage from Alexandria to that port, and other concessions of importance in Egypt and Syria. It is added, that France is no party to this treaty. The Viceroy was in good health, and was about to make a tour in Upper Egypt during the Ramadan, with the view of inspecting every government.

ARRIVAL FROM THE UNITED STATES.—The packet-ship New York, Captain Cropper, bringing New York papers to the 12th ult., has arrived at Liverpool. The papers are two days later than those by the last arrival, but they do not contain any news.

GREENWICH RAILWAY COMPANY.—At a meeting of this company, held on Tuesday, the shareholders decided upon agreeing to the terms proposed by the directors for leasing the line to the South-Eastern and Dover Company, with only three dissentient voices. Even this small minority did not dissent from the principle, but thought they might obtain more advantageous terms.

CHRISTENING OF THE INFANT PRINCE.

In the last edition of our journal of last week, we described the Christening of the Infant Prince, which took place in the private chapel in Windsor Castle, on Friday evening. We now repeat the details of the ceremony, illustrated with a large engraving of the impressive scene, from a sketch made by special permission.

At half past six o'clock in the evening, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by her Majesty the Queen Dowager, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Royal Highness Prince William of Prussia, and as many others of the royal and illustrious guests as the chapel could conveniently accommodate, entered the sacred edifice, which was brilliantly lighted up for the occasion, and had a most imposing and magnificent effect. Her Majesty was dressed in a robe of pure white, and looked remarkably well. During the time the company were taking their seats, Mr. Elvey played a voluntary; and, previously to the commencement of the sacred ceremony, the Hymn of Praise, "O God be joyful all ye lands," was sung by the full choir.

During the performance of the solemn rite the "Amen" were chanted, accompanied by the organ; and at its conclusion, and before the blessing, the "Hallelujah Chorus" was given by the full choir.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Bishops of Oxford and Norwich, stood in front of the font, which was placed upon a purple velvet cushion, fringed with gold.

The baptismal service was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury; when he came to that part of the service for naming the Prince, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as proxy for his son, Prince George, named his Royal Highness

ALFRED ERNEST ALBERT.

The other sponsors were his Grace the Duke of Wellington, proxy for the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

Upon the conclusion of the baptismal service, his Royal Highness the Prince Alfred was conveyed from the chapel, and the Queen, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, and the other royal and illustrious visitors retired. The royal infant was dressed in a robe and cap of Brighton point lace over rich white satin. At eight o'clock the grand banquet took place in St. George's Hall; covers being laid for twenty-five.

The company retired at half-past ten o'clock. During the evening, the magnificent castle, seen from without, had a truly festive appearance, with a flood of light in nearly every apartment.

We take this opportunity of describing the beautiful chapel to our readers.—The private chapel of her Majesty in Windsor Castle presents a happy adaptation of an apartment originally devoted to secular purposes—to one suited in all respects to the requirements of a "solemn temple."

The music room of George the Fourth has become the chapel of Victoria. In making the change, while ecclesiastical propriety has been preserved, good taste and architectural symmetry have suffered no violence. Mr. Blom's translation of Sir Jeffrey Wyatville's structure is in the highest degree artistic, and at the same time combines all that could be required on the score of utility or convenience.

This beautiful apartment is situated at the north-east angle of the upper ward, and is recommended by its relatively central position to all the domestic and social residences of the Castle, as well as by its perfect seclusion from the bus of the lower ward, and the public and gay entrances. It is approached from the west by the great state rooms, and on the south by the grand corridor and the private drawing and sitting-rooms. A staircase communicates with a basement story furnished the servants of the retail chamber with access to the house of prayer.

On entering the chapel for the first time, visitors are usually disappointed in the smallness of its dimensions, the average diameter being 35 feet, and the height about 45 feet; but this feeling is speedily relieved by the gorgeous decorations of the walls and ceiling, which have the effect of leading the eye fairly out of the picture. This mode of giving span to a confined apartment was an art much studied by the early architects, and their principles have been most successfully followed. By "works of rich entablature and curious moulds," an apparent extent and importance has been given to the chamber, which its own narrow limits could not otherwise have commanded.

The style of architecture used is the best period of perpendicular Gothic, modified, according to the practice of the celebrated William of Wykeham, the original architect of the castle. Many of the details are copied from his noble college at Oxford. The plan is a polygon, square on one side (the altar end), and angular on the other. The walls, for one-third of their height, are elaborately dressed with a panelling of oak. The pews, the pulpit, the altar-screen and chairs, are of the same materials. The seats, desks, and altar, are gorgeously appointed with embossed or carved relief, which contrast very beautifully with the rich blue of the splendidly bound prayer-books. Five windows at the square end of the chapel, admit the light; but three of them being stained, and the other two being filled with ground glass, it is so moderated in its strength as to become "dim and religious" in its quality.

Her Majesty's closet is a chastely-decorated apartment, built within a square-headed recess, on the angular side of the chapel, and raised about 12 feet above the level of the floor.

The architectural effect of this chamber is extremely beautiful. It is approached from the grand corridor by a private staircase. On entering it, a complete view of the chapel and of the ministers is gained, without encountering the gaze of any of its worshippers, an arrangement which tends greatly to her Majesty's comfort and religious privacy. The ceiling is nobly groined, and at the back is a fine internal window, filled with stained glass, having the arms of George IV., Victoria, Albert, Victoria and Albert, the badges of St. George in "roses white and red," and other national emblems. The ground work of this window is a yellow diaper, which fills the chamber with a most gorgeous illumination.

On sacramental occasions, her Majesty, leaving the closet, passes through a beautiful gallery, which runs round the exterior of the chapel, and conducts to an entrance on the right side of the altar, and opposite to the ordinary entrance. This arrangement, which is understood to have been made by Prince Albert, still further secludes her Majesty from interruption in the discharge of her most solemn religious duties. The gallery is panelled with a double tier of historic portraits of inestimable value and importance. The more remarkable are, Martin Luther, bearing date 1540, an exquisite production; Linsere, 1527, founder of the College of Physicians; Edward III., Richard II., Henry IV., Edward IV., rare sketches of unquestionable antiquity; Richard III., the famous portrait with "the rag," Henry VIII., the finest of the many Holbeins of the same shrewd monarch; Isabella of Castile, and Ferdinand of Arragon; Philip, the late father of Isabella, consort of Edward II.; Louis XI., Louis XII., and Charles VIII. of France; a marvellously fine head of a Duchess of Burgundy; and another, of touching interest, of the venerable mother of Mary Queen of Scots.

On the night when Prince Alfred was christened, the chapel was seen to its greatest advantage. The massive gold communion service of Queen Anne, along with the chalice service of her present Majesty, were grouped together on the altar table, and had a most splendid effect. In front, on a dais, stood the elegant font made for the baptism of the Prince of Wales, attracting the attention of all present, as much for its intrinsic beauty as from its importance in the sacred ceremony of the day. It consists of a basin of burnished gold, in the form of a lotus, having on its edge a rich border of water lilies. Beneath, surrounding a pillar of support, are three cherubic figures, and various heraldic decorations of the Royal Houses of Brunswick and Saxe-Coburg, her Majesty's and Prince Albert's shields between the Royal Supporters, &c. &c., the whole terminating in a splendid tripod stand.

During the progress of the christening ceremony, not the least important of the many arrangements made for assisting the devotional effect, was the performance of the concealed organ from the recess behind the altar.

SECOND VISIT THE QUEEN'S TO SCOTLAND.

Amid the heath on Scotia's hills,
Listening to the music of the rills
That sing for ever there,
Careless of peasant's ear or Queen's,—
Lady! from heartless scenes
Of court afar remov'd art thou,
Free from the glare
That would in time burn up thy youthful brow;
When first the dew-drop glistens on the thorn,
Each morn
A young Aurora thou wilt be Peeping the heath
And giving life and breath
To many a lowly daisy and shrub and tree!
There's something beautiful and grand
In Sovereign mind that can command
Itself to quit the glittering ball
—And wander by the moonlit waterfall,
In lonely vale—
And like great Disraeli in his garden's pale
Shut up itself from public strife
And feel the luxury of a quiet life!

In entering upon our record of the Queen's Second Visit to Scotland, we should announce that the illustrative department has been confided to Mr. Landells, whose exertions on the occasion of her Majesty's previous Visit were so signally successful, in enabling us to present to our readers a panorama of the Royal excursion. On the present occasion, our indefatigable artist will sketch the most interesting scenes visited by her Majesty, which will appear in our Journal with as much rapidity as is consistent with their perfect execution. Our illustrations this week relate chiefly to the Embarkation, and the progress of the Royal Yacht.

Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Princess Royal, embarked at Woolwich Dockyard on Monday morning, on board the Victoria and Albert Royal yacht for Scotland.

The weather, during the early part of the morning, was very wet and unfavourable, but it did not repress the loyalty of her Majesty's faithful subjects, great numbers of whom were in attendance to welcome their beloved Sovereign.

Sir James Clark, her Majesty's physician, arrived about a quarter-past seven, and proceeded to the Royal Victoria and Albert. Sir James accompanies her Majesty on her excursion.

About eight o'clock, the Earl of Delaware, the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Earl of Jersey, the Master of the Horse, and the Earl of Aberdeen, arrived at the Dockyard.

The Earl of Haddington, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Rear Admiral Bowles, C.B., arrived at the establishment about his time, when the Admiralty flag was immediately hoisted on the flag-staff in the Dockyard. The Lords of the Admiralty, with Sir F. Collier, immediately proceeded to inspect the preparations which had been made for the reception and embarkation.

Precisely as the dockyard clock struck nine, a royal salute from a battery of 12-pounders, under the command of Captain Robe, announced that her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert were approaching, and before it was finished her Majesty's carriage and four horses, preceded by two outriders in scarlet liveries, entered the dockyard, the guard of honour of the Royal Marines presenting arms, and the band playing "God save the Queen."

The Royal Highness Prince Albert first handed down the Princess Royal, who accompanied her Royal parents; his Royal Highness then alighted and assisted her Majesty to descend from the Royal carriage. Her Majesty accepted the arm of the Earl of Haddington, who conducted the Queen to the Admiralty barge, Prince Albert and the Princess Royal entering first. On her Majesty being seated, Viscountess Camrose, Lady in Waiting, and Lady Caroline Somerset, Maid of Honour, entered the barge and occupied the seats adjoining her Majesty. After alighting from the Royal carriage, and previous to descending the steps leading to the river, her Majesty graciously acknowledged the presence of General Sir G. Murray, Lieutenant-General Lord Bloomfield, and several of the distinguished noblemen present. The Admiralty flag, which had been raised on the arrival of the Earl of Haddington and Rear-Admiral Bowles, was taken down, and the Royal Standard hoisted on the flagstaff when her Majesty arrived, and a Royal Standard was hoisted in the Admiralty barge on her Majesty entering it. Commodore Sir F. A. Collier had the honour of steering her Majesty to the Royal yacht, and Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence received her Majesty on stepping on board that fine vessel. Her Majesty was most enthusiastically cheered on arriving, on entering the barge, and on going on board the yacht.

The Queen appeared in excellent spirits, but looked rather pale. Her Majesty was attired in a plain black silk dress, black silk shawl, and black crêpe bonnet.

Prince Albert looked remarkably well. His Royal Highness was dressed in a suit of mourning, over which he wore a light morning coat. The Prince wore a drab hat with a deep mourning band.

The Princess Royal was dressed in a black straw bonnet, trimmed with plain black ribbon.

THE PROGRESS OF THE ROYAL YACHT.

The Royal Yacht, as regards her construction and exterior, has been already described in No. 58 of our Journal. We subjoin the details of her interior, with the recent alterations:—

The Royal Apartments occupy the after-part of the yacht, and comprise the Dining-room, the Drawing-room, and the Bed and Dressing-rooms. The Dining-room occupies the entire stern from side to side, and is lighted from the stern windows, from side windows, and a skylight in the centre. It is 20 feet in length, by 22 feet breadth, and 7 feet 7 inches in height. The panel work is of a dark colour, with gilt mouldings. Scaffs (the under part of which is used for lockers) are attached to the circular stern. The chairs are plain mahogany and green morocco; one of them, with brass knobs and spikes in the feet for security, always stands on the starboard side, and is appropriated for the Queen. A circular table, but which may be extended to dine 18 persons, stands in the centre beneath a plain lamp, suspended from the skylight by a model anchor and cable. At the sides are ivory hand-holders to catch hold of when

THE MAGAZINES FOR SEPTEMBER.

AINSWORTH'S MAGAZINE possesses little reasonable interest. The editor's new "St. James's" approaches completion; the present chapters describe the sentence on Sweeney's dissolution of the Wing Ministry; and the Marquis de Guise's attempt to assassinate Harley; all spiritedly written. "The Gipsies' Tragedy," by Joseph Downer, is a tale of South Wales, shadowing forth the trials of Lydia Corbush. Mr. Ainsworth's contribution of travel relates chiefly to Antioch, and "The Perfection of the Transport;" it is a lengthy matter of thirteen pages. "Kate Crosby's Polka Party" is from a sketch by Paul de Kock, from which, much of the original humour has evaporated in the process of translation; the localities and names of the parties alone are changed, by the quasi author, P. F. B.: it is, altogether, a very mediocre affair; and, "Wanted a Governor," by Mrs. White, is of the same calibre. Mr. Laman Blanchard's "Every Man has his Doctor Johnson," possesses a good deal of quiet humour; the apology for this principle of idolship in social intercourse is thus neatly drawn:—

"If it be a prejudice and a weakness that begets this hero-worship, if it be a blind and erring feeling that leads us to the altar, let it not be forgotten that it incites and demands the repose of an undivided affection, and an unquestioning faith, in at least one of our countless fellow-creatures—which is something to link us closer to life, than he can be, who lacks such love and confidence from all. Even for the sake of this small something, it is as well to have one's Dr. Johnson. Hero-worship may have its woes, and therefore its pardon, if it but teach those who are without veneration of any kind, to fasten themselves enthusiastically upon some hero or other, however diminutive."

We may add, that it is in friendship, as in the other pursuits of life—who is everything, is nothing. Still, Mr. Blanchard's phrase "Doctor Johnson" does not precisely convey our notion of this first friend; with this exception, the paper is clever; in spirit it is excellent. In this number, "John Manservant" is brought to a close, one of the chapters "recording an exploit akin to Turpin's Ride to York, in 'Blackwood.'" The next paper, "France and Morocco," is an original view of the present position of affairs in the Mauritania territory, in which the ambitious freaks of Young France, and the interest of Christian nations in the question, are placed in a proper light. Leigh Hunt's "Jar of Honey" winds up the contributions, with some very pleasant gossip, critical and anecdotal, upon William Brown, and other "pastoral men."

BLACKWOOD'S is a matter-of-fact, and somewhat grave Number. It opens with a clever paper on M. Louis Leblanc's "Histoire de Dix Ans, 1839-1849," in which the democratic journalist is rather justly treated. "A Night on the Banks of the Tennessee" is a spirited piece of adventure; and "The Execution of Montrose," a charming ballad, with anecdotal notes. A series of papers called "The Witchfinder" is commenced with a stirring narrative of Fenelon. We can only notice two other papers; one is a critique on Mr. Coventry Patmore's volume of Poems, in which the poet's peculiarities are not spared; and the unanimity of the southern press in commending such absurdities is unconsciously dealt with. The Number is wound up with a sketch of the recent Burns Festival, by the highly-gifted editor; and some tributary stanzas on the event, by Delta. Both are graceful records of this interesting homage to genius.

TAIT'S MAGAZINE opens with a spirited sketch of the Burns Festival, that "great national offering of homage and repentance." The writer, by the way, misrepresents our position in the chase on Monday morning, and is somewhat irate with the non-attendance of celebrated living authors at the Festival ("the men of letters had proved men of letters, indeed"); and the paper ends with a flash of indignation. Of the other contributions we have only space to mention a batch of poems—some excellent—entitled "Fest of the Poets for September," a good German dream-story, and Tait's usual "Retrospect of the Session." The reviews are even more than ordinarily attractive.

THE POLYTECHNIC REVIEW and MAGAZINE is principally noticeable for an elaborate description of the new Electro-magnetic Printing Telegraph, two papers on Captain Warner's Experiment, and on Explosive Compounds, &c. The sketch of "The Scientific Amusements of London" is too wordy to be of practical benefit to the reader; there is too much of what the writer styles "philosophy."

THE BANKERS' MAGAZINE commences a gallery of "Curious Portraits," with Sir Robert Peel; the sketch may be useful as a refresher. "The American States' Rights," "The Joint Stock Banks' Regulation Act," and the "Alterations in the Law of Debtor and Creditor," are most prominent among the remaining contents of this diligently conducted journal.

SIMMONDS'S COLONIAL MAGAZINE contains a very interesting visit to the Cape Verde Islands, by a voyager; some important notes on Van Diemen's Land, by a late Colonial Police Magistrate; two capital contributions, "The Commerce of the American Laker," is, likewise, an important paper; and two papers on the Malagasy trade of British Honduras, and the Ice Trade of Boston—have attractions beyond their practical value. Mr. Wakefield's very elaborate treatise on "The Whale and Whaling," is continued with its Natural History. The Colonial intelligence is copious; and the illustration of the number is a map of New Zealand, from an original survey.

FRASER has a number of great variety, and considerable brilliancy. The opening paper on six new novels is, however, out of place. The article, "Classics of the Table," is far worthier of the premier place: it discourses most eloquently of deserts, fruits, sweetmeats, and liquors, the staple being from the great French work recently published. The writer of this paper is, evidently, experienced in his subject—a practical hand, and not a mere theorist. "The Summaries" is an interesting tale of the Decade. "The Pulpit in the Nineteenth Century" is cleverly written, but its positions are scarcely made out for extending the social influence of the pulpit. The paper on "French Fashionable Life 200 years ago" is pretty gossip, but much too long. An article "Concerning Dog Stealing" is a rare piece of delivery. There are two excellent papers—"Campbelliana (on Campbell, the poet)," and a charming review of the Hon. Mr. Swayne's "Historic Fancies."

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ANTICIPATIONS OF DONCASTER.

"Swearing to do a thing when life's short
Is easier than afterwards saying it:
Just as to sign a promissory note
Is not so difficult as paying it."

Eporn Races, and the disclosures that arose out of them, left amateur sportsmen blinful of admirable intentions, and the fortunes of the thing seemed on their last legs. As to the lady's sport wherewith Mr. Baron Alderson drew his robes around him, when he burst forth into a denunciation of the practice of gentlemen betting with blackguards, when summing up in the case of "Wood against Peel," was that in which the habits of Tattersall's about their books and buttons their pantaloons pockets, in the virtuous resolution of mewing the odds for all future time. This was at the period of the Derby setting, and thereafter. Soon—full soon, however, you saw their philosophy coming away, like Bob Acres' courage—and at the same place. Their puns would be doing, and if business was slack at Aulot, it had greatly improved by Goodwood, and the autumn promises to be particularly active. Now we are not going to insist on those who vowed to Mercury never again to wager a guinea keeping their resolutions to the letter, nor binding themselves to the spirit even of the declarations made when their bile was afloat, but only to warn them that they use a similar discretion in dealing with pleasure that they exercise towards business. It may be very well for a member of Parliament to say he had rather his son went to a common gaming house for the purpose of play than elsewhere; but we trust no member of society having due respect for discretion, and desirous of investing his five or ten pounds—"just for the sake of the interest it excites"—on the Lager, will betake him to a "leg" for that end. That robbery enjoyed impunity is certain unless till within very recent experience; even now its sole punishment is exposure. Is the most virtuous wife attempted on the last Derby? Had it to no further measures? The horse which came in first for it, under the title of Running Beam—that was "hidden away" from Smith's stablehand; and when the Judge's order for his examination was issued down this horse as "hidden away" (or stolen as the learned Judge called it) by a Mr. Ignatius Cople—it is now stated has been purchased from Mr. Levi Goodman by that gentleman for one thousand pounds—and that it is his intention to repay the £10 paid won at the Newmarket Second October Meeting of last year, and restore his owner to the honours of the British turf. Mr. Levi Goodman is a well-known and his real Running Beam in the neighbourhood, where he is hidden as back by a gentleman having a chance some ten miles from that town. This episode may be regarded as one of the rules of the system of "legging," and we give it here, lest our anticipations of Doncaster come to be undressed in an evil sense.

If there be such a property as gratitude in human nature, those who have descended to the "Selling" on a sultry autumnal night in the Leeds mail, must surely breathe a prayer for the spirit of steam which now deposits them at the Salvation in time for dinner, after a breakfast in the parish of St. James's. Doncaster is one of the sweetest boroughs in the world, and, indeed, as it ought to be—for it appears to be a relic of the golden age. Its favoured people have no idea of any harsher form than that made from the most precious of the metals. They never open their mouths (nor permit you to open yours) under a guinea. Your bed is a guinea, a too your dinner, ditto all the dimes of your coat—which will be found considerable. But, despite all these things, it is a pleasant, a right pleasant try, for those who love fun better than money. The morning for 1844, which commences on Monday, will probably be the last which will extend over five days. So much the better: fear is quite enough. The sport does not look so well on paper as could be wished. The Cup will be crippled almost to the death, by the manifestation of Alice Hawthorne; and the great event—the St. Lager—is in a suspicious category. The nature of this doubt we must leave the reader to read of his own sagacity from the text furnished by the table of odds. The Ugly Duck is "declared" not to start; we cannot estimate this declaration very highly, the news it conveys having been long at a discount. Of course everybody expects the own horse to win, or so he tells you; no one knows such a consequence impossible; hide the evidence of the gaming committee witness, please. If we were to risk anything in town, it should be Bay Mousie—its odds are a hundred per cent. better before the day. Then the Cat, once more; Bob Hawthorne can hardly be expected to win both "Coop" and "T. Lager" in the same year; it is out of reason. The field is a good field for the fieldmen, as at present constituted. It beat Colchester last year; it may also astonish the natives, as well as the foreigners, this season.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The betting this afternoon would appear to have reduced Scott's to three, Bay Mousie, although looked for a stray pony or two, having gone more completely out of favour than the odds would indicate. Ithuriel, The Princess, and Valerian, were in great and general estimation, the weight of the investments, notwithstanding the oft-repeated sale of his having been short of work, being on the crack. The Turf had a small but liberal party, and kept his ground; nevertheless, his enemies are numerous. R. d. Derr was also in force, having off, however, at the same price at which the first bet was laid—6 to 1. Poigha-Ballagh again retreated, and, with the exception of Lightning, no others were mentioned with any serious idea of backing them.

7 to 1 agst The Curd (c)	10 to 1 agst Valerian (c)	30 to 1 agst Godfrey
4 to 1 — Ithuriel (c)	10 to 1 — Bay Mousie	30 to 1 — Lightning
6 to 1 — Red Deer	17 to 1 — Poigha-Ballagh	30 to 1 — Morpeth
7 to 1 — The Princess

Vallet and the Ugly Duck are declared not to run.

4 to 1 agst Mickey Free	5 to 1 agst Ashford Pot
8 to 1 — Glossy	10 to 1 — Rowena

THURSDAY.—There was a very good attendance this afternoon, and business on many of the principal favourites was averagely brisk, but, as a glance at prices will show, without eliciting anything decisive as to Scott's lot, unless, indeed, the liberal offers against Bay Mousie may be construed as fatal to his chance—an interpretation that has very generally obtained of late. Of the horses quoted we may select The Curd, Ithuriel, Valerian, The Princess, and Poigha-Ballagh as having been "in force," a phrase that we cannot adopt with regard to Red Deer. From the present state of the betting it does not seem likely that the start will exceed ten or twelve. We subjoin the final London prices:—

5 to 1 agst Scott's lot	7 to 1 agst Red Deer	30 to 1 agst Godfrey
3 to 1 — The Curd	7 to 1 — Valerian	40 to 1 — Lightning
4 to 1 — Ithuriel	17 to 1 — Poigha-Ballagh	40 to 1 — Milton
7 to 1 — Princess (c)	17 to 1 — Bay Mousie

4 to 1 agst Mickey Free	5 to 1 agst Glossy	9 to 1 agst Artful Dodger
7 to 1 — Ashford Pot	5 to 1 — Rowena	10 to 1 — Advice

15 to 1 on the Field	40 to 1 agst Twir (c)
20 to 1 agst Black Prince	40 to 1 — Muskie (c)
5 to 1 agst all the Touchstones (c)

WESTERN MEETING AT AYR.

These races, which came off on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the 4th, 5th, and 6th of September, attracted a goodly company of visitors as usual. The attendance of the county families, with that staunch upholder and supporter of everything that tends to benefit his native country—the Earl of Eglintoun—at their head, was good, and the success of the weather, for the first two days at least, brought many from a distance. We subjoin a sketch of each day's sport:—

WEDNESDAY.

Produce Stakes, of 50 sovs, 20 furlongs. Two miles. 2 subs. Walked over by Sir J. Russell's Archer.

Ayr Gold Cup, value 100 guineas, the rest in specie; 10 guineas each, p. p. Two miles. 17 subs. Won by Mr. Ramsay's Shadow, beating Armitage and Best of Thoro.

A Free Handicap, of 10 sovs each, half forfeit; 25 sovs added by Glasgow and Ayr Railway Company. One mile and a half. Won by Lord Eglintoun's Brevity beating Cable, Arnauld, and Whistle Binkie.

THURSDAY.

Ayr Stakes of 5 sovs, p. p., and 25 added by the inhabitants of Ayr. Once round and a distance. Heats. Winner to be sold for £100, if demanded. Won by Lord Eglintoun's Brevity beating Geneva and Nightmares.

A Plate of 50 sovs, for all ages. Mile and a half. Mr. Ramsay's Shadow walked over.

A match for 50 sovs. Owners riding. Sir A. M. Cunningham's gr m beat Sir J. Russell's bl m, after a most original race in heats.

A Sweepstakes of 5 sovs, p. p., 50 added by the Western Meeting for bona fide hunters. Walked over by Sir J. Russell's Swift. (Major Campbell.)

FRIDAY.

The Ayr Stakes, of 5 sovs, with 25 added by the Glasgow and Ayr Railway Company. Two miles. Won by Mr. Ramsay's Armitage beating Sir J. Russell's Geneva.

The Two Year Old Stakes, of 25 sovs each, 10 sovs forfeit, 25 added by the Western Meeting. Won by Lord Eglintoun's Sylvia beating John Harris and Mithras.

A Handicap Sweepstakes of 10 sovs. Three-quarters of a mile. Gentlemen riding. Won by Mr. Crawford's Tina beating five others.

A Plate of 50 sovs, for horses of all ages. Winner saleable for £150. Won by Lord Eglintoun's Janine Forest beating Arnauld and Nightmares, who were drawn after the first heat.

CRICKET.

THE GENTLEMEN OF SURREY VS. THE PLAYERS OF SURREY.—This match was for the benefit of Heath, one of the Surrey players—a man who, what he is a free cricketer, is at the same time distinguished for his great propriety of conduct upon all occasions. On Monday the meeting took place on the Hee River ground, Walsley, and was won by the Gentlemen players. The score was thus:—The Gentlemen, 78; The Players, 66.

THE MARLBOROUGH CLUB AND GROUND VS. THE COUNTY OF NORFOLK.—Upon no occasion in the present season have such scores been marked against the Marlborough Club as in this match at Swaffham, which was played on Tuesday and Friday week, before a "crowded audience." The members of the M.C.C., however, failed in their attendance, and the result was that the active and zealous secretary, R. Kingston, Esq., was compelled to make up his "eleven" from the bystanders. They were all got down for 19 runs, a total which was mainly to be attributed to the unevenness of the ground—a fact which is the more strongly demonstrated by 202 balls having been delivered in the innings for so few runs. There were, too, 181 balls delivered by Lillywhite and Hillyer on behalf of Marlborough, from which 45 runs only were obtained. The club in the second hands marked but 33, and thus put in their opponents for seven to win. They were gained by Mr. Anson and Pich, without the loss of a wicket.

On Wednesday a match which created much interest was played at the Copenhagen ground, between 11 players of the Tottenham Albion Club and 22 players of the Islington Junior Club. The 22 players took their innings first, and scored 110 runs. The 11 players then went in, and obtained 112 runs, thus beating their 22 opponents by two runs.

ARUNDEL YACHT CLUB.—The sailing match amongst the fast yachts belonging to this highly respectable club, for a very handsome silver Cup and Cover, came off on Monday between Wooditch and Greenwood, T. Hawes, Esq., the Commodore of the Club, being the donor. The following had been entered:—Hazard, six tons; Mr. Ashbourne and T. Charles; Bermudian Maid, seven tons; Mr. H. Bailey; Halcyon, seven tons; Mr. H. Bailey; Dauntless, seven tons; Mr. T. Edwards. The Commodore's cutter moved to the starting place off the upper end of the town of Greenwich at a little after twelve, and Mr. Hawes gave the signal at twenty-five minutes past. The Dauntless took the lead in very good style, and held it until the second round, when the slight wind died off, and the little fleet became beset. The Hazard then took the lead, and won the race at twenty minutes after seven; the Halcyon being second, and the Dauntless third. The weather was ill-adapted for a race of this description.

PRESTONIANISM.—A foot-race took place on Watford-ridge, on Wednesday morning, for £20 a side, distance 440 yards. It was between the Pet of Epsom and the Charing-cross Pet. The preliminaries having been adjusted, the men started, and both looked in first-rate condition, and at the signal being given they bounded off as fast as steps, and ran nearly abreast together until within fifty yards from the finish, when the Epsom Pet put on a little extra steam, and ran in a gallant winner by six yards, completing the distance in 55 seconds.

LEICESTER RACES.—These races commenced on Wednesday. The first race was the Leicester Handicap of 25 sovs., with 75 added, which was won by Mr. Cook's What. The Brevity Stakes did not fill. A Sweepstakes of 5 sovs., with 40 added, was also won by Mr. Cook's What, the Hon. G. Onley's Seaweed coming in second.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ELECTION OF CITY CHAMBERLAIN.—RETURN OF MR. ALDERMAN BROWN.

The election for City Chamberlain terminated on Thursday, when Mr. Alderman Brown was returned. The numbers at the close of the poll were:—
Mr. Alderman Brown ..... 2395
Mr. Heppel ..... 63
Majority for Mr. Alderman Brown ..... 2341

On Wednesday, at the close of the poll, the numbers were as follow:—
Brown ..... 2391
Heppel ..... 63

Alderman Brown addressed a very quiet, although numerous, assembly upon the state of the poll:—I regret for your sake, but not for my own, that the contest has been so prolonged, for it is impossible that I can be better employed than in receiving and acknowledging the kindness of the livery upon such an occasion. Gentlemen, there is no accounting for tastes, but Mr. Heppel's appears to me to be a very singular kind of taste. He has given to his friends the opportunity to show that they disapproved of the choice of a magistrate for their Chamberlain, and I have reason to thank them for disapproving his expectation in a manner so perfectly intelligible. (A laugh.) I do not select any words to come forward, but I certainly shall feel grateful to those who will come, as I wish it to be marked that I have not met from my opponent the conduct which one gentleman has a right to expect from another.

Mr. Heppel: I do not think that a sentence has escaped from either of us during the whole of the election tending to excite, or in any way give occasion for, an unpleasant feeling, except that with which Alderman Brown has concluded his observations to-day.

Alderman Brown: I confine my observations to the business of this election. Mr. Heppel: I do not consider that I am at all under any obligation to apologise for the course which I have pursued in this election. The number of the livery who have polled is insignificant in comparison with those who have not come forward, and to whom I still hold out the opportunity of making their decision.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—On Saturday next, the 21st inst., being St. Matthew's Day, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, with the Governors of the several Royal Hospitals, will attend Divine Service at Christ's Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon will be preached by the Rev. James Cohen, Curate of Christchurch; after which they will repair to the Great Hall, in Christ's Hospital, where four Questions on the Records of the Royal Hospitals will be delivered by four of the Senior Scholars, according to annual custom; eight poems will also be recited by others of the Senior Scholars.

SOUTH-EASTERN AND DOVER RAILWAY COMPANY.—This company had their half-yearly meeting on Tuesday, when the first dividend was declared, though merely a nominal one, of 1s. 6d. per share.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—It has been determined that this magnificent edifice shall be thrown open to the public between the 12th and 17th of next month, the day to be appointed by her Majesty.

THE SURREY TOLLS.—During the last two days a number of workmen have been busily engaged in removing the various toll-gates connected with the Surrey trust. The Marsh gate in the Westminster-road, is nearly removed, which will greatly improve that part of Lambeth. At the Surrey, Waterloo, and Borough-road gates the tolls have been paying a visit, and have succeeded in carrying off property of considerable value. The Bermondsey New-road gate is entirely demolished.

THE CLARENCEWELL IMPROVEMENTS.—Twenty more houses adjoining the area from which fifty houses have been removed above West street, Southfield, and which are to be taken down to make way for the new street from Farringdon-street to the Sessions-house, Clerkenwell, have been sold by auction, by order of the Clerkenwell Improvement Commissioners. The street will be about 1450 feet in length (leading from West street to the back of the Sessions-house, Clerkenwell-green), about 68 feet in width, and the houses on either side will have a depth of about 30 feet.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths from all causes in the week ending on Saturday last was 918, the weekly average of the last five summers being not more than 900, whilst that of the last five years is as high as 946. The principal source of this increase upon the ordinary summer rate of mortality is still owing to the prevalence of epidemic diseases, the number who have thus died during the week over which these returns extend being 266 as compared with 191, the average summer mortality for five years, and 179, the average general rate of mortality for that period. In smallpox the increase is also remarkable, 49 persons having perished last week from this terrible disease, while in not more than 11 cases per week is it ordinarily fatal at this season. Scarlatina has also been unusually prevalent, the numbers being 59 as compared with 39. In many other forms of disease the amount of mortality has, however, diminished. The greatest heat in the sun, as shown by the thermometers at Greenwich, was on Sunday, the 1st inst., when the mercury reached 104.6 degrees; the lowest was on the same day, when the thermometer fell to 35.3 degrees.

APPREHENSION OF GAMBLERS.—At Judges' Chambers on Wednesday, Frederick Pemberton, alias Frederick Joseph Pemberton, was held to bail on a charge of gambling at the late Grosvenor rooms. James Hollock Davis was also held to bail on a charge of gambling at Ascent Heath races. Mr. Russell, the solicitor in the case, acted against Lord George Bentinck, attended on his behalf. The parties agreed that Lord George Bentinck was connected with the proceedings, but it is very doubtful whether his lordship is in any way mixed up with them.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Artesian well at Southampton (1300 feet deep) has been completely successful. The water rises to within forty feet of the surface, and by the aid of powerful steam-engines no less than 25,000 gallons a day are poured into the town.

The Hull and Gateshead papers give encouraging accounts of the prosperity of the shipping interest.

Measures are in progress for the establishment of a College for the promotion of the science of chemistry. The extension of knowledge on this subject cannot fail to produce useful results.

A surgeon of Darmstadt, Dr. Von Herff, has recently performed various operations which have been quite successful in cases of tubercular pulmonary consumption—pulmonary tuberculosis. The seat of the absorption having been ascertained by means of the air-bag, the matter is discharged outwardly by an incision being made in the cavity of the breast, penetrating the lungs. The cure is finally effected by medicine injected into the wound by a syringe.

A letter from Copenhagen of the 30th ult. states that the colossal model of an Erculapian, the last work of Thorwaldsen, and which he designed as the fellow to the colossal statue of Hercules in the Thorwaldsen Museum, &c. to pieces the very day that M. Cochrane, one of his pupils, was about to commence executing it in marble. The pieces in which it is broken are so small that the work is completely lost.

According to a late census taken at Brussels, that city reckons 24,700 families, occupying 13,647 houses, making less than two families in each house.

It is stated in accounts from the West Indies, that in taking a census in Trinidad, two circumstances of Aborigines Indians were discovered, belonging to a race perfectly distinct from any hitherto known.

The Annals of the Gazette gives at great length the account of the ceremonies on the celebration of the 300th anniversary of the foundation of the university of that city, which commenced on the 1st of September. The King of Prussia, who has been for 35 years the protector of the university, was pleased to issue a proclamation approving of the plan for a new building, of which his Majesty laid the first stone. At this ceremony his Majesty addressed the numerous assembly present in a very impressive speech.

A funeral service has been performed at Venice for the two sons of Admiral Hamilton, who were shot as confederates in the late attempts in Calabria. Their mother, who attended the service, believes that her sons died in battle.

The Hamburg Correspondent states that some disturbances took place amongst the miners at Clausthal, in Hanover, on the 30th ult. Troops were obliged to be sent for to preserve order.

One of M. Lévassieur's cotton factories, at Radepoint, near Rouen, was burned to the ground on Tuesday. A great number of persons collected when the terror gave notice of the event; but their efforts were in vain; everything was consumed except a few bales of cotton. Nothing was insured. The cause of the fire is not known.

The Scientific Congress of France opened its twelfth session at Nancy last week, in the large Hall of the Palais de Justice, the Baron d'Hombres Fréme in the chair. After the opening address had been delivered, M. de Gasparin, Peer of France, formerly Minister of the Interior, was appointed president for the session.

A singular meeting took place a few days ago at Rouen. Towards three o'clock an equestrian statue of Wellington, on its passage from Paris to London, was being landed from the Luxor, whilst at the same time a marble statue of Napoleon, a present from the King to the town of Ajaccio, was being landed from the Tankerville. As the two statues were conveyed to different brokers, a dispute was raised before the commandant of the port as to precedence between Napoleon and Wellington, when it was decided by the officer that Napoleon should be first landed, and that Wellington should be first re-shipped.

The National de l'Ouest of the 31st ult. states, that conflagration prevails the country in consequence of the number of incendiary fires. On the night of the 28th ult. a fire occurred in the village of Plémeur, which destroyed a number of houses. During the same night the village of Plémeur was visited by a similar calamity. On the night following, towards ten o'clock, a fire was observed at a farm house, in which several thousands of hay and some few oxen were consumed. On the 30th, towards ten o'clock in the morning, a fire was observed at Cœch, where forty houses were burnt and several families reduced to a state of destitution. All the houses were consumed, notwithstanding the exertions used to stop the flames.

A Madrid journal states that a quarry of lithographic stone of the best quality has just been discovered at Miraflores, in Catalonia.

Accounts from Naples state that the Government of the Two Sicilies is at present reviewing its tariffs, with a view to diminishing the duties now pressing on foreign exports. The latter adds that the Neapolitan Cabinet has renounced all hope of concluding an advantageous treaty with France, England, and Spain, but that it was on the point of entering into negotiations with the Zollverein.

The Havre journals of Monday inform us that on the preceding afternoon that town was visited by a storm of extraordinary violence. The wind was so high, that considerable damage was done to some of the houses, and the rain subsequently fell in such abundance that even carriages could not circulate in some of the streets, and cellars of the houses were filled with water.

According to correspondence from Nuremberg, sentence has been pronounced at Berlin in the first instance against Teich, who attempted to assassinate the King of Prussia. The sentence is to be, that he is to be hanged on the wheel.

A very large shark was captured at Torquay on Tuesday at the entrance of the bay by some fishermen in a herring boat. He was held down at the boat, where he died, after some very strong throes. He measured more than six feet in length, and 24 from point to point of the tail, and is furnished with five openings on each side at the gills. His upper jaw extends 3 inches beyond the lower, and both jaws are furnished with a triple row of most formidable teeth, each row turned in a direction different from the others.

The Calcutta Englishman announces the total loss of the Carron, from Liverpool, off Bengala, with a valuable cargo on board, worth upwards of £200,000. The Carron, from China, was also totally wrecked near Bangkok.

SPOTS ON THE SUN'S DISC.

SEEN DURING THE MONTH OF AUGUST, 1844, TOGETHER WITH THE STATE OF THE BAROMETER, THERMOMETER, WIND, AND WEATHER.

Our attention has been called to the probable connection subsisting, as "cause and effect," between the huge spots which are continually passing over the face of the sun, and our own daily vicissitudes of weather. The subject is most interesting one; the theory, on which we assume it to proceed, is well established; and it is one which can only be determined by observation, we have submitted, for the information of the public, the following observations connected with the spots which appeared during the month of August, having the curious in such matters to draw their own conclusions. The observations were made by an esteemed correspondent, and their accuracy may be relied on:—

	Bar.	Ther.	Wind.	General Remarks.
August 2nd: 9 A.M.	29.91 to 29.90	52 to 60	0-12 W.	Strong breeze, with showers.
3rd: Cloudy. No Obs.	29.50 to 29.48	52 to 54	0-12 S.W.	Strong breeze, with showers.
4th: 9 A.M.	29.62 to 29.57	50 to 71	.... W.	Moderate gales, with heavy rain N. of London.
5th: 9 A.M.	29.48 to 29.47	60 to 70	0-25 W. to S.E.	Fine morning; rainy night.
6th: Disappeared.	29.57 to 29.63	54 to 59	0-35 S.W.	Gales and showers.
7th: 9 A.M.	29.67 to 29.68	52 to 65	0-15 S.W.	Moderate gales, with showers.
8th: Disappeared.	29.65 to 29.71	49 to 65	.... S.W.	Strong breeze; fine.
20th: 9 A.M.	29.94 to 29.92	52 to 74	.... W.	Strong breeze; fine.
21st: 9 A.M.	29.90 to 29.78	52 to 64	W. ....	Dull day.
22nd: 9 A.M.	Stat. 29.79	48 to 62	W. ....	Ditto.
23rd: 9 A.M.	Stat. 29.77	46 to 67	W. ....	Fine, bright day.
24th: 9 A.M.	29.77 to 29.79	52 to 67	S.W. ....	Fine, but dull.
25th: 9 A.M.	29.94 to 29.85	52 to 66	W. ....	Fine day.
26th: 9 A.M.	30.05 to 30.11	50 to 65	W. ....	Fine day.

REMARKS.

During the appearance of the first of these groups of solar spots the barometer was in a very fluctuating state; the temperature much lower than the week previous to their appearance. The wind was very brisk, accompanied with rain and spring storms. A heavy storm passed off to the north of London in the afternoon of August 4, attended with thunder, lightning, hail, and rain. The second group, on the 7th and 8th, the barometer was nearly stationary, and the temperature still lower than during the transit of the first group. The wind was also brisk, with rain in occasional showers. The third group, which appeared, like the two former, in the south western portion of the sun's disk, and passed off in the north eastern quadrant, the wind being above the centre, found a falling barometer on the 25th, 26th, 27th, and 28th, stationary, and during the remainder of the transit the barometer slightly rose, the wind was light and steady from the west, the weather partly cloudy, but no rain fell. The temperature has been low for the season, but has become somewhat elevated since the spots disappeared. The main object in making these observations is to ascertain whether the sun's power becomes diminished in proportion to the magnitude of the spots transiting his disc. The spots seen in the morning on the western side of the sun's disc, and above his centre, appear in the evening on the eastern side, and below the centre, moving in the direction of the arrow, evidently denoting the sun's rotation on his axis, as I think the earth's rotation, both diurnal and annual, not sufficient to account for the appearance. (See Fig.)

The straight arrow denotes the direction the spots generally take when seen at 9 A.M. only.

FORGERY UPON THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—Several mis-statements having appeared relative to a fraudulent transaction at the Bank of England, we give the full story as the true version:—Burgess, a clerk in the Power of Attorney Office, said the stock to a highly respectable broker, and then identified the individual who represented the holder of the stock as the proper party. Upon the stock being transferred, a check on Messrs. Lubbock and Co. was handed in payment. This was immediately after presented at the banking-house, with a request that it might be paid in sovereigns. Such a demand excited the surprise of the cashier, who declined to accede to the request; but the clerk held a perfectly regular bill for the amount in notes, and referred the party to the Bank of England. The notes were immediately afterwards changed at the issue department of the Bank. The weight of gold, however, as much exceeded the amount of the person receiving it, that he was obliged to procure the assistance of a porter to carry it to the vehicle in waiting. These circumstances will greatly facilitate the identity of the individual, when taken, of whose speedy apprehension little doubt is entertained.

POLICE.

ATROCIOUS ASSAULT BY A SON UPON HIS FATHER.—At Union Hall on Monday, Thomas Barber, a lad about 17, and Charlotte Barber, a disreputable woman, were charged with committing a man-cruelty on Richard Barber, husband to the latter. Complacent, an old and infirm man, about 60 years of age, stated that he resided with the prisoners in Lewis's-tenement, York-street, London-road. They were constantly in the habit of abusing him and threatening his life because he was unable to get employment. His son had become acquainted with the worst of characters, and was in the habit of making use of filthy expressions. On his chiding him for his conduct he would, with his mother, commence a brutal attack on him with the poker, or any thing they could lay their hands on. On Sunday morning he unfortunately upset the coffee-pot, where his son abused him; on his remonstrating with him, he seized the poker and felled him to the ground. His wife held his hands while his son struck him on the head with the poker. He fortunately got a fly from them just as the lad was about to repeat the blow. He ran out covered with blood, which was streaming from the wound, and was taken by the neighbours to Mr. Gellatly's, the surgeon's, where his wound was dressed. The prisoners were in the meantime secured, and taken to the station-house. His wife, 127 M, produced a heavy poker, nearly bent double, and covered with blood, which the wound had been inflicted with. A knife was also wrested from the lad by constable 69 M. Mary Chambers, a female residing in a house at the rear of the prisoners heard cries of murder at nine o'clock yesterday morning. She could see distinctly the prisoners on the bed with the old man, whom the lad was beating with the poker. He was also flourishing a knife over the old man, whom the wife was holding down. In answer to the charge, the male prisoner made use of horrible and disgusting language, quite unfit for publication, which he imputed to his father, who he said was the assailant. He denied the assault. The female also denied the assault; she said the wound was caused by the old man falling on some broken cups. Mr. Tait said, it was a most disgraceful affair on the part of the female. He had no doubt the assault had been committed by the lad, whom he should find £20, or 21 days imprisonment; he should also require the wife to find good bail for 12 months. They were both locked up in default.

[We confess we think this system of merely doing offenders a very vicious one. In this case a most violent assault was committed. Indeed, the offence was little short of attempted parricide, and yet the boy was allowed the option of escaping by the payment of a fine. The woman who appears to have encouraged him was merely ordered to find bail. It was but last week that two omnibus drivers were committed to prison for improper conduct. This was a salutary example, but if crimes can be expiated by a small fine, an indirect temptation is held out for their commission.]

THE INGENUOUS ROBBERY IN THE WATERLOO-ROAD.—On Tuesday, at Union-hall, William Timbrelake, alias Cooper, and George Jackson, alias Cannon, were re-examined, on the charge of stealing twelve sovereigns, six silver spoons, and several articles of jewellery, the property of Edward Bunnell, of 24, Agincourt-street, Waterloo-road. The circumstances attending the robbery have been already fully described by us, and the following additional evidence was adduced.—Fanny Tanner stated that she is housekeeper at the Albion Coffee-house, No. 5, Grafton-street, Soho, and that on Monday, the 2nd instant, Timbrelake came to the house accompanied by the other prisoner and another man. They ordered chips, and remained in the private room for some time, and then went away, and returned at a later period of the afternoon and had tea. After tea Timbrelake wrote a letter, which he requested might be posted, and when they had finished their tea they all went away. Witness being surprised at the abruptness with which Timbrelake, especially, left the house, had the curiosity to enter the room, and discovered that her workbox had been opened, from which 12s. were taken, and also two watches and chains, which were hanging over the mantel-piece. The watches now produced were identified by the witness, and she added that no other person was in the room from the time the prisoners entered it, until they had gone away.—Sergeant Langley stated that on Monday night, the 2nd instant, when he apprehended the prisoners, he found in their possession the two watches now produced. He also found 12s. on Cannon, being the exact sum that was stolen on the evening in question. At this stage of the examination, Sergeant Langley stated that a watchman was in attendance to prove a charge of larceny against one of the prisoners.—The prisoners reserved their defence.—Mr. Tait said it was his intention to commit the prisoners for trial on the two charges of robbery. With respect to the charge of forgery, as the case was not complete, he should order the prisoners to be brought up again. A third man, named George Western, alias White, appeared to be implicated in the transaction, has been apprehended, and examined at the same office. The prisoner was identified by Mrs. Courtney, a lodger in Mr. Bunnell's house, as the man who pocketed the money and other property. Mr. Collingham remanded the prisoner.

THE ACCIDENT AT HIGHGATE.—On Monday, Mr. John Stephen Murphy, residing in Spencer-street, Northampton-square, connected with a commercial house in the city, was brought up to Clerkenwell Police-office, charged with killing and slaying Samuel Rogers, and seriously endangering the lives of three other persons, viz., Robert Munn, John Bignall, and Elizabeth Bignall, who is still in extreme danger. We stated some particulars last week. Thomas Hatcliffe, a gardener, residing at Highgate, deposed, that about nine o'clock on the evening of Sunday, the 1st instant, he saw the prisoner in a four-wheeled vehicle at the top of Holloway-hill. The prisoner seemed to be endeavouring to check the horse, which was proceeding at the very top of its speed; he did not succeed, and about 200 yards further on, witness heard a crash, and screams and groans. On reaching the place he saw the two Bignalls lying in the kennel; the woman was bleeding and insensible; John Bignall was hardly able to speak. In the middle of the road he saw Rogers lying with his face towards the road. Witness raised him up, and asked him what was the matter with him; he did not say a word, but shook his head, and witness saw that he was in a dying state. Subsequently assisted in conveying the deceased and the other sufferers to the White-lion and Cat. Three other witnesses were examined, whose testimony left no doubt that the horse ran away, and the occurrence was accidental. Under these circumstances Mr. Murphy was discharged.

ATTORNEY TO ANNIHILATE A FARMERMAN IN THE STREET.—On Thursday, at Marlborough-street Police-office, Mr. David Graham, an interpreter of the foreign language, made application to Mr. Hardwick, stating that a most determined attempt had been made to assassinate a Mr. Charles Victor, a French artist, residing at 40, King-street, Soho-square, who had been stabbed in six places in the public street, and was now at home in a state of great suffering, and his life in danger. Mr. Gallies then went on to state that between ten and eleven o'clock on Tuesday night a slight quarrel ensued in the coffee-room of the Prince Albert Tavern, in Little-street, Leicester-square, between Mr. Victor and a Pole, a professor of languages. Mr. Victor shortly afterwards left the tavern with his antagonist, and on getting into the street the altercation between them was renewed, and menacing gestures with the fists were made on both parties. The Pole was then observed to draw a knife out of his coat-pocket, and stab Mr. Victor on the left side of the head, the point of the blade striking against the skull bone with great force. Mr. Victor defended himself as well as he was able, but in the scuffle that ensued he received a cut transversely across the right eye, and two stabs of considerable depth on the left cheek. He was then beset by a third man, who made his escape. On enquiring his next, Mr. Victor was found to have received two more stabs (the most dangerous of his wounds) in the chest. Surgical aid was instantly procured, and eventually Mr. Victor was removed to his residence. Mr. Hardwick directed Gibbitt, one of the police-constables, to immediately investigate the matter.

CONSPIRACIES CONNECTED WITH A TAILORMAN'S WIFE IN THE CITY.—A man named John Brown, who was without a coat, and appeared to have suffered in a conflict, was brought before Alderman Gibbitt at the Mansion House, on Wednesday, charged with having committed a daring robbery. The case was more remarkable by the display of various and strange objects upon the part of a lady of rather small stature and delicate appearance. Mr. Gibbitt appeared for the prisoner, Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Bradshaw, wife of Mr. Bradshaw, of No. 103, Bishopsgate-street-within, hosiery and glove, stated that about ten minutes past eight o'clock on Tuesday night a man came into the shop, dressed in a green shooting coat and yellow buttons, and asked to look at some ribbon. Witness showed him some, and cut off a yard and a half. While she was engaged in cutting it the prisoner entered, followed by the shopman, who had been out, and whom she desired to serve him. The moment she saw the prisoner she suspected that he was a thief, and she observed his motions. The shopman incautiously placed upon the counter, near the prisoner, a bundle of handkerchiefs, and the man with the shooting coat and yellow buttons at the moment exchanged glances with the prisoner, who took up some of the handkerchiefs in the bundle, put his own handkerchief over them while the shopman's head was turned another way, gracefully wiped his nose with them and put them into his pocket. (Laughter.) "When I observed that," said the lady, "I lifted up the flap of the counter, and said to him, 'Don't any of these handkerchiefs please you, sir?'" "No," said he. "Then," said I, interrupting him, and preventing him from going out, "allow me to look at those you have in your pocket." He declared he had none, and that he was a gentleman, and had a cab waiting for him at the door, and out he rushed into the street. I ran after and caught hold of him, and he struck me, but I would not let him go. The fellow with the green coat seized me by the wrist to disengage me from him, but I kept my hold, and the prisoner and I were up and down together three times, he struggling to get away, and I struggling to hold him. The fellow in the green coat then kicked me on the hip, and the prisoner struck me a blow on the neck and then ran off. I followed him along the street, and caught hold of his coat, which gave way, and the tail of his coat remained in my hand. He then escaped from me, but was soon brought back in custody. He denied that he was the person accused, but there he was with the upper part of his coat on his person and the lower part of it in my possession.—James Kennedy, of Hopton, book-binder, stated that at about a quarter past eight o'clock he was in Bishopsgate-street, a few yards from the shop of Mrs. Bradshaw, that he heard her cry out, and saw her and the prisoner struggling on the ground, that the prisoner ran away, and that he ran after and secured him without losing sight of him. The witness added that the handkerchiefs were picked up near the London Tavern, where he secured the fellow.—Mrs. Bradshaw, a Jeweller in the same street was robbed of property on the same evening, and so doubt by the same prisoner, assisted by the fellow with the green coat. He has no doubt that this prisoner was one of the thieves, but as he has no proof he does not wish to come forward.—The Prisoner: Now don't say that. Don't say that things are worse than they really are.—Mrs. Bradshaw: When he came to the shop he had a black patch upon his hip, but he took it off before he got to the station-house.—Alderman Gibbitt committed the prisoner for trial, and congratulated the lady upon such uncommon self-possession and courage as she had exhibited throughout. The green-eyed gentleman will, in all probability, be very soon in custody.

A WIFE CHARGED WITH ATTEMPTING TO POISON HER HUSBAND.—At Union Hall yesterday week, a woman, named Sarah Dore, was charged with attempting to poison her husband. The complainant, who keeps a circulating library at No. 3, Castle-street, Kent-street, is the daughter of a man who was a woman of violent temper, and she had quarrelled with him for a while a chest of drawers, the preceding day. She first exhibited her angry feelings by a heavy piece of wood on his head from the window. Subsequently, while he was taking his tea, she went into the shop to attend on a customer. On his return his wife was there, and soon after he had taken a cup, he was violently ill. The prisoner seemed rejoiced at his sufferings, and speculated that he would throw up his heart, and used other language of a similar description. She then left the room, and went up stairs, when, soon after her departure, he procured a piece of paper on the spot where the prisoner had previously stood, and on opening it he found it to contain a lump of white stuff, resembling chalk in its appearance, and on pouring the remains of the tea out of the cup into a saucer, he discovered a quantity of white sediment at the bottom of the cup. A chemist, who was sent for, said the paper had contained arsenic. He was still suffering from the effects of what he had drunk, and an ant dose having been administered, he recovered sufficiently to be enabled to attend the court day, although he was still far from being well.—The magistrate told the prisoner the charge against her life, and asked her what she had to say?—The prisoner replied: I put myself in the hands of the Lord. All I have to say, at present, is, that I am innocent of the charge.—She was remanded till Wednesday. On that day she was re-examined. Mr. James, the solicitor who attended for the prosecution, said that he was requested by the complainant to state, that he was acquainted with grief at the awful situation of his wife, to whom he had been married forty years. That they had sixteen children, four of whom, their sons, young men of most exemplary conduct, had joined in the prayer of their father for the liberation of their mother. Mr. Collingham said that the alleged attempt to deprive the complainant of his life by such means as that resorted to by the prisoner was of such a nature that he could not possibly grant the application; and that the charge was one which must go before a jury. The prisoner, who stood trembling at the bar, frequently asserted her innocence of the alleged offence, and declared that she never touched her husband's teapot on the evening in question, and had no opportunity of putting poison in it even if she was inclined, for he was not a moment absent from the room. Mr. Collingham observed that the prisoner's previous conduct to her husband strengthened the belief that he was the hand that administered the poison. The magistrate then said that he should commit the prisoner, but that she should be brought up again on Tuesday next to give the policeman an opportunity of making further inquiries relative to where the poison was bought.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

removing from place to place when the vessel is in motion, and a number of ivory tell-pulle, labelled for the papers, nursery, &c. The rudder case is white with gilt mouldings. A Brussels carpet covers the deck. Nearly the whole of the furniture was formerly in the Royal George Yacht. In the middle of the bulkhead of the fore part of this room are folding-doors opening into a central passage that leads to the Royal Stateroom, and on the leeward side of this passage is

The DRAWING-ROOM: 24ft. 6in. long, 12ft. 6in. broad, and 7ft. 7in. high. The paint work is lilac colour, headed with gold leafing. It has three windows in the side and is also lighted by strong prismatic glass work in the deck. The chairs are curiously turned to double up, and to be invented by George IV. There is a circular table in the centre, and a square table at each end, as well as a side table, the whole having raised brass work round the edges to prevent anything from rolling off. Two handsome and commodious easy chairs stand abait and a sofa on either hand. Against the vessel's side is a piano-forte, a Brosser's carpet covers the deck, and the whole is extremely plain and simple. The bulk-heads and sides are filled in with cork to prevent the noise of the engines being heard, and the lower skirting of both rooms have perforated zinc let in for the purpose of ventilation, which is regulated by a screw. The windows have plain green silk curtains. A small stateroom separates the Drawing-room from the Dining-room. On the starboard side of the passage, opposite to the Drawing-room, is the Royal Bed Cabin and Dressing room. It was in the Drawing-room that her Majesty received Louis Philippe, King of the French, last year.

Immediately after her Majesty had embarked, she went off her moustache, and proceeded at half speed down the river. The Black Eagle got under weigh at the same time, and followed in the wake of the Victoria and Albert. At the time the yacht got under weigh to proceed on her destination, the weather still continued unfavourable so that her Majesty did not remain on deck more than five minutes. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert did not go below, but took shelter in the alcove about the starboard paddle-box, where he could see the various objects that presented themselves as the yacht pursued her course towards the sea. The Duke of Aberdeen and Liverpool remained in the alcove with his Royal Highness.

As the yacht neared the village of Stone—a village whose church forms a picturesque object about a mile above Greenhithe—one of her Majesty's attendants was observed coming up the river at full speed. A signal was made from the Victoria and Albert to her, and she immediately hoisted her number, and proved to be the Lightning, the vessel which conveyed his Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia to the Continent at the conclusion of his visit to this country. The royal yacht was here too, and while many on board were wondering whence arose the detention, it was speedily ascertained that the delay was caused by the anxiety of her Majesty and Prince Albert to obtain information of the safe arrival of their illustrious visitor on the shores of Belgium. A boat was lowered from the Lightning, and was rowed with great rapidity on board the yacht, and the required and gratifying information of the safe landing of his Royal Highness Prince William of Prussia was conveyed by the commanding officer of the Lightning to her Majesty. As soon as Prince Albert was informed of the Lightning being in sight, his Royal Highness left the alcove, and mounted the large connecting the two paddle boxes, where he remained until the arrival of the Lightning boat, when he descended on the quarter deck, and personally questioned the officer who came on board respecting the safe landing of the Prince of Prussia and the circumstances of the voyage, in all of which being answered satisfactorily, the officer descended into the boat, and was pulled by the crew back to the Lightning, which vessel proceeded up the river to Woudrich, while the royal yacht resumed her course in the opposite direction. His Royal Highness Prince Albert almost immediately after his arrival on board the yacht changed his hat for a naval uniform cap with a gold band round it, which he wore during the day.

Hitherto the yacht had not been going at full speed, but when she had passed

HER MAJESTY'S YACHT.—THE DINING-ROOM.

Tilbury Fort and Gravesend she increased it to nearly its maximum. When the royal yacht arrived at the Nore, the Ocean, flag-ship at Sheerness, fired a royal salute. There was no man-of-war of any description lying at the Nore. Some idea of the rapidity with which the royal yacht and her attendant squadron proceeded, may be formed from the time which she took in reaching the Nore. She left Woolwich at 20 minutes past 9 A.M., reached Gravesend at 55 minutes past 10, and passed the Nore light at 10 minutes past 12, performing the whole distance from Woolwich to the Nore in two hours and 30 minutes, and from Gravesend to the Nore in one hour and 15 minutes. About 10 o'clock the yacht altered her course to the northward and eastward, and proceeded on her voyage to Scotland.

The royal yacht, after leaving the Nore, altered her course, and bore upon the north-east, proceeding through the channel between the Long-sand and the coast. The Eclair steam-frigate, the Black Eagle, and the rest of the Government steamers forming the royal escort, following immediately in the rear.

At about half-past two o'clock the squadron passed the beacon on the Gunfleet Sand, and precisely at three her Majesty's yacht was abreast of Harwich harbour.

As the General Steam Navigation Company's steamer, the City of Hamburg, was steaming abreast of the buoy on the R-dge Sands, between Aldborough and Orfordness, a cry was raised of the approach of the Queen. In an instant the deck was crowded with passengers, and all eyes directed to the direction of the royal yacht, which was approaching at full speed, and a large steamer following close in the rear. The weather was delightful. Neither her Majesty nor her Royal Consort were to be seen, but immediately the first cheer was given, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence made his appearance on the deck out of the state cabin, apparently at the command of the Queen, and returned the compliment by taking off his hat and bowing.

On Monday night at 10 o'clock the royal yacht passed Yarmouth to the northward, accompanied by a fleet of steamers, which every now and then fired blue lights as signals. The yacht had four brilliant lights.

The royal squadron passed Cromer at a quarter to one o'clock on Tuesday morning. After leaving Scarborough the royal yacht continued the north-west track close in along the coast, passing before twelve o'clock the great Yorkshire cliff, Robin Hood's Bay, and Whitby, where demonstrations of loyalty were exhibited.

The royal yacht was abreast of Tynemouth Bar on Tuesday afternoon at half-past three o'clock. To the great disappointment of the visitors, neither her Majesty nor Prince Albert were on deck. Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, however, acknowledged their loyalty on the part of her Majesty. The passage from London to Tynemouth effected by the royal yacht is the quickest on record. The distance, 300 miles, was accomplished in about twenty-nine hours.

The squadron accompanying her Majesty is thus composed. The Royal Victoria and Albert, steam-yacht, Capt. Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, G.C.B. The Black Eagle, steam-yacht, Capt. the Earl of Hardwicke. The Eclair, steam-sloop, the man-of-war escort, Com. Walter G. B. Estcourt. The Stromboli, steam-sloop, Com. the Hon. Plunkett. The Blazer, steam-vessel, Capt. Washington. The Porcupine, steam-vessel, Capt. Bullock. The Volcano, steam-vessel, Lieut. Com. E. C. Miller. The Princess Alice, steam-tender, Master Com. Luke Smithett. Thus our Queen has a squadron of above 1000-horse power to attend her on the sea; her own yacht being the most powerful of the fleet.

PREPARATIONS FOR HER MAJESTY'S RECEPTION AT DUNDEE.

A private letter from Dundee says:—"A splendid triumphal arch is already commenced across the whole extent of Castle-street, and rich carpeting is intended to be laid down along the whole line of her Majesty's progress. It was at one time proposed to have a body-guard for her Majesty, and in uniform too, but the idea was ultimately abandoned. One would think, to see the front of our protection wall, from the number of old cannon getting in preparation for a royal salute—not to speak of the 'fortifications' erected at Broughty Ferry and Blackness—that we were preparing to repel an invasion, rather than to welcome our Sovereign."

At Blair, the Castle is to be given up entirely to her Majesty. Lord Glenlyon is actively engaged in making preparations. A new avenue has been opened, with entry boxes at the gate, and enclosed with a paling, which extends about 300 yards, from seven to fourteen feet high. The Castle has been beautifully fitted up, and the grounds put in the finest order. The Highlanders who are to act as a guard during her Majesty's stay, under the command of Lord Glenlyon, have been drilling every evening for some time past, and make an admirable appearance. There are about two hundred of them; their dresses are splendid and elegant; and they are armed with sword and buckler.

Her Majesty will be received on landing, by a guard of honour of the 66th Regiment (the Queen's Royal Rifle Corps), and will be escorted on the road to Blair Athol by the Scots Greys. At Blair Athol the care of her Majesty will be made over to the keeping of the Athol Highlanders.

The distance to be traversed by her Majesty, from Dundee to her Highland residence is about fifty miles; the distance from Dundee to Cupar-Angus being about fifteen miles; from Cupar-Angus to Dunkeld, 15; and from Dunkeld to Blair Athol, nearly 30 miles.

We copy from the Dundee Warder of Tuesday, the latest account of the preparations made to receive her Majesty on landing:—

The triumphal arch, erected across the Middle Quay, represents a freestone building, in breadth upwards of 90 feet, and in height, to the top of the flag-staff, nearly 100 feet. There are three arches. The centre one surmounted with the royal arms, and underneath in gold letters, "Welcome Victoria," and round the arch, "Albert." Over the whole floats the royal standard.

What will add considerably to the grandeur of the scene is the fortunate idea of manning the yards of the vessels in the harbour. The tars, with their best blue jackets and white trousers, are to be mounted aloft; and, towering far above the puny spectators below, as her Majesty plants her feet on terra firma, and treads the shores of "Bonnie Dundee," a shout of welcome will burst forth, as it were, from mid-air, to be returned by the tens of thousands on the adjacent shores.

The royal landing-place is immediately in front of the entrance to the Tide Harbour. A floating barge is to be moored a few feet from the quay, and the gangway, covered with velvet, is to extend from the shore to the barge, by which her Majesty and suite will ascend, to the place where the deputations will be waiting to receive her.

In the event of her Majesty arriving in the river during the night—indeed at whatever hour she arrives—salutes will be fired; and immediately on her landing on the shores of Dundee, a royal salute will be fired from the Protection Wall, where cannons have been placed.

It is intended that as soon as her Majesty has received the addresses, the procession will set off, preceded by the city officers, followed by the Magistrate and Council in four coaches. After these come the royal carriages, and after these again the other public bodies who intend joining the procession.

Every care is to be taken to prevent accidents at the Harbour. To-morrow (Wednesday) morning, low water is about a quarter to seven, so that it will be at least ten o'clock before a proper depth of water is got to float the royal steamer into the tide harbour.

The London Shipping Company have placed their powerful steamer, the Perth, at the service of the royal voyagers. She is to sail to meet the royal squadron, when every assistance will be given, either by putting a pilot on board, or leading the way.

The Modern Athens, also, is to proceed as far as the buoy of Tay, turning at six o'clock, should her Majesty's ships not be then in sight. It is intended to sail her again at five in the morning, when there can be no doubt of falling in with them.

THE FLAG-SHIP "OCEAN," SALUTING THE ROYAL SQUADRON, AT THE NORE.

FORMER ROYAL VISITS TO DUNDEE.—At the present moment, the following account of Royal visits to Dundee will, no doubt, be interesting. Passing over the fugitive visits of several princes of the Stuart line, above two hundred years have elapsed since Dundee has been honoured by the presence of royalty. The last crowned monarch seen there was James the Sixth of Scotland, and First of England. About fourteen years after his accession to the English throne, James, as he informed his Scottish subjects in a proclamation, began to experience "a salmon-lyke instinct—a great and natural longing to see our native soyle, and place of our birth and breeding." "In 1617, James (says Wilson) began his journey with the spring, warming the country as he went, with the glories of the Court; taking such recreations by the way as might best beguile the days, and cut them shorter, but lengthen the nights (contrary to the seasons); for what with hawking, hunting, and horse-racing, the days quickly ran away, and the nights, with feasting, masquing, and dancing, were the more extended." After his reception, on the 16th of May, at Edinburgh, James proceeded by Linlithgow and Dunfermline to Falkland, where he arrived on the 19th, "and once more enlisted with the sounds of his hunting-horn that noble park which had been his favourite scene of amusement in youth. On the 23d he went to Kinnaird, the seat of Sir John Livingston, where he spent eight days, probably in sylvan sports. On the 30th he advanced to Dundee, and was welcomed by the town clerk, in a panegyric speech, and by two Latin poems." To the disappointment of the inhabitants of Aberdeen, who had also made preparations for his reception, Dundee was the northern termination of the royal progress, on account of the necessity of the King's returning to Edinburgh, in time to prepare for the meeting of Parliament.

The last visit of a Queen was that of the beautiful and unfortunate Mary, in 1550.

CELEBRATION OF THE BIRTH-DAY OF THE MARQUIS OF CHANDOS, AT STOWE.

During the past week, this magnificent seat, and the adjoining town of Buckingham, have been the scene of a series of festivities, to celebrate the majority of the Marquis of Chandos, the eldest son of the Duke of Buckingham. The young Marquis attained his majority on Tuesday last, but the celebration was not restricted to the anniversary of the birth-day; for, throughout the week, all classes of the locality have joined in "unbroken mirth." In short, there has been celebrated at Stowe, a genuine Old English festival, such as the titled and wealthy owners of the soil were wont to give in the last century, to commemorate the birth of a heir, his coming of age, or his accession to rank and property. As a picture, or rather a succession of pictures, of the sports and pastimes of "Merrie England," the festival at Stowe and Buckingham is entitled to especial illustration and record in our Journal.

Of all the mansions and show-houses of our nobility, the domain of Stowe is, perhaps, the most celebrated.

"Where Order in Variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, all agree:
Nature shall join you, Time shall make it grow,
A work to wonder at—perhaps a Stowe."
—POPE.

This magnificent domain lies at a short distance from the town of Buckingham, distant from London 57, and from Oxford 25 miles. A straight road, two miles in length, leads through an avenue of trees from Buckingham, through two lodges, to the entrance gateway, a large Corinthian arch; whence appears the garden front of the House, on the summit of a verdant slope, and encompassed by the Garden and Park; the extent of the former being about 600 acres, and the circumference, by the outside walk, three miles. The grounds were originally laid out in straight paths and avenues, and adorned with canals and fountains. Subsequent improvements were made under the direction of Bridgeman, Kent, and other artists and amateurs; and the beauties of Stowe have been commemorated by Pope and West, who spent many festive hours with the then owner, Lord Cobham. The grounds, when beheld from a distance, appear like a vast grove, interspersed with columns, obelisks and towers. They are adorned with almost every variety of architectural and sculptural decoration; as arches, pavilions, temples, a rotunda, a hermitage, a grotto, bridge, fountain, &c. The temples are adorned with busts of eminent persons, and there are monuments, votive shrines, "sacred" urns, and tributary statues to genius, which invest the entire domain with the classic and poetic air of an Arcadia. The house was originally built by Peter Temple, esq., in the reign of Elizabeth; it was rebuilt by Sir Richard Temple, who died in 1697, and has since been enlarged and improved. The whole extent of the house, in length, is 916 feet: it has two fronts; the south-east, or garden front, with a large central portico, and two highly embellished wings or pavilions; and the north-west, or park front, consisting of a centre with a portico, and crowning balustrade and urns; and two wings connected with the centre by semicircular colonnades. The latter of these fronts is represented in one of the annexed engravings. We shall not be expected to describe the mansion itself in detail; as, the Corinthian loggia, the richly-decorated saloon; the hall, painted by Krat, the cedar chapel; the libraries, and superb state-rooms; altogether extending in length 484 feet. They are filled with the rarest specimens of art and merit, including a valuable collection of paintings.

Such is the princely domain, wherein, by Tuesday last, great numbers of the nobility and gentry, especially those residing in the country, had arrived to offer their congratulations on the happy event, and to partake of the Duke's magnificent hospitality; while the yeomanry of the county, and his grace's tenants, tradesmen, and retainers, assembled at Buckingham with similar objects, and appear to vie with each other in thus testifying their respect and attachment to the Duke and his family. Visitors of every kind, and from all quarters, also arrived at Buckingham, so that the town was now completely full, accommodation being scarcely obtainable at the inns or elsewhere.

On Monday, the Corporation met in the Town-hall, at Buckingham, to draw up addresses of congratulation, and to finally arrange the programme of sports and amusements, and in the afternoon, a new union-jack (having been previously properly christened,) was hoisted above the same building with much ceremony, amid the cheers of the multitude. At the same time, the entire carcass of a noble ox, surmounted by a canopy of laurel and gaily decorated with flowers and ribbons, was carried round the town, preceded by a band of music and followed by a merry crowd of men, women, and children, and was then consigned to a large spit erected for the occasion, and turned throughout the night by relays of men, whose labours were anxiously watched by a circle of wondering onlookers. Meanwhile, the band continued to enliven the town with music; the Town Hall (by way of rehearsal), was illuminated, guns were fired, crackers and squibs were flung about the streets, and it was not until long after the witching hour of night that the old town relapsed into something like its accustomed tranquillity.

The two scenes of the festival procession, and the less classical operation of roasting the ox, are portrayed in two of our illustrations. The latter is a truly national scene, characteristic of good old English fare, and unbounded hospitality.

On Tuesday, at Buckingham, before daybreak, cannon were fired and responded to by merry peals from the church steeple, and by the band of the Bucks Yeomanry, with vigorous strains from drums and trumpets; flags were hoisted on the public buildings, and huge branches of oak and laurel hung out from the inns, and the houses of the more respectable inhabitants.

The first public proceeding was a becoming and liberal act of charity. Soon after six, the doors of the National School-room were thrown open, and meat, bread, flour, and other necessaries, the gift of the Duke, were distributed among the poor of the town of Buckingham, in the proportion of one pound of each to each member of a family; no less than 3700 tickets were issued. At an early hour, the children in the union workhouse paid a visit to the roasting ox, and returned to enjoy, at a subsequent part of the day, with the other inmates of the workhouse, some good cheer provided for them likewise by his Grace's liberality.

At half-past eight, the Thames royal brass band drove into the town, playing "God save the Queen," and some of their most spirited marches. Throughout the day, also, the country-people came flocking in; and, at noon, all the shops were closed, and business was suspended.

At Stowe the morning was ushered in by a discharge of fifteen nine-pounders from the tower. Soon after daybreak, also, some minstrels arrived and performed a serenade under the Marquis's window, composed by the Duchess of Buckingham. The park front of the mansion was hung with variegated lamps, arranged so as to form the words "God save the Queen" in the centre, and on either wing the words "Welcome." The statue of George I. in front of this side of the house, was decorated with laurel, and behind was an erection, also hung with variegated lamps, so as to form the words,

May God bless him.

For God, my country, and my friends." At noon, the Mayor (Mr. Smith), Recorder (Mr. Sergeant Byles), and Corporation of Buckingham, arrived in their robes, and in the state library presented addresses of congratulation to the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham and the Marquis of Chandos, each of whom replied to the same. The reply of her Grace the Duchess was in these touching terms:—"Gentlemen, I thank you, and the inhabitants of Buckingham, most sincerely for your good wishes, and very kind expressions towards myself and my dear son. THE CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, GUILDHALL.

CHAMBERLAINSHIP OF THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.

The termination of the contest for this high office of trust, (reported elsewhere in our journal), presents a fit opportunity for introducing to our readers a few historical details of its institution and important functions.

The office of Chamberlain is of very ancient origin, and was formerly the King's Chamber, or Exchequer. It appears by ancient records in the possession of the Corporation of London, that the office was held of the Crown (5 John, 1294), when William de St. Michael paid the King a fine of £100, and a yearly rent of 160 marks for the same. The charter of the above sovereign (16 John, 1215), expressly reserves out of his grant to the City, "his Chamberlainship;" Henry III., 3rd Charter (31 Hen. III.), does the same; and in 1278 (6 Edw. I.), Matthew de Columbers is mentioned as "the Chamberlain of Our Lord the King."

The period at which the office passed from the Crown to the Corporation is unknown; but, we find, in the year 1360, (28 Edward I.) that the Chamberlain was elected to the office by the Mayor and Aldermen; and, in 1318, he was elected by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty; with whom the election remained until the year 1794, (11 Geo. I.), when by Act of Parliament, the Chamberlain was directed to be elected by the Livery.

The Chamberlain of London is, in law, a Corporation Sole. His Seal of Office consists of a regal crown, lion passant, the City sword, and two keys.—Legend: Sigillum Censere Londoni. The annexed engraving is copied from an impression in the British Museum, bearing the date 1569.

This seal is used, at the present time, and affixed to every copy of the City freedom issued from the Chamberlain's Office.

We have also appended the ancient insignia of the Chamberlainship—a staff surmounted with a jewelled crown, and having a glass handle, mounted with gold, and jewelled. This sceptre is borne by the Chamberlain on state occasions, and is presented, with the keys of the City, on the entry of the Sovereign by Temple Bar: it is also surrendered on Nov. 9, by the Chamberlain, who is then customarily re-elected to his office.

The duties of the Chamberlain are twofold. In his judicial capacity, he admits, on oath, all persons entitled to the Freedom of London; and registers and enrols all apprentices, adjudicates between them and their masters upon complaints made to him. In this capacity, he has power to commit either master or apprentice to Bridewell, or to a place of temporary confinement in Guildhall, now little used; but, it is believed, that there has been no commitment of a master for a century and a half. The Chamberlain adjudges without a jury, and no appeal takes place from his decision, though it is believed that there is a right of appeal to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen.

As Treasurer of the Corporation, in "the Chamber of London," called, at various times, "the Inner Chamber," the "Exchequer Chamber," and now simply, "the Chamber," the Chamberlain has the care and custody of the City cash and regalia; and of monies not the property of the citizens, but administered in trust by them for a variety of important purposes. Many Government taxes were received at the Chamberlain's Office until the reign of William III., and the Land-tax was paid into the Chamber until the time of Sir Stephen Jansen, Bart., who resigned in 1765. Parliament has since intrusted the Chamberlain with a variety of trust-monies under various Acts (at the present time, exceeding seventy), which Acts regulate the funds connected with the Paving, Lighting, Cleansing, and Sewerage, and Police of the City; the Navigation of the Thames, up to Staines; the Harbour and Port of London, as far as the Medway; London and Blackfriars Bridges; the Royal Exchange, the Coal Exchange, the City of London School, and Emanuel Hospital; together with the various improvements effected, or now in progress, in the neighbourhood of London-bridge, the Exchange, the Post-office, &c. The sums of money passing through the Chamber annually average £700,000, of which sum about £150,000 belongs to the City, as their own cash, and the remainder is trust-money.

The emoluments of the office, under Sir James Shaw, who held it twelve years, were, on an average, about £3600 annually; but, on the appointment of Sir William Heygate, the late Chamberlain, they were reduced by the Corporation to a fixed salary of £2500, at which sum it now remains. The Chamberlain gives security for £30,000, for the faithful discharge of his duties; and it is a remarkable fact, that, considering the large amount always passing through the Chamber, there is neither record nor tradition of a default in the office to the amount of a single shilling, in upwards of 700 years, that it has been the depository of Government, Corporate, and Trust monies.

The establishment of the Chamber consists of the following officers: the Chamberlain, head of both departments, judicial and financial. To the former are attached a clerk, assistant-clerk, and yeoman; and to the latter, a comptroller, chief clerk, cashier, and four assistants. The accounts are audited annually.

Official accommodation is provided for the Chamberlain adjoining the Guildhall of the Corporation. The office is a spacious apartment, the first to the right hand, up the steps, on the north side of the hall. Upon the wall is a picture of the battle fought near Tooten, in Yorkshire, between the rival families of York and Lancaster, March 29, 1461, painted by Alderman Josiah Boydell. Over the chimney-piece is a finely-coloured print of the window at New College, Oxford, painted by Jervis, from pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds. There are also prints of Hogarth's Idle and Industrious Apprentices, and some specimens of ornamental writing. This apartment is represented in the annexed engraving, together with the form of binding an apprentice. In the Chamberlain's parlour are deposited duplicate copies of the honorary freedoms and thanks which have been voted by distinguished personages to the City. More than sixty of them are by the late Mr. Tomkins, the celebrated peasant, of whom there is a fine portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds.

The office of Chamberlain was held in 1693 by Sir Thomas Coddens, who was succeeded in 1703 by Sir William Fitzakerley. Sir George Ludlam was elected in 1718; Samuel Robinson, Esq., in 1727; and Sir John Bosworth, in 1734, when there was a severe contest between the partisans of the ministry, and the independent members of the Livery, which ended in the defeat of the former. This is stated to have been the severest contest ever known, there being at the close of the poll, for Mr. Bosworth, 5212; for Mr. Selwin, 5205.

Mr. Bosworth was subsequently knighted: he was succeeded in 1751, by Sir Thomas Harrison, and in 1765, by Sir S. Jansen, who, resigning his office in 1770, was succeeded by Benjamin Hopkins, Esq., after another very severe contest with the celebrated John Wilkes. In 1779, on the death of Mr. Hopkins, Wilkes was elected; on his death, in 1797, Alderman Sir Watkin Lewis, and Richard Clarke, Esq., were proposed to the Livery, and the latter elected by a very large majority. Mr. Clarke filled the office until his death, beyond his 90th year: he recollected having taken Dr. Johnson to the Judges' dinners, at the Old Bailey. The office was next severely contested by Mr. Alderman Walsham and Sir James Shaw, Bart., when the latter was returned. Sir James held the office until his death in 1843, and was succeeded by Sir W. Heygate, Bart., after a contest with Sir John Pirie, Bart.

Mr. Anthony Brown, the newly-elected Chamberlain, of whom we annex a portrait, has been for many years Alderman of the Ward of Billingsgate; and is, with the exception of Sir Claudius Stephen Hunter, the senior member of the Court of Aldermen. He is the son and the grandson of a liveryman; for upwards of 40 years has been a member of the Corporation, 23 years a magistrate, and served the office of Sheriff in 1825, and Lord Mayor in 1827. The worthy

MR. ALDERMAN BROWN, THE NEWLY ELECTED CHAMBERLAIN.

Alderman is a fluent and well-informed speaker, and has lately distinguished himself in the Court of Common Council by his vindication of the rights of the Livery. He is the principal of the highly respectable firm of Brown, Marten, and Thomas, solicitors, of Mining-lane.

THE NORTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.—The Conservatives have had several meetings, the result of which has been the formation of a Committee to support the interests of Mr. J. T. Clifton, who is a candidate for the representation in the room of Lord Stanley. Mr. Clifton is a general supporter of a Conservative Government, and in favour of protection to agriculture. It is not yet known whether there will be a contest. The nomination is to take place on Friday, the 20th inst., at Lancaster. North Lancashire contains 254 townships, and the number of votes on the present register is 10,337. The Anti-Corn-law League have not yet found a candidate. Mr. C. Townley, of Townley, has been sought after, but has not been found. Mr. Hargreaves, son-in-law of Mr. Brown, who contested the South Division of Lancashire, has been requested, but he has declined. The impression is that there will not be any opposition.

DEATH FROM EATING HAMMOCK.—A little girl, three years old, belonging to Sidney-street, North Shields, died in consequence of eating hamlock. The child had been out in the fields during the day with a little brother, when they had taken the herb. The boy vomited freely, or his life also, in all probability, would have been sacrificed.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XLVIII.

CHRIST CHURCH, ST. GILES'S-IN-THE-FIELDS.

This church is now in course of erection between the east side of the new street, and near the point at which it debouches into High Holborn. The design, by Mr. B. Ferrey, is in the early English style, with a large lancet-headed window over the principal entrance, and a lofty tower and spire at the west-end angle. The material is Kentish rag-stone, with Bath stone mouldings and side dressings in the long and short masonry.

The cost will be defrayed by the munificence of the Church Societies, and the bounty of individual benefactors. The whole church will accommodate one thousand persons; the seats being free, and there being, consequently, no income from pew-rents, the chief anxiety of the committee is to realise an endowment sufficient to secure, for ever, the daily performance of divine worship. For this good and great end, subscriptions are still earnestly solicited. "Whilst, however," add the Committee, "we have good hope that, under God's blessing, adequate means will be supplied by Christian benevolence, we unfeignedly desire not to lay an additional burden on those who have, with such unsparring liberality, already assisted in this work and labour of love."

NEW CHURCH, ST. GILES'S.

The spiritual destitution of the over-peopled parish of St. Giles has long been a subject of deep concern; and we hope that this great effort to rescue the inhabitants (more especially the humbler classes) from their perilous condition, by providing them with additional church accommodation, will be crowned with entire success.

THE EGYPTIAN TREATY.

WHEN war with France was spoken of as an event not impossible, much anxiety was felt as to the safety of our overland communication with India. We were long in establishing it; even now we have not developed all the advantages it will hereafter produce, both to this country and our possessions in the East; and it would have been a misfortune to the world at large if old hatreds and new jealousies between the two great people who are in the van of civilisation should have given a check to one of the most signal triumphs civilisation has produced. This danger was happily averted; and, since the conclusion of the negotiations that produced this fortunate result, an arrangement has been made which places our intercourse with India on a more secure foundation than it ever yet possessed. A treaty has just been concluded, by which we have not merely a permitted passage across the Isthmus of Suez, but an actual sovereignty at one of the chief points of what may now be called the Eastern line of traffic. The port of Suez, it is stated, is ceded to us, and there is now no fear that the policy of the old Pacha of Egypt—long friendly to us, it is true, from reasons of self-interest, but which was no less liable to interruption from passion or caprice—will be departed from. The passage of the Desert is secured; and as for that of the sea, we have long been accustomed to regard the ocean as our highway to all nations. There, we apprehend, we are safe; anything that a French Prince may think, say, or write to the contrary, notwithstanding. But the passage of the Isthmus was more or less of a contingency. If the ruler of Egypt were powerful, which he is, and unfriendly to us, which he is not, he might have annoyed us considerably. If he were weak, however well disposed, he could not have kept in awe those who now serve him as soldiers, but who, disbanded and disorganised, would adopt the profession of robbers with a marvellous facility. In either case, whether Egypt were held by a powerful enemy or a feeble friend, we might be not a little incommoded. Commerce is eminently pacific, and avoids the path that is liable to be crossed by musket balls. Englishmen are never wanting in courage on fit occasions, but a series of skirmishes in a day's journey would be but disagreeable necessities, and to none of our fair countrywomen should we wish any opportunity of proving how well they could emulate the conduct of Lady Sale. In short, rapidity and safety being the two things necessary to that intercourse between distant points, by which steam is doing so much to civilise the world, we rejoice to see them now assured to a locality where both are wanted and where both might have been suspended. The comparatively few miles of sand that divide the seas of two continents are of immense importance; they form a short link in a long chain, to break which would render the whole line useless.

At the present time, when our trade with the great empire of China is expanding to one of export as well as of import—when it is beginning to be felt that our rule of the "dusky millions" of India has not been the best possible either for justice and mercy, or even for the far lower consideration of profit—when the policy of the Governor of India has become the subject of contest between a Ministry and its supporters—it is more than ever necessary that the communication between the ruled in the East, and their rulers in the West, should be as frequent and facile as possible; and in this respect that great worker of material marvels—steam—is going far beyond the most sanguine expectations. Let us compare the present with the past, and we shall see what has been effected; there are many things involved in the change worthy of a little notice.

In the first place, in establishing the Mediterranean as our route to India, we are rather returning to an old system, with greater means of working it out, than creating a new one. For centuries the whole of the western world was supplied with the luxuries of the East by the land traffic that brought them to the shores of the Mediterranean, whence they are dispersed to the north and west throughout the extent of Europe. Alexandria and Cairo were then flourishing, and those were the high and palmy days of Venice; that great commercial city then became a great political power, but her greatness was far less the work of the soldier than of the merchant; and though the poet may look contemptuously on the profession that is silently beneficial, humanizing whole nations with less visible exertion than that with which war desolates a single province, and may censure it as making men cold to the emotions of patriotism, a doubt may be permitted as to whether the poetical point of view is always the true one. It is scarcely true to say that

Knobbling thoughts depart
When men change swords for ledgers,—and desert
The student's bow for gold.

How few, but for commerce, would have the leisure for thinking at all? Men would be engrossed by the savage struggle with earth and the elements for a subsistence little above that of the brute, and where would be the "ennobling thoughts" that such a state could inspire? Commerce actually creates power, and riches, and renown—all that can be required for the page of poet or historian; it did so in the instance of Venice; and the most striking proof of it is, that when her commerce deserted her, she almost literally

Sunk, like a sea-weed, into whence she rose.

The rise and fall of Venice testify alike of the immense importance of such an event as that we are noticing—one that may decide the channel which the trade between the two ends of the earth is to take. And the stream of commerce is one that never fails to enrich the bed through which it runs; it is the realisation of the fabled Pactolus, for its sands are of gold.

The decline of Venice began from the day on which Vasco de Gama weathered the "Cape of Storms," afterwards more auspiciously named of "Good Hope." The route to India was no longer through the Mediterranean: the spirit of maritime enterprise had marked out another track, and though it was long ere the rich and proud republic exhibited the outward marks of decay, it had already attacked her. The source of her greatness was dried up; and at last the visible signs of poverty appeared. It seems to be a principle, invariable in its operation, that when a nation can no longer increase, it must decline. When power does not wax, it must wane; and with the decay of her commerce, the glory of Venice had departed.

Agas again passed, during which the whole of the traffic of Europe with Asia passed round the Cape of Good Hope, crossing two immense oceans. The voyage was long and tedious, but was submitted to as a necessity; it seemed to be forgotten that there had ever been another route, and that however well-adapted the weary waste of waters might be for the conveyance of bulky merchandise, it was a terrible barrier to the intercourse of men. It appeared to be overlooked, also, that human beings have activity and volition, and the power of moving from place to place with a celerity far above what can be imparted to chests of tea and bales of cotton. Other causes contributed to retain the trade to India in the channel it had thus fallen into. As a little-frequented road is always that selected by robbers, for the sake of what they can plunder from those who must pass, so the Mediterranean, deserted as the route to India, became a sea with little more upon it than a kind of coasting-trade; and this trade, down to a very recent period, was continually harassed by pirates, whom the states of Europe, with an extraordinary supineness, suffered to rob and murder their subjects with impunity. A voyage up the Mediterranean seemed very likely to terminate in an Algerine prison, it was not attempted. But the suppression of this organised piracy rendering this voyage safe, and the improvements in steam making it speedy, men began to remember their geography, and to think that many months of time, and many thousand miles of distance might be saved, by adopting the old route, or one not very different. It was at first talked of, then tried, and at last succeeded. The principal difficulty was the short land-journey that could not be avoided. Luckily for us, Egypt was governed by a man more shrewd and less bigoted than Eastern rulers generally are, and he gave us every facility; and now the system of transit is so perfect that the arrivals and departures are almost as regular as those of the daily mails. The treaty just concluded secures the system thus established from being disturbed.

The European intercourse with India will henceforth divide itself into two different channels, each having its advantages. Passengers, and those articles of trade that contain great value in small compass, such as gold, jewels, or perfumes, and some of the rarer fabrics of India, will be conveyed by the shorter and quicker route: bulky merchandise that could not be shipped, unshipped, and reshipped, without enormous expense, will still go by the Cape. In fact, one will be the mail train and the other the luggage train of the communication between Europe and the East.

We can scarcely yet see what results the extension of this intercourse will produce. The Egyptians are sadly degenerated in the skill and energy that could alone have built the Pyramids, and raised the walls of Thebes. But their soil is fertile still, and the Nile spreads its fattening waters over it as of old; the enterprise and science of Europe may again make the land that Joseph ruled, the granary of nations. The several ports of the South of Europe will be the stages of the road to the empire of the Mozambique. Gibraltar and Malta are our baiting places on the route to Perkin; and may not even Venice regain, by the re-opening of the road, something of what she lost when it was closed? The gleams of a brighter fortune may be few and faint; but they will be "sunshine still," and therefore welcome, though they but remind her of splendour departed. It is not impossible that more solid results may be seen. Late accounts speak of the repairing and refitting of many of the palaces which Child Harold left "rotting on the shore," and which have been poeticaly decaying ever since. Who shall say that the Bucefaut will not be launched again; "Tasso's Echoes" too may awake once more, though they will sound strangely amid the rattle of the railway that is to connect the gorgeous old city of the sea, in the most matter-of-fact manner, with the main land. But in this too there is life and vitality, and therefore we hail it. The spirit of commerce is abroad; it may be to revive old greatness as well as to create new; in either case it is a good work, for which much has been done by the conclusion of the Egyptian Treaty.

THE ROYAL SILVER WINE-COOLER.

We have (by permission) availed ourselves of the opportunity presented by the memorable occasion detailed in our last number, to present to our readers a representation of that magnificent item of the Royal Plate—the stupendous Wine-Cooler, manufactured by Messrs. Russell and Bridge, for his Majesty King George the Fourth. This superb vessel was modelled by Flaxman, and is a fine specimen of his truly classic taste. The precious material is silver, gilt. The design consists of a base of rock-work, studded with star-fishes and crustacea, exquisitely chased and frosted. Upon this is a breaker, or wave, of bright gold, bearing the huge basin, or Wine-Cooler, of oval form. Around the exterior is represented a vineyard of wreathed vines, the leaves dead, and the grapes bright; with recesses, in which are represented scenes from the history of Bacchus. The two ends, or handles of the vessel, as they may be termed, are a lion and unicorn. The chasing and other ornamental work is stated to have occupied two years; it is so capacious as to hold 42 gallons, and two full-grown persons may sit in it, without inconvenience. It is usually kept in the State Dining Room at Windsor Castle, beneath a plate glass enclosure.

At the recent christening of Prince Alfred this costly vessel was placed in the Waterloo Gallery, and filled with claret negus, which was served to the distinguished company during the evening; the dispensing implement being a large silver ladle, with a massive handle, and bowl in the form of a nautilus shell.

Two new churches have been erected in the diocese of Norwich, both of which will be consecrated next week by the Lord Bishop. The one at Lakenham is dedicated to St. Mark, and the other at Walpole is dedicated to St. Edmund.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The arrangements for the approaching festival are now in a state of forwardness, and it is likely to equal, as point of musical attraction, any former one. The "Messiah," of course, takes its accustomed place in the selection—and to the first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation" will be added a "Psalm of Praise," by Mendelssohn, and the Overture of "Israel in Egypt" will enrich the selection of the performance. One entire morning will be devoted to the Overture of "Samson."

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—This favourite place of amusement is again to be opened for a few nights, commencing on Monday, and arrangements have been made to give defat to the undertaking. Among other popular favourites are engaged Mr. W. H. W. and G. Robinson, Miss Agnes Taylor, T. Matthews, the celebrated Thora; Kilar, the Harpist; and a splendid corps de ballet.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Tuesday.

In writing to you to-day, I must first dispose of some unconnected "odds and ends" of news floating on the surface of society.

The arrival of the King and Queen of Naples, a forerunner of the marriage of the Duke d'Aumale, with their niece, the Princess of Salerno, is immediately to take place. The royal family of France will thus have more than one renewed link with the Bourbon branch of Naples. But it is not in that direction that you must see the policy and gratified pride of Louis Philippe—his establishing a triple link through King Leopold, the Duke de Nemours, and the Princess Clementina, with the Queen of England, is the triumph of his diplomacy. Ehlenchberger, the celebrated Danish poet, the friend of Goethe, Schiller, Schlegel, and of Madame de Staël, is in Paris. As he is the inspired interpreter of the terrible and romantic Mythology of the Scandinavians, and as they can understand his poetry but little in French, and not at all, of course, in Danish, our ladies contemplate this "vates" with profound admiration not unmingled with awe. The "Poëta," which has been wilder and more potent in its influence in Paris, than the extraordinary dancing epidemic of the middle ages, is menaced by a total eclipse. All the quinquennials of society are absorbed by the news of the novel wonders of that magnetism which rules both body and soul. Very recently, Montini, the celebrated ornament of the Boulevard, after throwing several young ladies into a mesmeric sleep, sat down and played on the piano. Hardly was the first note heard than all the fair victims of magnetic necromancy, who were previously seated, rose up, and without moving from the spot on which they stood, twisted and turned their bodies in the most eccentric and extraordinary manner. They bent and agitated themselves in every direction, following the modulations of the music; their movements only ceasing with the sound of the instrument. Need I say what a resource this will be in Parisian society next winter; particularly at the royal and ministerial balls, which are so crowded with the omnium gatherum, that you are compelled to dance only in the "dancing perpendicular."

The favour which fashion, particularly in Paris, accords to the waters of Germany—making them the rendezvous of the cream of the European nobility, whether of genius, talent, or rank—remains one of the signs of the colonization of one of the most distinguished of these gatherings, dedicated to Health, but still more so to flirtation and gaming. It is now some years past that the saloon of Paris opened in the presence of a Prince of the Rhine Confederation. He was considered "the glass of fashion and the mould of form"—he took the highest rank in the ladies' opinion, amidst the dazzling array of serene highnesses and noble dukes; indeed he was the Magnifico Apollo of all the Parisian elegantes. He was said to all have got—the beautiful Baronne de R***, just become a widow. A dual throne was in perspective, and all went merrily on. However, suddenly the Prince departed, and the fair widow waited. Some time elapsed, when the heart-struck dame, in traversing the left bank of the "beautiful Rhine," betwixt her and her Prince Ferdinand—the decided woman presenting herself at the royal court—vain delusion! The Prince's dominion was a village of small dimensions—the palace a cottage with green shutters! She opened an audience; finally upbraided him for his cold estrangement and sudden flight. "Pardon me," said the Prince, "my money was gone—my Parisian expenditures were ten years of my very limited income. Here my sceptre requires but little to support its dignity. My domains are bordered by polder water on the east, by polder water and bubbling spring and silver rivulet on the west, by the ruins of that ancient castle of Franciscan; and on the north, by the blue hills, topped by that dilapidated baronial keep." "A warm and bubbling fountain and rivulet," exclaimed the Baronne, "why, it's a perfect Pactolus, with gold in its waters! It will bring fortune and happiness. We must become more wealthy than the Grand Duc de Baden, of Hesse, or Darmstadt!" She returned to Paris, pined on the beauty of the spot; the marvellous virtues of the bubbling fountain and the silver rivulet. "I will take you thither, my friends!" All the fashion of Paris flocked to swallow the Prince's mineral spring. Initiates followed in the wake of the distinguished visitors, and the waters of M—— have become celebrated for their peculiar salutary quality; and the hitherto unconsidered domain of the Prince rejoices in a prestige as brilliant as the profits are acceptable.

Of all the sleights in social and political jugglery and necromancy, Louis Philippe is the first without compare—without a rival. Last year it was absolutely necessary to reflect a little doubt on his throne, which the wild and unsettled lingers of France, his former partners in conspiracy, as doggedly continued as do the legitimate Princes and Potentates of Europe. To effect this desired sheet, Louis Philippe managed to bring over to our arm, the grateful Governor of Algeria; a circumstance the more unlooked for, as, in spite of her exalted rank and age, she was the Queen of a nation of hereditary enemies, notoriously paid and fed. But this year this visit was to be returned. To be able to do so with impunity, Louis Philippe had to grandly his subjects, first of all with at least the semblance of insult to the British, and to tickle their vanity with some war carried on in spite of them and against their interests. All this has been effected to a title. The strategy worked up at Othman, and in the King's own family, by the naval pambler of his son and his subsequent appointment to the command of the coast of Morocco—all the warlike equilibriums and overt acts which kept Europe breathless and aghast—all have been dispelled in a moment—just as we are in a novel or a play, at the will of the author; and Louis Philippe is smiling, and no later than the pit of next month is asserted by the best informed. The wags are laughing before-hand at the agonies of "the new shoes that will pinch"—at the coming agonies, I repeat, of the thirty monarch. His such enemy, the Emperor of Russia, advanced down his treasure in continuous streams, during his week's stay in England (giving 1000 guineas to the Queen's servants alone!) so as to render the mission truly glorious to the Citizen King. It is said he has taken, for the occasion, £100,000 out of his enormous £1,000,000. Louis Philippe, however, now defies fate and fortune, as he has done, for years, the dangers of assassination.

The great Parisian wrote his Provinciales in vain. The Jesuitic spirit is gradually but securely grasping society. What escapes the Jesuits is considered the lawful prey of monks and nuns, of

"Eremites and friars,

White, black, and grey, with all their trumpery."

Whilst in society every principle, moral and religious, one can cling to, is unsettled by the wild and frantic passions and fashions of the hour. The disappointed men, and the few who remain in the world, throw themselves with fanaticism, and as their only refuge, into the dark mysteries of associations, and secret religions, the secret links of which are encompassing all classes, and, by an unseen power, holding them in mental thralldom.

As regards its mode of action, the great Content of the Universalities, in Paris, may be cited as an example. It offers a residence to all ladies arriving, unaccompanied, to that vast city—it is, in truth, a refuge for the females of every family that stand in need of a secret home.

There is not a single house, inhabited by rich or poor, nor individual, be he either peer or peasant, where this hourly-extending power has got its devoted agents. Houses are open in every quarter, in which, under a clerical guise, all ranks are received, and imbibe the poisonous ailment, artfully administered, combined with all in every emergency. Numbers of men and women, apostles of the creed, daily arrive from every part of France, to assist in the great work, which appears to be conducted by a power as formidable as it is potent. No source is left unexplored. The Universalities of Dijon—the Sisters of Christian Charity of Nancy have been their emissaries, called by the Vicar of Notre Dame, or commissioned by bishops well known by their exaggerated zeal in the cause of the former Catholicism of a by-gone age, and the prostitution and command over the living intellect. Under the plea of watching over the universal morality, the "holy sisters" undertake to receive and place domestics in families, work-women in factories, ladies' maids for the service of the higher classes; and all the ramifications of society are filled with their creatures, who are sworn to uphold the system of what is properly styled, Christian slavery. If it be ascertained that certain houses fulfil not their promise, in upholding, at all risks, this worse than the secret societies of the Inquisition, unknown punishments are the result. Families who employ the profratres of the nuns, who keep up constant correspondence with their patrons, are constantly exposed to reconnoissance and annoyance, as regards their servants.

This state of moral Abolition making such bold and rapid strides, it is to be wondered at that the Government does not, with the arm of legalty and constitutional power, at once put an end to this vicious principle of educating, for a certain purpose, the minds of its population.

To show that this spirit is as daring as ever, it is only necessary to mention the discovery just made at Geneva, of a French Catholic gentleman, of the name of Gailard, who embraced the Protestant faith, and soon after disappeared, and was thought to have been assassinated. It is now discovered that the Jesuits had laid violent hands upon this gentleman, and kept him incarcerated in a cell of their convent, at Chambéry.

FRANCE.

From Paris this week we receive the important intelligence of the conclusion of a treaty of peace between France and Morocco. This news was first received by a telegraphic despatch, dated Bayonne, Sept. 15th, in the following terms:—Transmitted by His Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville to the Minister of Marine, and by M. de Goltzberg and de Nyon to the Minister for Foreign Affairs:—

"TANGIER, 16th.—The Moorish Government has demanded peace. The fleet arrived at Tanger this day. The Governor of the town came on board to renew his demand. Our conditions have been signified and accepted, and the treaty signed. During the day the Consulate General has been re-established, and its flag saluted by the town. Orders to cease all hostility, and to evacuate the island of Mogadore, will be despatched this afternoon."

We are happy to say that the announcement in this despatch has since been fully confirmed. Official accounts have been received by our Government, which mention that, according to despatches from Mr. Bulwer, her Majesty's Minister at Madrid, dated the 11th inst., and received in London on Wednesday, the treaty for the cessation of hostilities between France and Morocco had been signed, the terms being the same in substance as those offered in the original ultimatum. This intelligence was brought from Gibraltar in the Hecla steamer, by Colonel Barrie, of the British Legation in Madrid.

Before the Hecla left Gibraltar a French steamer had been despatched to Mogadore, to order the immediate evacuation of the island of which the French troops have been in possession since the bombardment of the town.

The Paris papers are almost exclusively occupied with this news, and it is satisfactory to perceive, that in spite of the recent excitement, it has been received in the best spirit, and there appears to be a pretty general feeling of pleasure at the termination of a dispute which might have led to a war with England.

The Journal des Débats treats the result which has been obtained in a moderate and sensible spirit. It says—"The Emperor of Morocco has given proofs of more good sense than was expected from him. He has obeyed the councils of prudence and of wisdom. He has demanded and signed the peace which alone could save him from destruction, more or less remote, but inevitable. The French flag (of the consulate) flew once more peacefully and gloriously on the great square of Tangier. At a period such as we live in, when peace, happily for the human race and for the cause of civilisation, is the principle of the policy of the great powers, such a result is worth more than several victories. France has done better than obtain peace—she has conquered it. She cannot, whatever may be said, regret the price she has paid for it, because her influence in Africa, and her consideration throughout the entire world, have been considerably increased. If peace had been concluded when it was first offered, the annexion of French dominion in Africa would have doubted, perhaps, of the first resolution which the French Government had formed to make itself respected. And, on the other hand, it might have been said, that France could not engage in war without compromising the general peace. At present, neither of these suppositions is possible. The victories gained by the French arms on the territory and on the coast of Africa have been a lesson for Morocco, because they have proved that France was determined to secure her possessions in Africa, and that she possessed the means of doing so. A warning for Europe, because they proved that France and the French Government inspired the most doubtful allies with sufficient respect, and their sincere allies with sufficient confidence, to permit her to undertake a serious war without changing the relations of the powers of the first order. France, therefore, is indebted for peace in Africa to the success of her arms, and for peace in Europe to the moderation of her Government, and to the confidence she inspires."

As the settlement of this dispute was considered in Paris as an event of national importance, the committee of the journalists perhaps deserve less attention than usual; but it is nevertheless gratifying that the news has not excited any morose or ill-natured feelings. The event was deemed of so much importance by Government, that a salute was fired by the cannon of the Hotel des Invalides in celebration of it on Monday morning at eight o'clock.

It is stated officially that the expenses of the expedition against Morocco, amount already to upwards of 20,000,000.

On Monday morning orders were forwarded by telegraph from Paris to Rochefort, Cherbourg, Lorient, Toulon, and Brest, to suspend all the armaments proceeding in those harbours. On the same day written instructions were forwarded to the Maritime Prefects, directing them to prepare for the reception of the ships of the squadron now on their way home. Two frigates and one corvette, however, are to be armed, and to sail for the coast of Africa, where they are to remain under the orders of Captain R. H. Boscawen, the commander of the station.

Another event of some consequence has occurred—the return of Marshal Bugeaud to Algeria. He re-entered that town on the 5th inst., with considerable pomp. He was received by all the military and civil authorities, and nearly all the population. From the place of landing to the Government House, the road was lined on either side by the African militia. During the procession the guns of the forts and vessels in the harbour fired salutes. The reception of the marshal by the people was the most enthusiastic, and from all quarters he was greeted with the loud cry of "Long live the Hero of Jilly," mingled with "Vive le Roi." The standards taken from the enemy, and the famous pavilion, were publicly exposed. The tent was erected on the Esplanade Bab-el-Oued, and has been constantly, ever since, filled with the curious—amongst whom were many Africans. The tent is of immense dimensions—its form is circular; it is made of two parts of cotton, and the inside is gorgeously decorated; in it will be given the banquet offered by the inhabitants to the marshal. The importance of the salute of the parade of the arm of the Emperor of Morocco is not justly appreciated either in France or England. This emblem of command formerly belonged to Moul-Soliman, the predecessor of Moul-Abd-el-Rahman, and was held in the highest veneration—in short, it may be considered the Royal standard of Morocco. The marshal looked greatly fatigued, his manners were rather desuaves, and his mind seemed occupied with weightier matters than those which surrounded him.

A seizure was lately made of a number of letters written by Abd-el Kader to the different tribes in Algeria, imploring them, in the name of the Prophet, to abandon the French and join the holy standard. The Marshal is of opinion that, had he been beaten on the 14th, the greater part of the friendly tribes would have openly taken up arms against him. It is only by force of arms that they remain obedient to the will of France, but on the first reverse of fortune, they will become its greatest enemies.

The Moniteur Algérien publishes a letter of congratulation received by Marshal Bugeaud from Louis Philippe on the battle of Jilly.

The Algérien contains news from Mogadore, of the 31st ult. On the 25th, the brig Vierge and Pindar put to sea, the former for Barcelona, and the other for Cadix. As the Vierge steamer was towing out the Vierge, she was struck by two cannon-shots, fired by the battery of the north-east. The ship of the line Indefatigable, the steam-frigate Montcalm, and the corvette Egérie arrived the same day in the roads, and were shortly afterwards followed by the British steamer Vesuvius. "Judge of our surprise," says the correspondent of the Algérien, "when we saw the English flag saluted with cannon-shot by the same battery that had fired on the Vierge. The Vesuvius immediately left her anchorage to take a station beyond the range of the Moroccan artillery, and the next day she set out for Rabat to comply to the Kalis of the Emperor of the Maroc offered to the British flag." On the 31st, when the Montcalm came to receive the orders of the commander of the station, she was likewise fired upon by the same battery; the only one spared during the bombardment, because it rather could molest the island of Mogadore than the vessels entering the harbour.

The French papers mention the death of M. Camille Perier, a Peer of France, and brother to the late Casimir Perier, the Minister. He was 63 years of age. M. Camille Perier was Auditor in the Council of State under the republic, and perfect for some years under the restoration, but, being dismissed from the latter situation, he took his place as a member of the Chamber of Deputies. In 1839, he was one of the first deputies in Paris who protested against the violation of engagements by the Crown, and he gave his support to the new Government. During his brother's ministry, he afforded him all the assistance in his power.

"The coat of arms of M. Guizot," says the Constitutionnel, "pointed on the panels of his elegant equipage, has recently undergone a modification. The broad triangular shield, to which was suspended the Cross of Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, has been replaced by the magnificent collar of the Golden Fleece, of which M. Guizot is a member. The famous motto, recte brevescunt tempora, has been preserved."

The arrival of the Duke de Bordeaux at Milan appears to cause some uneasiness to the French Government, and it is stated that General Schicanihi has been sent to that city to observe his conduct. The Duke had been at Venice. His having been recommended to him, and he appears to excel in the art of swimming, having several times swam without resting from the Mole to the Lido, a distance of three miles.

Letters from Rio Janeiro of the 9th of July announce that the Raine Blanche frigate, on board of which Admiral Dupont Thourau is returning to France, was daily expected in that harbour.

A letter from Toulon, dated September 12th, gives the following account of the movements of the Prince de Joinville:—"This morning, at ten o'clock, the war-brig Argus, Captain Jeandron, who took so active a part at Tenger and Mogadore, entered our roads. The Argus only lost two men, one at the attack of Mogadore, the other at the island. The Argus sailed from Cadix on the 4th instant. The Prince de Joinville reached that city on board the steam corvette Piston, and was joined on the 3rd September, by the ships of the line Suffren, Jemmapes, and Timon; the frigate Ja Rele Paire, and the brig Cassard and Pandour. The ship of the line Indefatigable also arrived the same day and was immediately placed under the orders of the Prince, whose flag continued hoisted on board the Piston. All these vessels expected to return shortly to Toulon. The Prince was on the 7th instant in good health and high spirits."

SPAIN.

We find by the accounts from Madrid of the 11th instant, that the Carlists have now carried the elections at Saragossa, Pampeluna, Zamora, Tordesillas, Segorik, Montorn, and several other places. At Salamanca they had the majority for the first two days, but a strong effort made by the Government defeated them at the moment of victory. At Piacencia, the Carlists, who came to the poll under the leadership of the prince, were very near being triumphant; and in several other important towns they have come out with a strength and boldness which have taken the Government quite by surprise. In all these struggles the priests are the active leaders.

The Carlistas, alluding to the presumption shown by the Carlists in the elections, says:—

"If the Carlist party have shown much arrogance, it is rather the fault of the Government than that of the friends of the constitutional throne, for they have never sought to triumph but by the medium of insurrection. If some members of the clergy have forgotten their duties, the competent tribunals will know how to inflict a well-merited chastisement."

One of the journals says that Government are directing troops towards Navarre, and suppose from that that Carlist outbreaks are contemplated in that province.

M. Martinez de la Rosa has not yet decided on accepting the portfolio of foreign affairs.

PORTUGAL.

The Lisbon letters of the 16th instant announce that the recent excitement had been succeeded by apathy, and nothing of political interest was stirring. The Ministers were devising means to emerge from their financial embarrassments. It is stated that urgent entreaties have been made to the King to induce him to accept of the command-in-chief, but his Majesty has given a decided refusal.

The Chambers are to open on the 30th inst., and not on the 15th, as was stated. The Government hitherto having met with no offer for the tobacco contract with the condition imposed of an advance of four thousand contos (one million sterling), and being entirely destitute of resources, is compelled to convocate the Parliament.

The Montrose, which had arrived at Lisbon, brought the news that the French squadron was in Cadix, awaiting orders from France. It was reported that Prince de Joinville intended paying Lisbon a visit.

GREECE.

Our letters from Athens announce the curious fact that dissensions have already sprung up in the newly-formed Ministry, which it is thought will be fatal to it.

These differences are said to arise from the exigencies of Mr. Metaxa, who, being supported by the Peloponnesian Government, and dissatisfied with his two colleagues, Travassos and Bibi, required the appointment of Caramis to the Navy Department, and of Zografos to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, so as completely to concentrate in his hands the whole influence of the Government. Mr. Metaxa, however, a man of too much energy to give way to intrigues. The Ministry, thus dissatisfied, could not attend to the business of the state, and had not yet published a single act of any importance.

Another fact calculated to create uneasiness is the resignation of General Kallergis. It will be remembered that General Kallergis took the Greek troops under his command on the morning of the 12th September, at Athens; that while actually performing his duty to his country, he immediately put himself under the orders of the Council of State, assembled extraordinarily an hour after the Palace was blockaded by troops and citizens; that neither then or afterwards, while General Kallergis commanded the garrison of Athens, and guard of the National Assembly, was his conduct in the smallest degree impugned; and that at the close of the National Assembly he received his thanks, together with a sword from the citizens of Athens, when, also, the rank of general and aide-de-camp was personally conferred on him by King Otto.

Kallergis, however, has been so much interfered with, that, as above stated, he has thought it his duty to resign. Strange to say, the resignation of a man who has performed such signal services, has been accepted by King Otto with the utmost calmness. All the Liberal press, however, justly protest against the dry course of the Royal Ordinance, in which the services rendered by that distinguished officer during the last eleven months were not even acknowledged by a few flattering expressions. Kallergis had retired among his family, at Argos, to avoid being present at the celebration of the anniversary of that revolution. Previous to his resignation, Kallergis issued a farewell address, couched in energetic terms. In one part of it he said: "A soldier, and no politician, I have never wished to take part in political differences. My orders were, the maintenance of the public tranquillity, and these I have obeyed to the letter."

Our readers will recollect that we gave a portrait of this distinguished general in No. 107.

In the editor of the Épita (Hopl) Athens newspaper makes these remarks on the subject of General Kallergis:—"One single sentence we should like to add to General Kallergis's farewell, since his modesty has not allowed him to refer to it. We would say to the few who are momentary enemies of a man, have wronged that worthy man—'Friends, when you enter the church of St. Irene, on the approaching anniversary of the 12th of September, to offer up your prayers to the ever blessed God, who, partaking of no human passion, tries the hearts of his creatures, and regards them in righteousness, do not fail to cast your eyes upon that sword which, eleven months ago, was suspended in that sanctuary of the Most High; a feat of regret will fill your eyes. That sword you yourself presented to Kallergis as a memorial of your gratitude, and before the Most High it appears as a testimony against you.'"

MUSKIE.
The Bremen Gazette has an article from the Polish frontier, of 3d September, which states that the Emperor Nicholas has approved of the plan of the Minister of War for very rigorous offensive operations in the Caucasus, and that he is resolved if not to make the campaign in person, at least to be in the vicinity of the theatre of war. Count Nees-Bode is shortly expected to return to St. Petersburg; it is affirmed that he has communicated to the English Cabinet the decided intentions of the Emperor respecting the war in the Caucasus, and has obtained the assurance that the assistance sent to the rebels by English agents from Constantinople shall cease.

CASE OF GOOD HOPE.
We have received Cape of Good Hope papers to the 11th of July. They give a satisfactory account of the progress of affairs in that distant colony. Part of the new road over the Cape coast, and the bridge thereon across the Salt River, which have for a considerable time furnished employment for the convicts in the colony, have been formally opened, accompanied with the general rejoicing of the whole population of Cape Town and neighbouring districts. There had been a little disturbance in the frontier, owing to the arrest of the Kaffer chief Botman, who had screened one of his subjects concerned in a robbery, and the military had to secure the neighbourhood of the fort and village of Beaufort, as the natives made it a frequent resort.

The expected introduction of henty immigrants excited much satisfaction, and it is thought will have an important effect in bringing the Cape into more general notice and appreciation in the mother country. At Natal there had been no political occurrences of interest, and the trade of the new settlement with the older colony was steadily increasing.

An enterprising gentleman of the name of Smith had performed the journey into Kaffrland, and made a personal examination of the route from the Buffalo to the Umzimvubu. The result of his journey has been the establishment of a trading station in Hines's territory, and the opening of a direct maritime communication with the Kaffer country.

UNITED STATES.
ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.—Since our last publication the Acadia has arrived, after a short passage of less than thirteen days from Boston. The Acadia left Halifax on the 3rd, and on the 9th exchanged salutes with the British, a five days' out. We do not hear that the Great Western had reached New York. The dates of our arrivals by this arrival are—New York, 3rd ultimo; Washington and Montreal, 5th; Toronto, 27th; Vera Cruz, 8th; and Boston and Baltimore, 1st and 3rd instant.

The Acadia, when in lat. 39° 2' N., long. 32° 5' W., about 1120 miles from Liverpool, on Monday, the 9th, about one p.m., passed the Bermuda, and exchanged signals of rockets, blue lights, and a salute of guns. She was then running with a fair wind, and would, no doubt, make Halifax in a very quick passage.

News by this arrival is insignificant. The Presidential election appears still to be the chief topic of interest at New York. Mr. Tyler has created some excitement, by withdrawing from the contest, but he addresses his adherents to vote for Polk and Dallas, "the democratic ticket," as the Yankees call it. Mr. Polk, who opposed Mr. Tyler, has given his sentiments in regard to the tariff in these terms:—"I am in favour of a tariff for revenue, such a one as will yield a sufficient amount to the treasury to defray the expenses of the Government, economically administered. In adjusting the details of a revenue tariff, I have heretofore sanctioned such moderate discriminating duties as would produce the amount of revenue needed, and at the same time afford reasonable incidental protection to our home industry. I am opposed to a tariff for protection merely, and not for revenue."

Another destructive fire had occurred in Philadelphia, and said to be the act of incendiaries.

A dreadful hurricane and flood have visited the Wisconsin territory. We learn from the Green Bay Republican, that on the 8th ult. a hurricane, accompanied with rain and hail, swept over Brown and Calumet counties with such fury, that in the space of twenty minutes property was destroyed to the value of 20,000 dollars. Houses, barns, bridges, fences, and trees were uprooted and blown about like chaff; and in many places the crops of every kind were flattened and destroyed. Trees, four and five feet in diameter, were twisted off at Buck Creek, and at Sautter River all the large trees for the distance of half a mile in the direction of the bay shore were either torn up or blown down. Every bridge between Twin River and Green Bay, and two-thirds of those between Green Bay and Fond du Lac, were swept away.

By the last accounts from Nauvoo the city was quiet.

There had been reports of the appointment of Smith's son, a mere lad, as a prophet, but they are unfounded. Sidney Rigdon had returned to the city from Pittsburgh, and preached. Samuel Smith, a brother of the late prophet, is now also dead. Rigdon, it is said, will be chosen to lead the Mormon flock.

There are few widows of the Smith family now living in Nauvoo, or the Holy City; the mother of all, and the wives of the late Jos. Hiram, and their two brothers. Accessions to the Mormon community to be made. Their temple is steadily going up, in its unique form and shape. The style of architecture is of the pure Mormon order.

According to the New York papers, Mexico is on the eve of another revolution. A letter from that city, dated 21st July, contains the extraordinary announcement that Santa Anna and the officers of the army have agreed to suspend the functions of the Constitutional Government during the war in Texas, leaving the supreme control of the republic in the hands of General Santa Anna, with power to force contributions of men and money to sustain the war. It was considered probable that the National Congress would be summarily dismissed by the President. There was no material alteration in commercial affairs at New York.

The advice from Canada mention that Charles Metcalfe has, at last, completed an Administration, but the members of it are not yet mentioned officially. Mr. Morris is spoken of as the Receiver-General; Mr. Merritt, as Inspector-General; Mr. D. B. Papineau as Commissioner of Crown Lands; Mr. Chabot, member for Quebec; Mr. Smith, and Mr. Metcalfe are variously spoken of as Attorney and Solicitor-General. It is stated that Mr. Sherwood will be Solicitor-General for Canada West.

The crops of both east and west Canada are most abundant, and in most parts of the western portion the harvest was a very forward state.

A large and destructive fire has visited Toronto. It broke out in Metcalfe and Church's own brewery, in Lot-avenue, which was consumed, with three dwellings. From thence it communicated with a large brick block of dwellings in Young-street, which was in flames when our informant left. The wind was strong from the east, and the fire had caught a number of times on the west side of Young-street, but, by great exertions of the militia, was got under.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Royal Mail Company's east India steamer Ty has arrived at Southampton, with passengers from the different West India Islands at the following dates:—Trinidad and Demerara, August 3; Barbadoes, August 4; Antigua, August 7; St. Lucia, St. Vincent's, and Jamaica, August 9; and Dominica, August 11. This packet, as was anticipated, would be the case, brings no intelligence from Mexico, but from Havannah there are dates to August 6.

The news contained in these papers presents only a local interest. The excitement respecting the alteration of the foreign sugar duties had not much abated, and ministers continued to be true to their subject to the home Government. The guano measure appears to have been introduced into several of the islands with some drastic success, as far as can be judged by the short period to which the experiments extend.

The Jamaica Despatch commences its summary with the gratifying assurance that the first three days of the anniversary of negro emancipation had passed off in the city of Kingston and its vicinity, as peaceably as could have been desired. Rivalries of various kinds had been indulged in, but no boisterous demonstrations of any sort, or breaches of public order, had occurred among the workpeople.

The Tweed, royal mail steamer, arrived at Southampton on Wednesday. The Tweed left Jamaica on the 23d August; Demerara, 17th; Trinidad, 22nd; Barbadoes, 25th; Grenada, 26th; St. Thomas's, 30th; and Royal, 11th Sept. The chief news from this steamer is, that at Guadeloupe, on August 25th, a dreadful fire broke out, destroying fifty-six large mercantile stores, also the custom-house and other buildings, to the value of 300,000 francs.

NEW ZEALAND.
Accounts from New Zealand state that on the 15th of February an interview took place between Governor Fitzroy and the New Zealand chiefs concerned in the massacre at Wairua. After a request to hear from them their own account of the affair, which was complied with by Rauparaha, his Excellency having deliberated for some time, addressed the natives to the effect that, as the English had in the first instance been in the wrong, and the New Zealanders had been betrayed into unlawful acts both by their ignorance of English law, and by the great provocation they had received, no punishment should follow their offences. He concluded by assuring them that he would punish all attempts on the part of the English to wrong the natives, and exhorted the chiefs in their turn to exercise their influence to prevent the natives from any similar infringement of their mutual rights.

THE FRENCH AT TAHITI.—FURTHER INSULTS UPON BRITISH SUBJECTS.

The Sydney Morning Herald, of May 4, contains the following account of the arrest of Captain Ray, late of the Challenger, and of Captain Dally, of the Shamrock, supplied by the former gentleman to that journal. The statement is headed "Tyranny of the French at Tahiti," from which it would appear that the conduct of the French authorities at the island had at that period raised an unfavorable impression on the minds of the English.

"The following narrative will show the tyranny of the French at Tahiti, to foreigners, especially to Englishmen, since their occupation of that island. About the beginning of the month of February last, Captain Dally and myself were walking along the beach at Tahiti, and when nearly opposite the French barracks, we were surprised to see a French drummer beating the general alarm, without bat, shoes, or stockings, and marching up and down the beach, and a bugle sounding the alarm. Soldiers, too, were seen coming from all directions, as well as seamen belonging to the different men of war, all arranging their accoutrements as they ran, and seeming in dismay, for no one appeared to be able to assign any reason for the mustering of the troops in such a hurry. Some said that the natives had risen, and others that the Challenger (the schooner the French Government had bought for $2000 but a short time previously), which the Government had sent to the other side of the island, for the purpose of capturing several opposing chiefs, had been taken by them and that they had murdered a part of the French crew. The latter report appeared to be the one generally credited, as it was understood that those chiefs would not deliver themselves up quietly to their oppressors. After remaining about ten minutes witnessing this martial movement, Capt. Dally and myself walked to the Washington Hotel, kept by a person named Segar, an American, who we found playing at backgammon with a person named Darling, and to whom we related what had transpired; and of our belief of the rumor as to the capture of the Challenger. These were the only individuals in the house at the time and also when we left, which was only a few minutes afterwards; when we again strolled towards the beach as far as the barracks, and on our way to Mr. Tobby's house, with whose family we had promised to take tea, I was surprised by Marchmont, the commissioner of police, calling to me, apparently in a great rage, and saying he wanted to speak to me. I immediately went under the verandah of his house, and Captain Dally walked on a few paces. The commissioner then asked me what was the reason for my raising the reports on the beach of the schooner's capture, and the murder of the crew by the natives? I denied having done so, and said I would call Captain Dally to prove to him that I had not been the author of the rumor. Marchmont, nevertheless, disbelieved me, and said, 'If you do not give me up within half an hour the name of the author of the report, I will have you arrested.' I told him he might do as he pleased in that respect; that I was not the author of the report, neither did I know who was; and that I had casually heard it on the beach, and had only repeated it. I then asked him who his informant was, and he said the author, and he told me it was Darling (the person I had seen at the hotel, and who is the son of a missionary). I then called Captain Dally back, and on his coming to the house, Marchmont asked him as to the truth of my assertion, and Captain Dally confirmed what I had said; immediately upon hearing which, Marchmont said that he would have Captain Dally also arrested, if he did not comply with his order to give up the name of the author within half an hour. I then told the commissioner where we should be found if he wanted to arrest us, and then left him. A little before seven p.m. we were waited upon by five gens d'armes, with orders from Marchmont to come to his residence to answer 'a very grave charge.' We were then made prisoners, and escorted to that worthy's residence, where we found him at tea, alone. He then said that he had received a letter from the governor, stating that if we did not give up the author of the report, we were at once to be sent prisoners on board the French frigate L'Uranie. Captain Dally then asked who were our accusers, and what was the nature of the accusation against us? Marchmont said he had 'a very grave charge, in writing, against us,' from two persons. Captain Dally then said, if there is to be an inquiry in the case, have the goodness to read the charge against us and take our answers thereto in writing. At this Marchmont appeared confused, and said that he had not a written accusation, and if he had said so it was a mistake. We, on hearing this, both declined making any further reply to his interrogatories, unless he consented to take them down in writing, as we expressed a fear that he was very forgetful of what he said or heard, and that he, in consequence, might make statements on the following day which had no foundation in truth. Marchmont, without further remark, made out an order for our conveyance to L'Uranie, as prisoners, and we were forthwith conducted to the Port-officer, where, finding no boat at hand, the gens d'armes were directed to lodge us in the estabouak or gaol. To this we strongly objected, but not being able to speak to the guards, we were in a dilemma, and we requested a Mr. Whitfield, who was with us, to return to Marchmont, and state to him that the prison was not a fit place to confine us in, inasmuch as it was a lathouse hole, with no fresh air, and plenty of mosquitoes; and there was a man for killing his wife, and many native delinquents, confined therein, whilst neither bedding nor the smallest possible comfort were within its walls. Marchmont was, however, unmoved, and said he could not help us to better lodgings. On reaching Captain Collie's door, that gentleman, and also Captain Carmichael, came up to us, and they gave the gens d'armes to understand that I could procure a boat to take us to the frigate. I then hailed the Sultan, and a boat having been sent ashore, we were conveyed to L'Uranie, to the first lieutenant, of whom we cannot but express our thanks for his urban conduct to us while on board, which strongly contrasted with that of Marchmont, whose desire evidently was that we should spend a night in a disgusting lock-up. On the following morning we were conducted by a lieutenant to Government House, where, under the verandah, we found the two informers, Seager and Darling, sitting close to the door of the room, in which were assembled Governor Buxton, Marchmont, Wilson the interpreter, and a French clerk. The two witnesses, Seager and Darling, previous to our arrival, had been examined, and their depositions were lying on the table before the governor. We were not allowed to see or read them, but the court commanded that we should answer all questions put to us by Marchmont. We were then questioned separately upon the 'grave charge,' the two informers sitting within hearing of the door; after which we retired, and the court called in the two informers, who, I believe, made a further statement. About ten minutes elapsed, when Marchmont ordered us before him, and I was then sentenced to give within two hours on board the Sultan, in which vessel I had taken my passage for Sydney, and if found on shore afterwards without permission from the French governor, I was to be arrested and imprisoned. Captain Dally was remanded on board the frigate once more as a prisoner, but subsequently ordered to his vessel, not to put his foot on shore without permission, as in my case.

"HENRY HAT, late commander of the schooner Challenger."

MUTINY AT ISCHANG.—Advice have been received from Ichang, of the 6th July last, from which it appears that serious disturbances had occurred amongst a portion of the vessels lying at the island with guns, and that several parties had been put to blows and sent to St. Helena. The officer selected by the committee appointed by Captain Brooke, of her Majesty's steam ship Thunderbolt, to form a judicial body, had elected Captain Albert Hancock, of the Victoria, commodore, who had seemed in admirable, the island being in a state of mutiny, to send to the Cape for the assistance of a man-of-war. The brig Canning had been dispatched for that purpose. The number of vessels lying at the date of the letter above mentioned is represented to have been between 70 and 80, and the origin of the disturbance was from the new comers attempting to take precedence of previous arrivals in the loading of the vessels.

SUFFERINGS OF THE CREW OF AN ENGLISH VESSEL.—The last New York papers announce that the ship Witcham, Captain Berry, which had arrived at New York from New Orleans, fell in, on the 6th August, in lat. 25° 17' long. 87° 46', with an open boat containing seven persons, and took them on board. They proved to be the captain and crew of the British schooner Orange, which was lost on the voyage from Jamaica for Mauritius. Their names were as follows:—Alexander McDonald, master; William Young, mate; Edward Cook, Richard Evans, John Brown, William Roscoe, seamen; and Robert Wilkinson, cook. They had been thirteen days in the boat, which was only fourteen feet long. When fallen in with they were in a very exhausted state, and three of them had to be lifted on board. The youngest of them, William Roscoe, was totally insensible, and survived but about three hours, and at sunset his body was committed to the deep. Captain McDonald stated that on the 26th of July, at two a.m., when in lat. 23° 45' long. 85° 4', his schooner was captured in a sudden squall from the eastward. Fortunately, when she exposed, the jolly boat being in the bottom of the long boat, turned over, and all hands succeeded in getting into it and got clear of the vessel, which almost at the same moment disappeared. They were then left to the mercy of the waves, without provisions or water. On the 30th, their being no appearance of land, the boat's crew was altered to westward, with the hope of falling in with some vessel. They continued this course till the 28th, the wind being all the time easterly. On the 31st, at the first time, it rained for about two hours. By using two pairs of shoes, all they had among them, and by wringing their clothes, they succeeded in getting about half a pint of water each. From this time till the 31st they saw no vessel, and were without water. On the 31st and the day following, it rained three or four hours, and they obtained sufficient water to quench their thirst for the time. From the 1st to the 5th of August they obtained no water, but on one of those days they picked up a piece of ham, which was found to contain four small fishes about two inches long, which they divided among themselves; this was all the food they had while in the boat. On the morning of the 6th three ships passed them, but it was supposed the boat was not seen by them.

THE SOLACE OF MEMORY.

Who ever weathed a gale's gust,
Memorial of some joyous hour,
But lo! when in its rear decay
Fragrance and love had passed away,
To view each wither'd flower?

Even thus of gladder days we live
To wake to some sadder night,
Again 'mid scenes of joy to rove.

A RIVAL TO CAPTAIN WARNER.

Mr. Nasmith, an engineer of Manchester, has submitted to the Lords of the Admiralty, the plan of an iron steamer, bomb-proof, which he asserts will effectually destroy any ship or squadron. She is propelled by the Archimedean screw, and when going at the rate of six knots an hour, she will run stern on to a ship, and leave a hole in her, many feet wide, below the surface. It is, in fact, the power of two ships coming in collision with each other at the rate of ten knots an hour, placed, by mechanical means, in the hands of not more than three men.

THE ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.

Some gentlemen connected with the Great Western Railway, recently inspected the Atmospheric Railway from Kingston to Dorking, the only one in existence, and it is stated were well satisfied of the practicability of the principle, and the general working of the railway. One of the most gratifying results of the experiments made was, that after stopping half-way, the train attained in a few seconds a speed of thirty-five miles an hour ascending the steepest part. In a previous number of the London News, we gave some cuts illustrative of the Atmospheric Railway.

LORD ROSSIE'S MONSTER TELESCOPE.

The immense telescope of Lord Rossie, which has been described by us, and upon which his lordship has bestowed such attention, has been fixed at the noble earl's house at Farnham (Sussex), and has been directed for the first time to the sidereal heavens. A letter has been received from Earl Rossie, in which he describes the first effect of the telescope. It states that the metal, only just polished, was of a pretty good figure, and that with a power of 500, the nebula known as No. 2 of Messier's catalogue was even more magnificent than the nebula No. 13 of Messier, when seen with his lordship's telescope of 3 feet diameter and 27 feet focus. Cloudy weather prevented him turning the levitation on any other nebula object. The diameter of the large metal is 6 feet, and its focus 64 feet. Yet the immense mass is manageable by one man.

A VETERAN TRAVELLER.

The last Indian papers mention the arrival in that country of a Norwegian runner, who is about to attempt the discovery of the source of the White Nile, on foot, and unattended. He expects to be absent only about four months, and he is to go in a direct line, crossing deserts and swimming rivers. He runs a degree in twelve hours, and can go three days without food or water, by merely taking a dish or two of syrup of raspberries, of which he carries a small bottle; and when he does procure food, a very moderate quantity will suffice; but, when it is plentiful, he eats enough for three days. This wonderful man carries with him only a map, a compass, and a Norwegian axe. He has already made some wonderful journeys, having gone from Constantinople to Calcutta and back again in 59 days, for which the Sultan gave him 2000 dollars; and from Paris to St. Petersburg in 13 days.

A NEW REMEDY FOR TOOTH-ACHE.

Among the thousand remedies for tooth-ache, countercure is now stated to be a very efficacious one. A piece of countercure is to be put on a wire, then melted at the flame of a candle, and pressed, while warm, into the hollow tooth, and the pain will disappear instantly. The cavity of the tooth should first be cleaned out with a piece of cotton. In consequence of the viscosity and adhesiveness of the countercure, the air is completely prevented from coming in contact with the denuded nerve, and thus, the cause of the tooth-ache is destroyed.

THE FEMALE SMOKE OF MEXICO.

In Mexico the ladies universally smoke. The pipe or cigar is seen in the mouth of all; it is handed round in the parlour, and introduced at the dinner table. Even in the ball-room it is presented to ladies, and in the dance the women may often be seen whirling round with a lighted cigar in her mouth. The ladies of the southern cities are very frequently furnished with femenitas de oro (little golden touzies) to hold the cigar with, so as to prevent their delicate fingers from being polluted either with the stain or scent of tobacco.—Gregg's Northern Mexico.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR STEAM.

The Paris Academy of Sciences have discussed a paper presented by M. Selligue, who claims the discovery of a new and important motive power as a substitute for steam, and which consists in the admixture of atmospheric air with hydrogen gas, by which an explosion is produced. M. Selligue admits that he has some difficulties to overcome, but it has been proved that with a small quantity as three to five litres of hydrogen gas, mixed with atmospheric air, a weight of 1000 kilogrammes has been rapidly raised to the height of three feet. The apparatus for the production of hydrogen gas will occupy much less room, and cost less money than steam-boiler, and the storage required for fuel, which is now the great obstacle to long voyages, will be dispensed with.

THE MARCH OF LITERATURE.

It has been calculated that if twelve men were employed for twenty-four hours a day, allowing neither for sleep nor meals, reading at the rate of eighty words per minute, they would barely keep up with the volumes published in London alone. In this tract and sermons are included; but if magazines, reviews, and newspapers were added to the task, it would require upwards of forty men. If twelve hours per diem were employed, then eighty men would be required; and, as he is a hard student who reads more than eight hours per day, as one hundred and twenty men would be required to finish the Herculean labour.

DEPTH OF THE SEA.—AUSTRIAN WELL.

M. Le Saulnier de Vanello, a naval captain of France, has lately ascertained that the depth of sea between Calais and Dover does not, at any part, exceed 300 feet. The boring of the American well at Calais, has now reached a depth of 323 metres. The water to be supplied by this well, will, M. Arago states, come from England.

TO DESTROY WASPS' NESTS.

Professor Henslow has discovered that turpentine, placed at the entrance of the nest, was fatal to these insects. The best mode of applying it is to put the turpentine in a bottle (as much as will merely wet the lid of the bottle is sufficient) and insert the neck of the bottle in the hole leading to the nest, surrounding it with some earth. If applied in the dusk of the evening, every wasp will be dead by the following morning. "In no instance (says a correspondent of the Gardener's Chronicle) have I known it to fail, except in cases where the nest was deeper in the ground, or at a greater distance from the mouth of the hole, than I anticipated. A partial failure may sometimes occur where there happen to be two entrances, but a second application is sure to prove effectual."

THE SURFACE OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

During excavations for the sewers in different parts of the City, information has been gained relative to the depth of artificial ground above the natural surface. The following is the very curious statement relating thereto made by Mr. R. Kelsey in evidence before the "Commissioners for inquiring into the state of large towns and populous districts":—"Thickness of made ground at Paul's-ward up to St. Paul's Churchyard, 9 feet to 12 feet; Watling-street, 11 feet to 12 feet 6 inches; Broad-street, 17 feet 5 inches; Cheapside, the natural earth was not reached—the cutting varied from 14 feet to 22 feet; Gracechurch-street, 14 feet to 15 feet; King William-street, 15 feet to 17 feet 6 inches; Finsbury-street, 10 feet to 12 feet 6 inches; Moorgate-street, 15 feet 6 inches to 21 feet 6 inches; Fenchurch-street, 15 feet 6 inches to 17 feet 10 inches; Bishopsgate Within, 9 feet 6 inches to 15 feet; Fish-street Hill, 4 feet 6 inches to 15 feet 10 inches; Eastcheap, 12 feet to 14 feet; Redcross-street, 7 feet to 9 feet; Barbican, 10 feet to 12 feet; Cannon-street, 9 feet throughout; Rosemary-lane, 4 feet to 12 feet; Water-lane, Fleet-street, 5 feet to 10 feet; Carcass-street and Lad-lane, 12 feet to 14 feet; streets in Cloth-fair, 4 feet 6 inches to 12 feet 6 inches; streets in St. Ann's, Blackfriars, 4 feet to 12 feet. The pumph of Temple-lane is buried in accumulation. The east end of Newgate-street was lowered about 15 inches when the present Post-office was built. London-wall has in part been raised above 2 feet since the last 25 years. The pavement and Levee Moordike have been wholly re-arranged within the last 10 years. All the improvements from London-bridge to London-wall have largely altered the surface of the main line, and of the adjacent streets. The north side of what is termed Holborn bridge, the north end of Farringdon-street, has been raised about 2 feet. Such occurrences as these are distinctly noticeable in some way, but the invariable alterations are equally great and curious; as, for instance, from levels taken in 1770 and 1802, it appears that in Bishopsgate-street Without, at Bishopsgate-churchyard, the surface has risen 2 feet 2 inches in 20 years, but at Spital-square only 12 inches in the same time. The result of this examination is confirmed by the depths of the sewers, as originally built, and as they now measure.—Times.

PRESERVATION OF APPLES.

Apples intended for keeping should be carefully gathered by hand, when they are quite ripe, in dry weather. They should be spread singly on a floor in an open room for about ten days, and then stored in an airy place, with a layer of dry wheat straw beneath each layer of apples. By careful management, some kinds of apples are preserved in the South Islands for two years.

GENEALOGY OF LORD GLENLYON.

Lord Glenlyon, the heir presumptive to the dukedom of Athol and nephew to the Duke of Northumberland, who has given the use of Blair Castle to her Majesty, is the great grandson of Lieutenant-General Lord George Murray, who commanded the rebel army under Prince Charles Edward Stuart, during nearly the whole of the rebellion in the year 1745, until the battle of Culloden gave the death-blow to the hopes of the unfortunate house of Stuart. Upon the death of his uncle, the third Duke of Athol, without issue, the son of Lord George Murray became Duke of Athol, and from whom is descended the present Lord Glenlyon.

KANG-HE'S INSCRIPTION FOR THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH AT PEKIN.

The following beautiful inscription was, in the year 1711, in his own hand, writing, presented by the Emperor Kang-He to the Jesuits, at Peking, for their new church at the Chun-ching-mun gate. Inscription on the front:—"To the True Principle of all Things." Inscription on the first column:—"He is infinitely good, and infinitely just; he enlightens, he supports, he rules all things with supreme authority and sovereign justice." Inscription on the second column:—"He never had a beginning, and will never end." All things were created by him from the beginning; they are governed by him, and he is the true Lord of them."—Pidding's Chinese Atlas.

CRIMINAL TRIAL IN INDIA.

[By the last Overland Mail, we learn that "in Bombay there was a trial going on of eighteen Parsees, for a murder committed at two o'clock in the day, in one of the most public streets in the town, on the principle of the gang murders which degrade India. Great excitement prevailed on the subject; the murdered man was one of their own tribe, and yet much money was expended in the hope of preventing the conviction of any of the parties." The present may, therefore, be a fit opportunity for introducing to our readers the process of a criminal trial in India, described and illustrated by a gentleman fully conversant with East Indian affairs.]

The Civil Service of the East India Company furnishes altogether the most extraordinary example of a system of jurisprudence carried out by foreigners over a people amounting at least to a hundred and twenty millions, and that in a manner to give entire satisfaction to the suitors.

The Civil Service may be said to be divided into three portions—the Judicial, Revenue, and Political—the latter being the Secretaries to Government in the different departments, Residents at native courts, and Governor-General's agents. But, all the members of the service are equally eligible for any of these appointments, and, as regards the two former, they are changed from the one to the other without the slightest regard to the efficiency of the service, or the onerous duties they have to perform.

The law, as administered in India, is the most curious compound that ever was devised. Over Englishmen, the Company's magistrates have little or no control in a direct and legal way; those in criminal cases being only subject to the magistrate under his powers as a justice of peace, his jurisdiction extending to a fine of five pounds. With English law, the civil servant has nothing to do; Blackstone, Coke, and Littleton, being wholly disregarded. The law, par excellence, is "regulation law," that is, a number of crude undigested regulations, filling a good sized folio, and which have been issued, repealed, abolished, renewed, and re-enacted, in the last hundred years, until no one can tell what portion remains, or what has been taken away; or whether an act, repealing another act, which abolished a regulation, brings the original regulation again into force; a favourite way with some rulers of bringing an obnoxious law back to the regulation book. To this law all foreigners who proceed to India are subject; and, however various or contradictory it may be, they have no means of procuring a printed copy anywhere by which to regulate their conduct.

Our Mussulman subjects are governed in civil cases by "regulation law," of which they know nothing; and in criminal cases, by the Law of the Khoran. Our Hindoo subjects are in the same predicament in civil cases, and ruled by the Shastres and Vedas in criminal cases. Persons born of native women by European fathers, are subject to the law of the mother. In all cases where natives are concerned, the Judge is assisted by a native Judge, who lays down the law, but by which the European Judge is no further bound than he may think fit, acting entirely upon his own judgment and responsibility. The parties may appeal if they like to the Sudder Board, and the Judge has then to forward the evidence taken on the trial, and the reasons for his decision. For Bengal, the Sudder Board is at Calcutta; and in the north-western provinces (to which this statement chiefly applies), at Allahabad. In civil cases, between Europeans and natives, the appeal lies to the Supreme Court in Calcutta. We believe only one case of appeal has ever been brought to trial in this court (Maxwell v. Ferguson). Capital offences are tried by the Commissioner of the District, all others by the Judge and Magistrate.

The punishments are death by hanging, transportation (generally to the Mauritius), and imprisonment with hard labour, chiefly on the roads.

THE OMLAH.

VAKHEEL—NATIVE BARRISTER.

In the first sketch we have portrayed the European Judge as he is usually to be found whilst administering his legal duties; and in a climate like that of India, the white jacket and hooak are better suited to his constitution than the wig and gown of an English Judge would be.

The principal official by whom the Judge is assisted is the Omlah, a most characteristic sketch of whom we have next given. His duties are to prepare all papers and documents for his superior, take down the evidence, or see it properly done by his subordinates the mohurrers (or sealers); to read the evidence to the Judge; and aid and assist him in all matters with his counsel and advice; not to omit a very large dose of flattery which he duly administers morning and evening, and on all fitting occasions; taking care that if there is anything unpleasant, it shall be made as palatable as possible to his superior; and that no one shall intrude upon his master's privacy with unpleasant tales of injustice or injury sustained through the cognisance of the said Omlah. His pay is about six pounds sterling a month; yet no one could for a moment doubt his being a man both of wealth and influence, and beyond the suspicion of taking bribes to use his influence over his superior's judgment. A native would not consider his case thoroughly gained, though he had a decree in his favour, if he had not bribed somebody; and only seeming to possess the countenance and influence of the European superior, is a sure method of obtaining the presents of all suitors; and his power of getting a suit advanced or retarded, without reference to the ultimate decree, is sufficient to establish a claim on his part to their generosity. Most of the suitors come a distance of several days' journey from their homes, to which they are anxious to return; and it is only through the good offices of the Omlah they can expect to do so in anything like a reasonable time, or without a chance of performing the journey more than once.

The Native Barrister is called a Vakeel (No. 3), and would scarcely be tolerated by his learned brethren in Europe. The East India Company are, however, too good judges themselves to allow the gentlemen of the long robe to carry off all the emoluments from their litigious subjects. When a suit is filed, the plaintiff has to do so on stamped paper, and the value of the stamp is ten per cent. on the amount of his claim. When the defendant files his answer, he has also to do so on stamped paper, paying ten per cent. on the amount claimed. Thus, for instance, if an action be brought for a thousand pounds, the East India Company charge the litigants two hundred pounds, and then pay the Vakeel for conducting the suit, the costs of which are about thirty shillings or two pounds. The parties may sharpen the wits of their legal advisers if they please, but it is more in the form of a bribe than as legitimate pay. Most indigo factors, and persons engaged in commercial transactions, have a Vakeel at all times in attendance in the courts, the pay being about sixteen shillings a month; the duty of this Vakeel being to make his employer acquainted with all new orders and regulations of the magistrates and Government, and to answer any complaints which may be brought against his master. The wealthy natives also have Vakeels in attendance, and it is looked upon as a mark of their respectability that they should do so. The Vakeels are a clever, shrewd class of men, familiarly acquainted with the practice of the court and the regulation law. They are treated with much courtesy by the Judges, and hold an influential position in native society.

The Prisoner (No. 4) is a thief by profession, and in being so does not consider himself a useless member of society. It is his misfortune—his fate—to have been detected and brought into his present difficulties, but he does not feel that his character is in any way injured by the crime he has committed. It is his vocation, and he follows it as he would any other. The adroitness used by this class is extraordinary, and betas have often been laid in India upon finding a man who should steal any article named, however carefully guarded. If he make up his mind to rob a person, it is all one to him whether it be to-day or this day month; he will follow an encampment, or hover about the parties, until his object be effected. In breaking into a house, he seldom enters by a door, but makes an aperture in the wall sufficiently large to admit his person and remove his booty. They follow the same plan in horse-stealing, making the hole in the wall at the horse's head, and leading him out. If the horse be a grey, they will remove him some six or eight miles, and then, in the course of a few hours, dye him another colour. If the object of plunder is in the tent, they will cut the canvass with a sharp knife, and thus obtain an entrance. With European articles they have little idea of the value of their plunder, and with a watch they will separate the gold or silver cases from the works and throw the latter into the first pond they come to. So incessant are their depredations, that every European is obliged to have at least one watchman, who keeps guard all night; and in marching, the village where the person halts is obliged to find four watchmen, as, without this precaution, the party would assuredly be plundered.

The Burkundaz, or native policemen, (No. 5) are retained regularly in the employ of the Government, and are always armed with a sabre. Their pay is about eight shillings a month, with which they have to feed, clothe, and lodge themselves. They obtain some slight remuneration for serving warrants, but nothing very considerable; perhaps, every thing considered, their situation may be worth about twelve shillings monthly. They are not very expert as thief catchers, and pay more attention to the cultivation of their beards and the proper arranging and dressing of them, than to anything else. They are also used as guards at the collector's treasury. A portion of the police are mounted and equipped as irregular cavalry, and posted at short distances throughout the country. These take notice of every traveller, and should the wayfarer not reach his destination, they at once make their enquiries and report accordingly. This is as much as can be done in so extensive a tract of country, where considerable towns are seldom within twenty miles of each other, and the principal police station sometimes a hundred.

BURKUNDAZ, OR NATIVE POLICEMAN.

The Witness (No. 6) holds in his hands the bottle of holy water, by which he swears the oath supposed to be binding on a Hindoo. The water is from the river Ganges, and the nearer it is procured to the source of the stream the purer and holier it is considered. At certain seasons of the year hundreds of pilgrims are to be met returning from Hurdwer with flasks of this water, which they convey even as far as Madras, a distance of more than two thousand miles. The Mussulman is sworn on the Khoran, which is placed in a folded cloth and then held in his hands the whole time he is giving his evidence. The form of oath most binding, but which is not allowed now to be used in the courts of justice, is by the witness placing his hand on a boy's head. If he has a son with him, then his own child is the person; but, if at a distance from home, he is required to adopt the boy by whom he swears, and the form of oath, or rather imprecation, is, that should he forswear himself may all the consequences fall on his child. It is very shocking that so dreadful an imprecation should ever have been in use, but at the same time it shows an utter disregard of truth. A witness invariably begins by telling you that he always speaks truth, well knowing the slight estimation in which his veracity is held. To obtain a plain assent or dissent from him is impossible, nor can you obtain any answer until you have allowed him to fire off the whole story with which he has come primed and loaded.

THE WITNESS.

THE GREAT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL, UNITED STATES.—THE PAVILION.

THE GREAT BERKSHIRE (UNITED STATES) JUBILEE.

We have just received from our New York Correspondent, the originals of the annexed engravings of one of the most interesting festivals ever celebrated in the United States of America. Such is the Great Berkshire Jubilee, the details of which, we think, with the New York Tribune, will be perused with a deep and lively interest by many others than the Sons of New England. "It was," observes the Editor, "a glorious Social and Intellectual Festival, which we hope to see reproduced in many other counties and sections, not alone of New England, though we apprehend few counties can boast so brilliant a galaxy of sons and daughters as Old Berkshire."

This Jubilee is, indeed, a poetical example of love of country; since it consists of an annual reunion of as many of the natives of New England, as can return to their native state on that occasion. The occasion is stated to be an unprecedented one: it is different from all other great assemblies; those who attend the festival leave politics and the cares of life behind them, are happy again for a couple of days, and then return, strengthened to do good to the world. The Jubilee originated from a simple circumstance—when Mr. Joshua A. Spencer being asked if he loved Berkshire? "Yes," was the heartfelt reply, "I make it part of my religion to visit it once a year."

The proceedings, which commenced on the 23rd ultimo, took place in Pittsfield, Mass., and its vicinity, and consisted of meetings and greetings, prayer offerings, a grand dinner (for, in the United States, this is an important feature in public rejoicings as in the mother country), and conversations, at which speeches are made, and many poems (written for the occasion) were recited, songs sung, &c. Early in the morning, a preliminary meeting was held in the Town-hall, at which it was announced that forty-four Vice-Presidents had been appointed, one to each of the forty-four tables, "which would accommodate, in all, over three thousand persons at dinner!" The meeting was then addressed by the Rev. T. A. Gold, Chairman of the Committee of Reception, who welcomed the New York Committee to Berkshire, congratulating them on the love which they bore to their native homes—sons of the old domain wherever they went. He hoped that that feeling would continue as long as the hills of Berkshire were clothed with verdure, or their fountains poured forth streams, which had made this the most delightful place on earth. He told them, in the language of the Good Book, that the fatted calf was killed. "Come and see our hospitality; drink from our fountains that need nothing to make our waters better. Above all, drink from the pure fountain of good feeling. Some are gone to better lands, where we shall soon all join them on a more joyous occasion."

The Rev. Russell Cook, Corresponding Secretary of the American Tract Society, responded on behalf of the gentlemen from New York. "He and his friends from New York had come to say that we love Berkshire. We always loved her, but we'll love her more hereafter. We come back to gaze on the hills—to wander by the brooks where we spent our youthful days—we come to see the churches where we listened to the words of truth in our younger days; but our fathers, where are they? Hallowed is their memory in Berkshire hearts amid Berkshire hills. Thirty years ago we saw some of these faces, and they appear familiar still. We know that those present have honoured their native Berkshire." This last sentence illustrates the moral benefit of this reunion better than a whole page of disquisition.

After the meeting had partaken of the hospitality of the good people of Pittsfield, a procession was formed of the President of the day and Society of the County, Vice-Presidents, Speakers, Clergy, Committees, Faculties, Emigrant Sons and former residents, Citizens, &c. of the county, Chief Marshal, and Marshals; and in this order, they marched to Jubilee Hill, west of the village; but here the meeting was soon dispersed by rain, after the singing of an anthem, "Wake the Song of Jubilee," &c., and an eloquent prayer, by Dr. Shepard, of Lenox. The interruption is thus characteristically related in the New York Tribune—

"While [Dr. Shepard was invoking the blessing of Heaven upon the proceedings, a shower struck the crowd, and then there arose a rush like a whirlwind, caused by the simultaneous development of three thousand umbrellas, which covered up under their dark features, as much brightness and beauty as ever the envious clouds obscured in the sky. There they were, Posters and Anarchists, trading down the hill together, three under an umbrella, and one on each side—yet it was borne with resignation, as always by the Ladies in times of distress."

Our artist has succeeded in representing this somewhat grotesque scene. However, damped though not daunted, the assembly sped on to the Presbyterian Church, on the square, where the exercises were continued, and an impressive sermon preached by Dr. Mark Hopkins: the peroration is vividly descriptive:

And this is the Berkshire Jubilee: we have come—the sons and daughters of Berkshire—from our villages, and hill-sides, and mountain-tops; from the distant city, from the Far West—from every place where the spirit of enterprise and of adventure bears men, we have come. The farmer has left his field, the mechanic his workshop, the merchant his counting-room, the lawyer his brief, and the minister his people, and we have come to revive old and cherished associations, and to renew former friendships—to strengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of every kind and time-hallowed affection. Coming together as natives and citizens of a State, on the eastern border of which is Plymouth Rock, what so noble as that our first public act should be to assemble ourselves for the worship of the God of our Fathers, and our God? This is a total thanksgiving in one sense, but extended in another sense. This day our family affection is thrown around a whole country. It is fit, then, that we should adopt the language of the Psalmist, in the words which I have chosen for my text:

"Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt beautifully with thee."—Psalm 116th, verse 7th.

After the sermon, an anthem was sung, and then was recited a poem of more than 100 stanzas, by Dr. Allen, pastor in Pittsfield, 40 years ago. The following, in reference to the mainly remonstrance of Field, Bryant, and Sedgwick, against the Annexation of Texas, was received by a burst of applause from the audience:—

"Of Field and Sedgwick, resolute and free,
By Fanny's slanting voice invoked in vain
To bend their Berkshire might, and stubborn knee
To the great image on the Texan plain."

There was another poem and a hymn given, and then the assembly dispersed. In the evening, every house in Pittsfield was "open" to strangers. The New York Tribune states:—

No words can express too much in favour of Pittsfield hospitality. In some houses all the parlours are full of beds, and some talked of fixing up the church for reception, and to give still more accommodation a train has been started on the railroad to carry people twenty or thirty miles to bed, returning with them in the morning in less time than a lay person would require to get down stairs from the third story.

The Second Day of the Jubilee was opened by a gathering of the young men: then an informal meeting in the Presbyterian Church, at which the exiled sons of Berkshire were welcomed, and the memory of the departed was honoured. The procession was then formed to Jubilee Hill, where from 5000 to 6000 persons (the majority of them ladies) were present; in the front of whom sat Miss Sedgwick, the poetess. The proceedings consisted of a hymn, prayer, and oration, the latter an eloquent production, by the Hon. J. A. Spencer, of Ulster; at the close of which was produced the first newspaper published in Berkshire, in 1788. Then followed a glee; a poem written for the occasion, by Mrs. Fanny Kemble Butler; a poem and song, by Mrs. Sigourney, &c.

The company next marched, in procession, to the dinner pavilion, where nearly 3000 guests took their seats, whilst thousands stood around, to witness the spectacle, and hear the speeches. The first ladies in the place were "out to Jubilee Dinner!" the repeat was cold, and was all prepared at Boston. After dinner, the president, Governor Briggs, eloquently recounted the great deeds of Berkshire men, during several crises, and claimed for their fame the taking of Ticonderoga; the detection of Arnold, the traitor; great service in the Florida war, &c. The following sentiments were then given:—"The scenes and friends of our childhood."—"The county of Berkshire—her scenery and her sons, gazing upon these, she exclaims with the Roman mother, 'These are my jewels.' " Dr. O. W. Holmes, of Boston, next addressed the company, and recited a poem of thirteen stanzas: a brass band played "Home, sweet Home!" Judge Dewey then complimented "the array of loveliness," and Mr. Theodore Sedgwick eulogised the free Republic, quickly adding, "The stock of New England is the stock of Old England, with our equality added to their liberty and intelligence."

Mr. Macready, our distinguished tragedian, was next called for by the company, when he rose and said:—"Mr. President, and gentlemen—I cannot say brethren; and yet my heart beats as warmly at seeing such a spectacle as any American could desire. I confess, sir, that I am taken wholly unawares, for I came here only to witness the spirit with which you enter into this Jubilee. I cannot make a speech. Believe me, I wish I could banish from the minds of those that hear me, every suspicion that England is opposed to the prosperity of this country. But I will not attempt to make a speech. Instead of that, I will recite to you a short poem, expressing that spirit of love to man which ought to characterize the nations and the people of the earth." Mr. Macready then recited the following Eastern fable, which he gave with all that grace and energy which have given him such celebrity:—

Abon Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight, in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An Angel writing in a book of gold.
Examining peers had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised his head,
And, in a voice made all of sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord!"
And is mine one?" said Ben Adhem. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the Angel. Abon spoke more low,
But cheerily still: "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men."
The Angel wrote and vanished. The next night
He came again, with a great wheezing light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed;
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

This recitation was received with loud applause, the band playing "God save the Queen."

Governor Briggs read an eulogy on Channing, by a daughter of Berkshire, and gave a sentiment to his memory, followed by the air of "Yankee Doodle," &c. The next noticeable proceeding was the singing of a song by about sixty young ladies, dressed in white, with white ribbons pendant from their hair, accompanied by several gentlemen on musical instruments, and by the whole audience in chorus. A celebrated belles then gave, by proxy, the following sentiment:—

You cannot run go through the world below,
But you'll find the Berkshire men;
And when you see the world above,
You'll meet them there again.

After a few more sentiments, the party broke up, and the Tribune reporter tells us that "many a manly cheek was wet, and many an eye of beauty shed dew-drops, to render still more lovely the white and red roses that were so profusely mingled where they fell."

In the evening, a meeting was held at the Town Hall, at which the people of Pittsfield were thanked for their hospitality. About an hour after the performance closed, when one of the most terrific thunder-storms came on that ever occurred, even in that region. "Among its effects," says the Tribune, "were the prostration of the tent, and a smash of about one hundred dollars' worth of crockery. 'Old Gray Lock' was clothed in fire, and the giant mountains threw living balls of flame at each other's heads. The Titan clouds, bearing terrestrial armour, seemed to rush in battle against the sky, only to be hurled again, weak as water, down to their mother earth. It was a magnificent finale to the Berkshire Jubilee."

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. XXIV.

LORD STANLEY.

The name of Lord Stanley is one of the best known among those of what may be called the later school of politicians. His political life does not date so far back as that of most of his colleagues. But what his career wants in length it has made up by activity; and there is yet a long course before him, for he is in the prime of life, though he has changed the sphere of his exertions somewhat before the time when the inevitable fat of nature would have called him to do so. The house of Stanley is conspicuous in the annals of England. It has produced both statesmen and warriors of great eminence. It was the first earl of the family who crowned Richmond as Henry VII. on the battle-field of Bosworth.

The Right Honourable Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, Lord Stanley, is the eldest son of the thirteenth Earl of Derby. He was born on the 29th of March, 1790, and is not, therefore, more than forty-five years of age. He is her Majesty's principal Secretary for the Colonies, and till his late acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds, sat for the Northern Division of Lancashire. His first connection with public affairs was during part of the Goderich Ministry, when he was Under-Secretary for the Colonies. When Earl Grey came into power, he was made Secretary for Ireland. Then began that fierce animosity between him and O'Connell, which partook of the bitterness of personal as well as of political antipathy. A sharp, acrid, and irritable nature, which, having adopted strong party views defended them as strongly, frequently laid him open by its violence to the more wary and lawyer-like method of O'Connell. Great were their battles in the days of Stanley's Irish Secretaryship, and, indeed, long afterwards. His measures, however, with respect to the Irish Church and national education were good. He tried to alter the franchise, but here O'Connell foiled him, and he never afterwards succeeded in doing more upon this question than in thwarting the efforts of the Whigs, after he had quitted their ranks. In 1833 he was made principal Colonial Secretary, and held the office till June, 1834, when came that rupture with his colleagues which threw him for many years into the ranks of the Conservative opposition, along with Sir James Graham and others of less note. The whole of them were rather happily ridiculed by O'Connell as "the Derby Dilly and its six insiders." There was not at this time a better debater in the house, as his old associates often felt in his spirited and slashing attacks. But it was rather as an opposer of their policy than an originator of measures of his own that he was distinguished: he considered an opposition to be properly an attacking, not a legislating party. When the accession of the Conservatives became inevitable, he seemed likely to dispute the post of leader with Sir Robert Peel. Some of the more impetuous spirits of the party had far more sympathy with him than with the cautious and measured policy of Peel. But the safer man has carried it, and Stanley became a colleague, sometimes a zealous, sometimes impatient, but able ally. He resumed his old place in the Colonial Office when the Peel Ministry was formed, and has retained it ever since. There is a strong party out of doors who blame his management of the colonies most severely. His system seems to be pretty much that of all Colonial Ministers—leaving our distant possessions to govern themselves. He was early in Parliament, as he was returned for Stockbridge in 1820. He has sat also for Preston and Windsor; he has been Lord Rector of Glasgow University, and was sworn in as a Privy Counsellor in 1830. The Ministry wanting a more active leader in the House of Peers, he is about to be raised to it; but no man, we should think, will be more out of his element in that very decorous and very dull assembly. Stanley is at home in the hottest of a party fight, where all is animation and excitement; though since he has been in office in the present Government he has spoken seldom, and then in that more moderate way which becomes a Minister possessed of place, but which was difficult to the high-spirited patriot, impatient at seeing others holding it. As his elevation to the peerage has excited some interest, we add an explanation of several points connected with it. He of course still retains his office as one of the Ministers.

The practice of vesting the eldest son of a peer in the House of Lords during his father's lifetime does not, as is well known, create any new peerage, if one of the secondary titles of the young peer's father be used on the occasion; the eldest son so summoned takes rank according to the date, not of the summons, but of the original creation of that title which he then temporarily shares with his father, without really denuding the latter of any of the family honours. The practice has been frequently adopted in the case of members of the Derby family, and in one instance the erroneous summons of an eldest son of an Earl of Derby in a title which his father did not really possess had the unexpected effect of creating a new peerage. This occurred in the year 1627, when the eldest son of the sixth earl was summoned to the House of Peers during his father's lifetime as Baron Strange. It will be remembered that Lord Stanley's father, the present Earl of Derby, was also called to the Upper House before he had succeeded to the ancestral honours of the family. In that case a new peerage was deviously created, because the earldom was the only title then in the family, for all the subordinate peerages had passed away through the female line to the ducal house of Athol; his lordship was therefore created in 1632 Baron Stanley, of Bickerstaffe, in which title it is not improbable that the noble Secretary for the Colonies will be summoned to the House of Peers, and thus he will be popularly known by the same designation as that which he bore by courtesy in the House of Commons.

- "H.." Kirkcudbright.—The Chiltern Hundreds are a portion of the Highlands of Buckinghamshire. Formerly, these hills abounded in timber, which afforded shelter to numerous banditti. To put these down, and protect the inhabitants of the neighbouring parts from their depredations, an officer was appointed under the Crown, called the Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds. The duties have long since ceased, but the nominal office is retained (in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer,) to serve a particular purpose. A Member of the House of Commons, and in any respect disqualified, cannot resign his seat. A Member, therefore, who wishes to resign, accomplishes his object by accepting the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which being held to be a piece of honour and profit under the Crown, vacates his seat.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1844.

THE storm evoked in Ireland by the unlooked-for triumph of O'Connell and his fellow Repealers has naturally been succeeded by tranquillity. It will be seen by our latest accounts that the sound and fury which prompted the return speech at the Conciliation Hall, signified in reality nothing, or at least that the motive of it was rather display than mischief. In spite of O'Connell's fierce denunciations, his bitter personal attacks, and the wholesale application of the epithets of liars and scoundrels upon his political opponents, Mr. O'Connell has made a wondrous advance to the "melting mood." He no longer breaches the doctrines of the fire and sword school, but is rather disposed to copy the meekness of the sucking dove. Not that he abandons his resolves about impeachment, nor that he is more sweet upon "Vinegar Smith," nor is there any professed desire to abandon one jot of his aspiration for revenge for his alleged wrongs; but yet the calm observer, we think, will come to the conclusion that there does not exist any serious intention of prosecuting to the uttermost any one of the alarming threats with which he astounded the excitable audience assembled at the Conciliation Hall to greet the reappearance of so notable a Conciliator.

Let us see how O'Connell treats the "great account 'twixt him and vengeance" at the meeting on Monday last, after the lapse of a week from the time when he first proclaimed the war of extermination. Upon the former occasion, he appeared ready to vindicate the right to hold "monster meetings," even to the death. How changed the scene, however, within a little week! Calm reflection wonderfully assists the imagination of agitators. If in the hey-day of joy and excitement at the time when, according to O'Connell's truthful illustration, "the happy bird must chirrup," he regarded monster meetings as essential to the success of the Repeal cause, it is agreeable to find that, by thinking better of the matter, even this indispensable mode of excitement may be dispensed with. Witness the hon. and learned gentleman's recantation of Monday last.

His own opinion was, that the Clontarf meeting was now unnecessary; and he was sure it would not be necessary to be protracted in, as it would be considered to have too much the appearance of triumph and defiance. That meeting had been legally convened; its purposes and its objects were legal; and its suppression was unjustified by law, and uncontrived by any constitutional principle. Need they now vindicate that principle? He thought not; and for this reason, that the indictment itself had done so. The principle was therefore already established, and they were therefore under no necessity of vindicating it.

Mark, too, how summarily he dismisses the second panacea—the Preservative Society. No eloquent persuasives are employed to demonstrate the necessity of such a patriotic body; and, without wishing to be uncharitable, we cannot help believing that, upon reflection, Mr. O'Connell begins to have some misgivings about the £100 qualification. No doubt the great Agitator has wonderful power over his countrymen, who contribute to the rent without much difficulty; but "a hundred pounds down" sounds formidably; and hence it may be that he does not wish to press this proposition too earnestly.

Then as to the "impeachment of the Ministry." His first idea was to make a crusade to England, to see if the "Saxons" would assist him in this great design. It seemed then as if the desirable consummation of kicking out the Tory Ministry was a thing that ought not to be retarded for a single instant. Every one who heard Mr. O'Connell must have supposed that the business was urgent, and admitted of no delay; but, alas! even this fierce onslaught against Toryism is to be quietly postponed until the next meeting of Parliament. Instead of a spirited, prompt, and indignant canvass of the English people, to ascertain if they would join in an address to the Queen for the immediate dismissal of these unworthy Tories, there has been a quiet search for precedents; and now it is discovered that the initiative ought to be taken by both Houses of Parliament, as was done in the case of Sir J. Barrington. So that this great head of accusation may be considered to be postponed until the next Session, or rather until a still more indefinite period—the Greek calendar.

It will be collected, too, from the speech of Monday last, that the impeachment of the Irish Judges, and, above all, the impeachment of that functionary whom Mr. O'Connell seems to hold in such especial horror, the Irish Attorney-General, and whom the Agitator, in the fulness of conciliation, yelet the "vinegar cruet on two legs," can be postponed without injury to the cause. In fact, the "be all and the end all" of Monday's speech was an attempt to evade the consequences of the blustering manifesto of the previous week. Qui s'excuse, s'accuse, says the French proverb, and we think the learned Agitator must have felt the force of the assertion, when he sought to explain away his denunciations of the "Saxon" into a compliment. The term, he said, was no reproach. "It was an honoured name, and the purest portion of liberty was derived from Saxon laws and institutions—the Parliamentary system, trial by jury, and the shrievalty." So that the Repeal leader holds out a flag of truce to all his enemies and detractors. The Times, that powerful organ, under whose attacks he has winced so often, is no longer bearded, but he is ready to make a bargain even with such a great opponent. Thus says Mr. O'Connell—"Let them forgive me 'Saxon,' and I will forget 'surplined ruffians,' and the other compliments."

Looking, therefore, at the general tenor of Mr. O'Connell's last speech, it can hardly be considered rash if we predict that all the "monster" propositions will be quietly inured in the bosom of the committees to whom they are to be referred. Under these circumstances, it is hardly worth while to discuss the virulence of some of them, and the inconsistency of the others. But there is one point which deserves a passing word of comment. The federal system, which Mr. O'Connell has advocated, is totally inconsistent with that independence which he seeks to establish by the Repeal of the Union. Surely the politician who joins Mr. Hume in speaking of the "baneful domination" of the mother country over Canada, would hardly wish to assimilate Ireland to a colony? How could such an arrangement tend to make Ireland

"Great, glorious, and free?"

But we will not enter into angry discussion, particularly as the tone of the speech to which we allude makes us hope better things for Ireland, and leads us to the fond conclusion, that the differences between the two countries may be healed without a resort to the desperate expedient of impeachment, or to the still more dangerous experiment of Repeal. We look upon the last speech of O'Connell as a feeler, a compromise—as an indication of a desire to withdraw from his false position with the best grace he can; and we trust we are not too sanguine in believing, that now the effervescence arising from hope unaccompanied has passed away, such a measure of "Justice to Ireland" may be fairly and honourably conceded, that agitation may cease, and that fair island be crowned with contentment and prosperity.

With the Queen and Court in Scotland, and the Parliament dispersed, the home intelligence of the week has not been of a very exciting character. That her Majesty should have been received every where with the strongest demonstrations of loyalty and attachment is gratifying; but happily it is not a novelty. The same demonstrations have attended her steps from the first day she ascended the throne; her present visit to Scotland has elicited an enthusiasm not generally supposed to be a characteristic of our northern neighbours; it is pleasant, in these days when it is generally supposed the matter-of-fact pursuits of commerce are destroying the little that time has left of the age of chivalry, which Burke pronounced to have passed, to find so much of the olden spirit existing still, and suiting so well with the natural aspect of the land of mountain and of flood.

We feel convinced that every honourable-minded and sensible man in the country will rejoice at the manner in which the dispute between France and Morocco has terminated. France, we are bound to say, has fulfilled her engagements. Nay, more, for, with a moderation seldom practised by the victorious party, she is content when she has achieved a triumph with the same conditions which she made before the contest commenced. Assurances were given to Lord Aberdeen that the French Government had no disposition to take possession of the territory of Morocco. The Prince de Joinville occupied the island of Mogadore, but promised that he would evacuate it when the just demands of France were agreed to. That condition we are bound to say has been honourably fulfilled, and, therefore, all the insinuations levelled against M. Guizot for a presumed desire to pander to the wish of the French people for aggrandisement and territorial conquest are disposed of.

We have, heretofore, deprecated the blustering tone of the note of the Prince de Joinville. We did not think it in the best taste that the young sailor was sent to the very sea whereon he had almost courted a collision with a British fleet, but it is only fair to say that he has not exceeded his instructions either in regard to the operations against Tangier or Morocco.

It is too late now to discover objections to the occupation of Algeria by the French; and, assuming for the sake of argument that they are justified in holding that territory, it cannot be denied that they had a right to prevent the hostile incursions of such a daring and unscrupulous foe as Abd-el-Kader. There is no reason to doubt that this Chief was encouraged in his predatory attacks by the Emperor of Morocco. The French, therefore, were warranted in demanding, as they did, that Abd-el-Kader should be restrained.

By a singular fatuity, the Emperor of Morocco refused to do this act of justice; but now, after suffering Tangier to be bombarded, and Mogadore to be destroyed, he consents to a tardy but necessary reparation. He has caused the loss both of blood and treasure, and has not vindicated any principle by his obstinacy. No one who loves strict justice can sympathise with him. Yet such a contest in the Mediterranean naturally excited, if not alarm, at least anxiety, in England; for events of great magnitude are sometimes precipitated by the veriest trifles, and the whole country began to be agitated with the idea of a war with France. Such an event, it was admitted by all, would have been disastrous to both countries. Not that England feared war, or that she would have shrunk from it for the necessary vindication of her honour or her interests; but, as Mr. Canning demonstrated, there is such a dangerous thing as a war of opinion, or countries may be forced into war merely to satisfy the excited feelings of restless politicians, or for some fancied or illusory right.

This country has suffered enough from war to make her desirous of cultivating the blessings of peace, which brings in its train civilization, contentment, and the development of intellectual resources. War we believe to be repugnant to every enlightened man and to every Christian mind, and we rejoice that the danger of it has passed away, without any taint upon the honour of France, or the independence of England.

The new Royal Exchange is to be opened by her Majesty. The pile raised by that princely merchant Sir Thomas Gresham, was opened by Queen Elizabeth, in all the state which that vigorous minded woman knew so well how to assume. Time and the elements, which, the poet says, make everlasting war on the work of men's hands, swept it away. But the enterprise and wealth of the City of London has but increased, and another Exchange stands upon the site of its predecessor. This, too, is to be opened by a Queen,—but she wields the sceptre of a far wider empire than that which obeyed Elizabeth. And we have no doubt that the splendour of the ceremony at which she will preside, will be worthy of the occasion. On the spot thenceforth to be devoted to the purposes of commerce, will centre half the traffic of the world; to that spot will flow, and from thence will be dispersed, that ceaseless tide of wealth which is the existence of nations. Commerce has a powerful effect on the civilization of the world; and those who wish well to humanity, will rejoice to mark the busy hum of men within the walls of the new Exchange. It is fitting that the building raised to facilitate the operations of our commercial activity, should be opened by the Sovereign, as a recognition of the true source of the greatness of her realm.

SPOTS ON THE SUN'S DISC.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

As you inserted in your paper of September last several drawings of the appearance, size, time, and direction of transit, of the spots upon the Sun's disc, in August last, furnished by a correspondent, of the accuracy of which I think there can be no doubt; and as your object in publishing them may be considered the same as that of your correspondent, viz., to give the public a more accurate knowledge of the nature and position of the spots upon the Sun's disc, I have, at the request of the public, and in answer to the many inquiries which I have received, and which I have been unable to answer, I have taken the liberty to send you some observations derived from numerous observations and drawings, commenced on 18th, and which were submitted to some learned astronomers, and others; I bring one of the numerous such matters, who have drawn up my own conclusions from my own observations. I am of opinion (and indeed the first drawings of your correspondent seem to indicate the same) that the spots are not lines and streaks on the Sun's disc, but that they are first of the shape of a ring, having the appearance of narrow cavities, surrounded with high, and very dark, irregularly shaped walls, as viewed, rightly, having in their appearance before, at, and after opposition, somewhat similar to the appearance of the Moon, or rather, as the Sun turns on his axis, or the Earth proceeds in her orbit, and turns on her axis, which, as the Sun's atmosphere becomes more rarefied, or perhaps the gaseous matter with which the Sun appears to be surrounded, they appear plainer. I am led to the conclusion that they are dark, from their reflecting the same angle of position during their transit, which could not be the case, if they were some solid bodies. They may, perhaps, be compared to points fixed in water that ebbs and flows; as they sometimes appear in full or nearly full, and, at other times, being observations, in some positions, which appeared to correspond to a crater and overflow the whole crater, and which were slightly tilted with relation to the crater, and varying to a deep orange at the edges; this would appear, in the largest crater, or spot, for two or three seconds, and then sink down, leaving, in appearance, a deep and black cavity to the view—sometimes much larger, in appearance, than the whole crater. Some spots appeared in clusters, and of a darker colour. Sometimes, before opposition, they appeared divided by high and fiery ridges; and, when in opposition, appeared all as one. I have no doubt, that it is a cluster of spots appearing in the equatorial zone alone, in many parts, having appeared on the 10th of August, their position and appearance ought to be drawn for several days in advance, or during the time of their transit. I requested my friends to observe that no rain fell (as we set out) before the spots had advanced to the centre, or opposition, or the Sun and Earth had attained the position to make them appear so, or for a day or two after; then, in general, two or three cloudy days before, and, frequently said, I observed the weather to be better (as I think the statement of your correspondent's thermometer will show) at the time of the opposition, and a day or two before, than it was after. I always found it better when the spots were directly upon the Earth. I am afraid I shall trespass on your valuable time; but say only so much, as showing these observations, in order to direct your readers' and correspondents' attention to the following points, as from his present observations many useful results may be expected.

1st. If the appearance of the spots have any influence on the weather, and what? 2nd. Whether, allowing for the motion of the Sun on its axis, and the progress of the Earth in its orbit, any permanent return can be expected? ANSWS.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—[From our own Correspondent.]—A commination reached Windsor this morning from Earl Athol Castle, announcing that her Majesty may be expected to return to Windsor on Saturday, the 28th, or Monday, the 30th instant. It is considered more than probably, however, that at the Queen and the Prince Consort will visit the infant royal family at the Pavilion at Brighton, previously to returning to Windsor. Mr. Brown, surgeon to the royal household, left Windsor this morning for Brighton, to pay a professional visit to the infant royal family at the Pavilion, and to the residence of the Queen, previously to the Court levee at Windsor for Sunday. The Earl of Mornington, the brother of the Duke of Wellington, and a large party arrived at the Pavilion this morning, and went over the whole of the palace apartments by a special order from the Earl of Devonport, the Lord Chamberlain. His Lordship and friends afterwards inspected the state apartments, and returned to town in the afternoon. In consequence of the extensive preparations to be made for the reception of the King of the French, it is not expected that the state apartments will be thrown to the public after Wednesday next. The Prince Consort's carriage has been turned on several days during the past week, by Major-General Wemyss, in the neighbourhood of Windsor, in order to get this excellent park in good hunting condition by the time his Royal Highness returns to the Castle.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent left White Court, Westminister, on Wednesday morning, to honour Earl Howe with a visit at his seat, Gosport Hall, Leicestershire.

THE ROYAL CHILDREN.—The Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice are at Brighton, under the care of the Dowager Lady Lynton. The Prince and his sister were taken to the Pier on Tuesday, where they amused themselves for some time by turning about.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.—Official despatches have been received by our Government, announcing the positive intention of Louis Philippe to land at Portsmouth in the second week of October; the precise day and hour, however, named in the despatch is only known to the Commander-in-Chief and the Lords of the Admiralty. The despatches are to the effect, we believe, that his Majesty wishes accommodation provided for the fleet which will accompany him to this country. His Majesty is to be accompanied by his two younger sons, and the Ministers for Foreign Affairs and Marine. The Garter, in which his Majesty is to proceed to England, is the largest vessel of the French navy. She is of 450 horse-power, and carries 28 guns. The names of the vessels which are to form part of the royal escort, under the command of Vice-Admiral La Houssaye, are not yet known, but it is believed that the flotilla will only consist of steamers.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—The Duke of Wellington is at present staying at Wellesley Castle. The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro, accompanied by Miss Hope Vere, are expected to arrive there from Germany during the present week.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We understand that Lady Augusta Somerset, eldest daughter of the Duke of Beaufort, is about to give her hand to his Excellency Baron Nitzmann, Minister Plenipotentiary from the Court of Austria.

Count Newbode has left Brighton for Buckhurst Park, Sussex, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Delawar. The health of the count has greatly improved by a seaside residence.

PARENTS TO THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA FROM HER MAJESTY.—A letter from Emperor Nicholas, previously to the sailing of the Russian fleet from that place, the Admiral received for the Emperor of Russia, a present from the Queen of England, consisting of the perfect model of a ship in metal, contained in a case.

LOUIS BROUGHTON.—Lord Broughton arrived at Brougham Hall on Sunday last from London, and on Thursday last Mr. Baron Parke and the Hon. Charles Howard and Lady, who had been on a short visit to Henry Howard, Esq., of Greyhound Castle, joined Lord Brougham, at Brougham Hall, for a few days.

INDISPOSITION OF MISS PARK.—We are glad to say it will be quite unnecessary to give any further statements relative to the illness of this young lady, as we learn by the last accounts from Devon Manor, that happily the medical attendants were assured all danger had ceased, and that there was every prospect that their patient would gradually regain her health, so as to render in a short time their professional visits unnecessary.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel returned to their residence in Whitehall Gardens on Wednesday evening, from Devon Manor.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—A Court of Aldermen was held on Tuesday, at which the new Chamberlain of the City, Mr. Alderman Brown, was sworn into office. A letter was afterwards read from Mr. Brown, in which he tendered his resignation of the post of Billingsgate ward. The sum of £100 was voted to John and Daniel Forester, the City officers, for their exertions in the detection and apprehension of offenders. Alderman Copeland complained of an attack upon the Court of Aldermen by Mr. D. W. Harvey. Alderman Humphrey made an explanation upon the subject. He said that Mr. Harvey felt disappointed. He held a sermon which yielded no more than £236 a year, and he had been anxious to get another, which was worth £2500 a year. It was, however, out of the question that he could obtain such a place without the aid of the Court of Aldermen and he felt annoyed and disappointed at finding no support in that quarter. Sir Peter Laurence. As for Mr. Harvey, poor fellow! he feared that his eloquence would have an effect, upon the liver, and, to his unmitigated agony, he found that they would not be humbugged, and that he could not even prevail upon them to grant him a little empty applause. Both he and his friend Mr. Heppel had dropped down into their original insignificance, and were likely to remain in that condition undisturbed.

POSTERED WARD.—The ALDERMANIC GOWN.—The precept for the election of an alderman to represent the ward of Postern in the Court of Aldermen has been issued by the Lord Mayor, who has appointed Wednesday, the 25th inst., as the day of nomination.

ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE PARISH OF ST. STEPHEN, WALKER.—Some excitement has been caused in the City by an account, which appeared in a morning paper of Thursday, purporting to be a report of some proceedings at a Vestry Meeting of the above parish; at which, it was alleged, a letter was read from Mr. A. G. Gibb, in which he complained of the system of persecution carried on against him in reference to the parish accounts, and stating that he should in consequence withdraw from any further connection with the parish. The whole report turns out to be untrue. The churchwardens of the parish assert that no such meeting was held, and consequently the alleged letter is a fabrication. A meeting of the Vestry did, however, take place on Thursday, when Mr. Rock, one of the churchwardens, in answer to the question, said that with respect to the appearing contest for the Mayoralty, he would not oppose Alderman Gibbs if he would verify his accounts to the parishioners. If the Alderman would adopt that course, he (Mr. Rock), far from being Mr. Alderman Gibbs's opponent, would be his advocate at the election.

THE REGISTRATIONS.—The Registrations for the City and some of the metropolitan boroughs have commenced, but no decision has yet been given involving any point of importance. For the City, the whole number of claims and objections to be required into at the present registration amounts to 2466. The revision for the Tower Hamlets is concluded. There were no objections in the 19 parishes forming the borough, and the claims only amounted to 174, of which 16 were allowed, and 73 disallowed. A judgment was given, the effect of which is, that occupiers of houses where the landlord pays the taxes, are only required to claim once to be put on the rate-book as payers of the rate, instead, as the overseers contend, of sending in a fresh claim every quarter.

THE OPENING OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—A Committee of Common Council was held on Thursday, at which it was agreed to appoint a committee to consider of the best mode of testifying in what manner the Corporation may show their respect and attachment to her Majesty on the occasion of her visit and that of her royal consort, to open the Royal Exchange in October. In answer to a question, the Lord Mayor said he had written on Sir J. Graham to know where it would be most agreeable for her Majesty to receive the entertainment of her citizens, and he was told in answer, the Royal Exchange. Nothing else had been communicated to him on the subject.

THE NELSON TESTIMONIAL.—The public were gratified, on Tuesday, by a view of the Nelson Testimonial, unobscured by the wooden boarding that has so long obscured the base and lower portion of the pedestal from observation, and which, when removed, gave this work the appearance of completion. In furtherance of the determination of the Government to complete the monument, a model of the steps and platform round the base had been prepared, and was viewed that morning by the Earl of Lincoln, Chief Commissioner of her Majesty's Woods and Forests, the architect, Mr. W. Railton, and other gentlemen connected with the Land Revenue Department.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths within the bills of mortality in the week ending on Saturday last, presents a very favourable contrast with the average result of the last five sessions or of the last five years, the numbers being respectively 843, 901, and 946. Still, however, the number of deaths from epidemic diseases is considerably greater than the average, there having died last week of the diseases comprised under this class no less than 236 persons, the average at this season not being higher than 191. In disease of the brain, of the lungs, and of the stomach, there is a perceptible decrease; but the ratio of mortality from small pox is still greater than ordinary, the deaths last week being 37, while the average mortality is not higher than 11. In both hooping cough and typhus there is also a considerable increase.

FIRE AT BRIMMONDSEY.—A fire broke out on Monday at noon upon the spacious premises of Mr. Salmon, hatter, mercer, and woollen-tilling manufacturer, Brimmondsey. It commenced in the cellars, the proprietors for finished and partly finished goods, and owing to the inflammable nature of the stock, in less than a quarter of an hour, the entire store, with their contents, presented one broad sheet of flame. Considerable damage was done before the flames could be subdued.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

This Court resumed its sittings on Monday. We subjoin a report of all the cases tried which possess any interest.

EMBEZZLEMENT BY A COLLECTOR.—On Monday, William Burt was tried in the N.W. Court, before Mr. Commissioner Bullock, on a charge of embezzling several sums of money, which he received as collector of the poor-rate for the parishes of St. John and St. Margaret, Westminster. Messrs. Clarkson and Baskin conducted the prosecution; and Messrs. Balfour and Huddleston defended the prisoner. It appeared that some suspicion was excited in consequence of the prisoner not making his payments regularly at the Bank, and upon an inquiry being instituted, it was found that he had received £500 for which he was unable to account. On learning that further steps were about to be taken in the matter, the prisoner absconded, and was retaken at Greenwich a few days after. On being taken before the magistrate he admitted the crime with which he was charged. The prisoner's counsel admitted the fact of the prisoner having taken the money, but contended that the defence did not amount to embezzlement. The Court having overruled the objection, several witnesses were called, who gave the prisoner an excellent character up to the present time. The Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," accompanied by a recommendation to mercy.

George Hay (aged twenty-one), clerk to Mr. John McJellie, pleaded guilty to an indictment charging him with embezzling and stealing from his master some amounting to £73 2s. 6d., £23 2s. 6d., and other moneys. The Court sentenced the prisoner (who is said to be respectably connected) to ten years' transportation.

RECENTLY.—Solomon Parker, aged 19, and Joshua Jacobs, 25, were indicted for a burglary in the dwelling-house of Abraham Belmore. From the evidence it appeared that the prosecutor, who keeps a police-house in Petticoat-lane, Aldgate, had some suspicion of the prisoner Jacobs, who had formerly been in his service. He accordingly set his pail to watch, and the two prisoners were taken in the collar. Verdict, Guilty. Sentence, Parker nine months' imprisonment with hard labour, and Jacobs twelve months.

THE LATE SHOOTING CASE IN HOLBORN.—On Wednesday, when the learned judges (Mr. Justice Wightman and Mr. Justice Cresswell) took their seats on the bench, by the desire of Mr. Clarkson, the Hon. William Rose Trenchard, charged with shooting Mr. Thomas Smith, in Holborn, was placed at the bar. Before the indictment was read, the learned counsel said he had to apply to their lordships for a postponement of the trial of the young gentleman at the bar until next session. The ground on which he made this application to the Court was, that the prisoner was not at present prepared to enter upon his defence. He had been attended since his commitment by Dr. Warburton and another physician, in order to ascertain the state of his mind, but unfortunately, Dr. Warburton having been seized by a violent attack of gout, sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the medical gentlemen to make a satisfactory report. And it was also sworn on affidavit by the prisoner's solicitor, that he could not go with safety to trial without the evidence of Dr. Warburton, and that it was impossible for that gentleman to attend during the present session. Mr. Cresswell, counsel for the prosecution, said he had not seen the affidavit, but he had no doubt they were correct; therefore he should not offer any opposition to the trial being postponed until next session. Mr. Justice Wightman, after consulting with Mr. Justice Cresswell, ordered the trial to be postponed until next session. The prisoner, who is a young man of a very mild and pleasing appearance (aged twenty-one), was then removed from the dock. He seemed quite indifferent to what was passing. The charge against the prisoner in the indictment, is as follows:—William Rose Trenchard (aged twenty-one), gentleman, indicted for feloniously, with a loaded pistol, shooting at Thomas Smith, with intent to murder him. Mr. Smith, the prosecutor, was in court. He appears very weak from the effects of his late wound.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The flûtes at Dieppe, in commemoration of the erection of the statue to Admiral Bugeaud, are to commence on Sunday, (to-morrow) and great preparations are going on, but Louis Philippe will not be present.

A Liverpool paper states that several vessels have left that port for the western coast of Africa, with sealed instructions, to be opened in a certain latitude, and each carrying an experienced practical chemist, furnished with tests for ascertaining the real quality and composition of ores and soils. The destination of these vessels—probably the possessors of a new traffic—is understood to lie between the 20th and 30 degree of latitude on the western African coast, and their object the discovery of certain suspected veins of copper, lead, iron, or gold, stated to exist about forty miles from the sea coast, and in a rich and fertile country.

A letter from Breslau of the 1st inst., states that the weavers, who had lately caused the disturbances at Peterwalden, have been condemned, to the number of eighty, by the Criminal Court. They were divided into two categories, the one of rebels, the other of rioters. The highest punishment awarded was nine and eight years of imprisonment with hard labour, to which two of the ringleaders were sentenced. Tranquillity is now perfectly restored.

The State Gazette of Carlsruhe contains the treaty concluded on June 27, between France and the Grand Duchy of Baden, for the reciprocal extradition of criminals for murder, incendiarism, forgery, extortion, fraudulent bankruptcy, and perjury. Political offences form an express exception.

The King of Prussia has announced his intention of giving every five years a grant, consisting of a medal, with a pair of 1000 gold crowns, for the best work on the History of Germany, in the German language.

Vincenzo Cammacci, the most celebrated of the Italian painters of the present day, died a few weeks ago at Rome, in the 75th year of his age.

A fire took place at Jassy on the 4th ult. (says a Smyrna journal), which destroyed 300 houses. About the same time a fire took place at Housch, also in Moldavia, which consumed 200 houses, and destroyed 100 lives.

A letter from Leipzig of the 11th inst. announces that the town of Pöthen had been on fire for two days, and was still burning. The church, the great pharmacy, and 160 houses were already destroyed; but the town library was fortunately saved.

A melancholy event occurred at Rome on the 28th ult.; two ecclesiastics, students of the Irish Franciscan College in that city, were unhappily drowned whilst bathing in the Tiber. One of the deceased, the Rev. E. F. Martin, was in priest's orders. His companion, the Rev. Richard Ambrose Kavanagh, was ordained sub-deacon on the previous Sunday.

There is a great increase this year in the number of passengers between Dover and Ostend. In the month of August there were 1400 more than in August, 1843. This increase is owing to the new line of steamers between the two ports.

The number of letters issued on Monday morning was unprecedented for one delivery; the number issued was upwards of 284,000, and the postmen were not despatched till nearly 10 o'clock.

On Thursday week a special railway train, (in four divisions) went from Leeds to Hull. It was decidedly the most numerous of all monster trains ever recorded. The number of engines employed were 16, the carriages 250, and the passengers conveyed amounted to the enormous number of 7500. About 1000 were from Leeds alone.

Captain Grover has started for St. Petersburg on a mission to obtain the influence of the Emperor Nicholas, in procuring the release of Dr. Wolf from Rostok.

On Tuesday an immense quantity of the new coin, half farthings, was issued from the Mint.

In consequence of the failure of the harvest in Poland, from the inundations of the Vistula, the Emperor Nicholas has intervened the exportation of corn from that country.

The culture of rice has just been tried with full success at Camargue, near Arles (France). The vegetation of the crop is so fine, that no doubt remains of the soil, Camargue being perfectly well adapted to it.

Jenkins Morgan, who, with Frost, Williams and Jones, was sentenced to be hanged at the Monmouth Special Commission, in 1843, for the Newport riots in 1839, but whose sentence was subsequently commuted to imprisonment in the Millbank Penitentiary, has been lately released. When he was arrested he was the proprietor of three houses, had a well stocked farm, and was otherwise most comfortably situated. Upon leaving the prison he found himself and his family houseless, and is now endeavouring to raise a subscription to enable him to support his wife and children.

The Universal German Gazette states that gambling on the stock exchange at Berlin had caused so many bankruptcies that the bank has ceased discounting bills entirely, so that the rate of discount has risen to 10 per cent.

A divorce has been decreed between Prince Gustavus Vasa and the Princess Louisa Amelia Stephania of Baden, and the judgment has been confirmed by the Grand Duke. Thus the parties are relieved from the bonds of matrimony, and each may contract a new alliance. They were married on the 9th of November, 1828.

Captain Bullock has just completed the replacement of his safety beacon on the Goodwin Sands, which was run down by a careless Dutchman some weeks ago. It is affixed upon the same principle as at first, with an improvement in its base. This is now composed of iron instead of wood; and it consequently penetrates further into the sand than the former.

Accounts from Trieste state that the reception the Emperor and Empress of Austria met with on their arrival in that city on the 5th instant was most enthusiastic. In the course of the day the civic and military authorities were presented to their Imperial Majesties, and in the evening the entire Court visited the Teatro Grande, which was brilliantly decorated and illuminated for the occasion. The performance consisted of "Nabucco" by Verdi.

Letters from Rome represent the state of the public mind in the Roman States as very unsettled.

Captain Aulay, of the Spahis, has died at Lalla-Maghrin of the wounds which he received at the battle of Jily.

The Austrian Government have given permission to a company to establish a canal railway in Hungary. The concession is made for eighty years. Several branch lines have also been authorized. The works will be executed simultaneously between Pesth and Vienna, and Pesth and Debreczen.

The grand line of railroad between Berlin and Kormsburg is decided upon, and is to run by Kustrin, Landsberg, Driesen, and the other towns towards the Vistula. From Driesen, it is said, there are to be two branches, one to Posen and to Stargard, in Pomerania, in order to unite these two towns with Berlin.

The Court of Proprietors of the East India House had a meeting on Wednesday, at which they unanimously agreed to a former resolution of the Court of Directors, by which an annuity of £1000 had been set off upon Major Gen. Sir W. Nott, G.C.B. Well-deserved eulogiums were paid to the military services of this distinguished officer.

THE AGENTS.—THE SLAVE TRADE.—The case of Mr. Jennings has been postponed till the next session of the Central Criminal Court, the judges entreating doubts upon some of the legal points submitted in his favour.

ATTACK UPON MR. BELMONT.—Last Monday evening a mob assembled at North Sunderland, and surrounded Belmont's house, carrying an effigy with which they had previously paraded the streets. That person, accompanied at such insulting behaviour, fired a pistol at them, when they immediately proceeded to demolish doors and windows, which was effectually accomplished in a few minutes. After this they entered into the house and destroyed every thing that came in their way. During the latter part of the riot, Belmont contrived to escape. Had he not escaped, it is more than likely that his life would have been forfeited.

POSTSCRIPT.

LATEST PARTICULARS RESPECTING HER MAJESTY.

BLAIR ATROL, Wednesday.

A heavy shower of rain came on suddenly at one o'clock yesterday, and continued to fall in torrents for upwards of two hours. This necessarily interrupted her Majesty to defer her drive until a late hour in the afternoon, and Prince Albert was also obliged to retreat from the moor above Blair, where his Royal Highness was enjoying excellent sport. The rain ceased to fall at half-past three. As soon as the sun made his appearance the carriages were ordered to convey her Majesty to the Falls of Tummel. The Royal party left the castle in two carriages and four, preceded by eunuchs.

As on the previous occasion when visiting the Pass, her Majesty addressed several questions to an old Highlander, named William Macdonald, who resides in this neighbourhood. The old man is exceedingly proud at having been selected by her Majesty to point out the beauties of the native land, and alludes with conspicuous enthusiasm on being thus honoured by his Sovereign.

The positions were then ordered to drive a long high road to Perth, and on arriving at the bridge road which leads to the Falls of the Tummel, her Majesty alighted, and proceeded on foot to view the waterfall. Her Majesty walked at a rapid pace along the road, which is nearly a mile in length, and was not, as may be supposed, in a fit state for labour, an amount of the heavy rain which had lately fallen. Her Majesty, however, headed neither the mud nor the heavy gravel but walked, leaning on the arm of Prince Albert, Lord Glenferry, and Lady C. Clerk, Lady Fanning, and the other members of the royal suite were also of the party. On arriving at the confluence of the two rivers, where the Tummel first falls over the rocks into the Garry, her Majesty expressed in enthusiastic language her admiration of the scene.

After having passed three quarters of an hour in viewing the beauties of this spot, and in the immediate neighbourhood, her Majesty walked back to the carriages and returned to the castle.

Her Majesty rose early this morning, and took her usual morning walk in the grounds, accompanied by the Prince and the Princess Royal. At eleven o'clock, her Majesty and the Prince, attended by two servants with bag poles, left the castle on foot, and, unattended by any of their suite, entered the river Garry, and proceeded to climb the precipitous hill which overhangs the back of the castle. Her Majesty succeeded in attaining the summit of the rocky mountain, a work of much labour and some peril.

Her Majesty and the Prince, in their descent, mounted their ponies at the foot of the hill, and entered back to the castle at twelve o'clock.

Her Majesty, we understand, is generally up, and sometimes walking in the grounds, as early as seven o'clock in the morning; she breakfasts between eight and nine, luncheon at two, takes a carriage drive between three and four, and dinnest eight. The intervals are spent in making short excursions, accompanied by some of her suite, to various points of interest with the police. The Prince generally spends the earlier part of the day in shooting, accompanied by Lord Glenferry, and several hardy Highlanders to carry the guns.

The Princess Royal is taken out every day for walking and riding exercises. Her Royal Highness is a quick, lively, entertaining child, and it is said her remarks upon the persons and things passing under her notice are very amusing. It is stated that her Royal Highness can already repeat the names of all the hills in the neighbourhood. She has a most companion in the young heir of Glenferry, an interesting boy of her own age.

It seems to be certain that her Majesty will make an excursion to Loch Tummel and Loch Rannoch; but it is also stated that she will visit Dunkeld, though that is not likely, at least till her way back. It is, we understand, confidently expected at Dunkeld, but little is said about it at the castle. The rumour of a visit to Taymouth is also current.

Her Majesty continues her habits of early rising. At seven o'clock Peter Mackay, her piper, sounds the pibroch under the windows of the castle, when her Majesty rises, and all are expected to follow her example. Her Majesty has also given instructions that a basket of fresh-picked heather shall be in her bedroom every morning, together with a bottle of pure water from a spring in Glen Tilt, famed for its crystal purity.

Her Majesty appears to have a great taste for things peculiarly Scottish. At Dunkeld, Mountrams, and Blair, she tasted, and not only so, but, as the report goes, highly relished, the Scotch hagg which was procured by her, and which is an established and special favourite. "Scotch broth," as Englishmen term it, is also in daily requisition at the royal table. It is even whispered that her Majesty is not altogether unacquainted with the mysteries of Scotch "haggis."

The Princess Royal, young though she be, is not slow in these things to imitate her royal mother. Not a child in all broad Scotland likes better to lunch on milk and oatmeal cake, or dine on brock. Meeting the young son of Lord Glenferry, the other day, in the castle avenue, she told him how much she liked his tartan dress, and how it was the same as was worn by the Prince of Wales.

Perhaps the most extraordinary circumstance connected with her Majesty's visit to this quarter is the entire absence of anything like popular excitement, or even curiosity. The number of strangers is extremely few, so few indeed, that when her Majesty drives out in the afternoon there are generally not more than 20 people who assemble on the road to see and salute her.

Sir Robert Peel, accompanied by two of his sons, left Whitehall Gardens on Friday for Brighton. We are happy to state that Miss Peel is daily improving in health and strength.

THE ELECTION FOR LORD MAYOR.—Various reports are in circulation respecting the election of Chief Magistrate, but we believe to be false to them. Mr. Alderman Thomas Wood being the senior of the aldermen that have not passed the chair, is, as a matter of course, next in rotation, and it is said every exertion will be used to induce his return. Alderman Gibbs stands next in rotation. After Alderman Gibbs stands Alderman John Johnson, of Doughty ward.

It is currently reported in the city that Alderman Sir John Paris has received an intimation that he will be appointed a Commissioner of Exchequer. Of course an immediate resignation of his own will be the consequence; and another vacancy in the aldermanic body will take place.

THE DINNERS TO O'CONNELL AND HIS LATE FELLOW-PRISONERS.—A letter from Dublin, dated on Thursday evening, gives a few particulars of the dinner given in celebration of O'Connell. About 700 persons had assembled at the Music Hall, at half-past five o'clock. Mr. W. S. O'Brien was to preside. A great many letters of apology for non-attendance had been received. Among others, from Lord Sharncliffe, Lord Camperdown, Mr. W. Stuart, M.P., Mr. Thomas Duncanson, M.P., Sir V. Hume, M.P., Mr. S. Crawford, M.P., the O'Connells, Mr. Riddington, M.P., &c. All the Representatives of the Corporation of Dublin were present.

Mr. Hall, the comedian, died on Wednesday night, at Dublin, of debilitated typhus. He had just terminated an engagement at the Abbey-street Theatre.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY.—A commission of lunacy was opened on Thursday at the Gray's Inn Coffee-house, to inquire into the state of mind of Miss Mary Ann Roberts, deceased of Brook House Upper Clapton. The evidence proved, that the unfortunate object of the present inquiry was the daughter of a clergyman, who died some years since. In July, 1843, she removed to the house of Mr. Ayres, in the Edgeware-road, and whilst there she behaved in a most extraordinary manner. The first delusion she laboured under was, that she was to be married by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Rev. Mr. Macdonald, who was coming to seek her in a carriage and four. She decorated the table with everything in season, and would use the most enthralling expressions to her supposed husband, and attempt to kiss him. On the 13th of July her conduct was most extraordinary. She said that she had had a vision; that she had seen her mother in hell, but that her father was her guardian angel, and she then went down stairs with her hair dishevelled, and said she was to go to hell at four o'clock. Other delusions of a similar character were depicted to, after which the jury found "That Miss Mary Ann Roberts was of unsound mind, and had been so from the 11th of July, 1843."

ALLIED INCENDIARISM.—Yesterday (Friday) a man named Mackey, habited in the dress of an ostler, was brought before Mr. Justice, at Bow-street Police Court, charged with having attempted to burn down a number of out-buildings and stables belonging to Mr. George Wood, situated in Doughty-lane, by setting fire to a quantity of hay therein. The prisoner said in his defence that he went to work at six o'clock in the morning, and having fed the horses, went out to have some coffee at a neighbouring coffee-shop. When he returned he observed smoke through the roof, and immediately gave an alarm to the head ostler. He had had a candle stuck in the wall to light him in getting the hay, but he had put it out when he went to get his coffee. Mr. Justice recommended him, and urged the police to make every inquiry into the case.

FORBICE.

FORBICE NEWS FROM TABIN.—Our latest accounts from Paris bring intelligence from Tabin, of a painful character. The Moniteur gives the following official statement:—"The French Government has received the following intelligence from Tabin, of the date of April 24:—After having vainly endeavoured to bring back to their obedience the rebels who made the attack at Tarevan, Governor Brant went out to meet them at Makh'ans, where they had made themselves encampments, defended by 3000 men and three pieces of cannon. On the 17th, Governor Brant landed with 400 men of all arms. The rebels were taken with the bayonet, the enemy having 102 men killed, their colours taken from them, and their cannon spoiled. The next day we destroyed their works, and carried away the arms and ammunition. On our side we have to lament the loss of two officers: M. Nazarety, capitaine de reserve, and M. Bonnette of the artillery. We had besides 42 men wounded." The news had created great excitement in Paris, and we are sorry to find that some of the journals make it the occasion for again sowing angry feelings between England and France. A private letter from Tabin, of the same date as the above, gives a dark complexion to the conduct of the French. The letter says, "The French at Tabin have been really murdering the natives by thousands of cannon, and have been living with their families on board of cannonal boats of war. Basil, &c. and during that long period had to be forced to put her feet out of the vessel." The French had carried their unwarlike measures of confiscation of the Queen's property to so great an extent, that they had even seized upon the little presents of poultry, and fish, and fruit, which her sincerely attached subjects had from time to time procured for her. These trifles the French had appropriated to their own personal use."

REARIS.—It is stated that letters have been received at Liverpool from Bahia, announcing that a consular treaty is to be signed between the Queen and the Emperor of Brazil. The packet now expected thence was waiting to bring the official document.

THE QUEEN'S SECOND VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

We resume our illustrations of the Royal sojourn in Scotland, from our journal of last week. The details of the several scenes may be relied on, as they have been sketched by our artist on the several sites, and during the event thus picturesquely recorded.

In our late edition of last week only appeared the substance of the following particulars of the

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AT DUNDEE.

The Royal squadron was signalled for Broughty Ferry, at half-past three o'clock, A.M., on Wednesday. The authorities of Dundee, warned by the fate of the Edinburgh magistracy, had made every preparation in case of such an event. As soon as the arrival was known, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired from Broughty Ferry, the vessels were lit, and rockets thrown up.

The Queen, however, did not disembark till the morning was more advanced. At half-past eight, her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Princess Royal (in her nurse's arms), and her suite, left the Royal yacht, and entered the state barge, which was steered by Lord Adolphus Fitz Clarence.

At a quarter to nine o'clock, her Majesty landed at the quay, and was there received by the authorities. No salute was fired, but this had been determined on for sufficient reasons.

The Royal party included the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Jersey, and their suites. The Black Eagle, the Stromboli, and the Volcano steamers accompanied the Royal yacht.

When her Majesty stepped ashore, the yards were manned, and the scene was animated by the cheering of the tars. Nor were the spectators behindhand. They cheered most loyally. In a few minutes her Majesty had reached her carriage, and the Royal party drove off through the town amidst the vociferous cheers of the people.

The Royal carriages were accompanied by a town procession, and by the authorities, and proceeded with the Queen to Duthope church, where they took leave of her Majesty, who proceeded at a rapid rate on to Blair Athol. One of our engravings shows this interesting scene.

A guard of honour of the 60th Regiment was in readiness to receive her Majesty on landing, and parties of the Scots Greys were stationed at intervals of six miles on the road to Blair Athol, which is fifty miles from Dundee, in order to escort her Majesty as she passed along. A guard of 200 Highlanders, who have been under drill for some time by Lord Glenlyon, will attend her Majesty at Blair Athol.

While her Majesty, the Prince and Princess, were ascending the steps, the feeling of royalty seemed almost lost in the touching domestic appearance the party presented. Her Majesty was received by the Provost, Mr. Duncan, the member for Dundee, and authorities, on the quay, to whom she graciously bowed and smiled, and also to the crowds around, from whom tremendous acclamations resounded on all sides, mingled with the roaring of the saluting guns and the ringing of the town bells.

Two of the illustrations represent these very animated scenes of the disembarkation.

The Royal party was followed by the Earls of Aberdeen and Liverpool; and to the former of these noble lords the addresses to her Majesty, and the address and burgess tickets for Prince Albert, were given in charge by the magistracy.

They were followed by the rest of the royal suite. At the end of the covered way, her Majesty and Prince Albert entered the first carriage; the Princess Royal, with the Ladies in Waiting, in the second; Lords Aberdeen and Liverpool, and the suite following in two other carriages. They then passed on under the Triumphal Arch, escorted by the Scots Greys, and the procession followed in the pre-arranged order, and by the same route.

Along the whole line, great crowds of people were to be seen; and the windows, balconies, and scaffolds were all very closely filled. The rush upon the streets was very considerable, but, on the whole, excellent order was preserved.

Her Majesty looked exceedingly well, and was very calm and composed. The Prince is much improved in appearance, being stouter and more manly-looking than when last in Scotland.

ARRIVAL AT BLAIR ATHOL.

The Royal party arrived at Blair Athol at three o'clock on Wednesday. Her Majesty was received at the mansion by a body of Lord Glenlyon's clansmen, attired in the Highland dress. The Queen appeared somewhat fatigued. The Prince looked remarkably well, and appeared to have been but slightly incommoded by the sea voyage. The travelling chariot, with its Royal occupants, was followed by four other vehicles containing the Princess Royal, Lord Liverpool, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Charles Wellesley, and the remaining members of her Majesty's suite, including Lord Glenlyon, who had fallen in with the Royal carriage shortly after it left Dundee.

On arriving at the principal entrance of the mansion, her Majesty was received by Lady Glenlyon, who was accompanied by the Young Master of Glenlyon and Mrs. Home Drummond, her ladyship's mother. Four companies of forty each, consisting of his lordship's clansmen, attired in the Highland dress, were drawn up by the side of the portico, the pipers, in full Highland costume, greeting her Majesty with the pibroch. The clansmen were commanded by Lord Glenlyon, assisted by the Major of the corps, the Hon. James Murray. The first company was commanded by Captain Drummond, with his Lieutenant, the Hon. W. Drummond; the second, by Captain Charles Drummond, with his Lieutenant, Sir David Dundas; the third, by Oswald of Darnley, with his Lieutenant, Kier of Kierdoggan; the fourth, by Stewart of Urnst, with his Lieutenant, Butler of Fausch, the owner of the magnificent mansion which is situated in one of the most picturesque spots in Scotland, just before entering the pass of Killin-crankie. Her Majesty appeared much pleased with the manifestations of loyalty with which she was greeted; and after addressing a few remarks to Lady Glenlyon, entered the mansion, accompanied by Prince Albert.

Within a few minutes, however, after the arrival of the Royal party, the Prince came out into the front of the mansion, accompanied by his noble host, with Lord Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, and Lord Charles Wellesley. His Royal Highness inspected the Highlanders, keeping his bat off, as he walked through the ranks, a mark of courtesy which will not be unappreciated by those fine fellows, and which evidently afforded them no small gratification.

The clansmen then marched round before the Prince, headed by the pipers playing the pibroch; and then her Majesty appeared at the window, and seemed much delighted at the picturesque appearance of her Highland subjects.

Lord and Lady Glenlyon were invited to join the Royal dinner party, which was strictly private.

His Lordship, with Lady Glenlyon, will occupy the residence of Captain Macduff, his Lordship's factor, during the sojourn of her Majesty at Blair Athol.

HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT VIEWING THE PASS OF KILLIECRANKIE.

BLAIR ATHOL, Thursday morning.

The fatigue attendant upon so long a voyage and journey rendered it necessary that her Majesty should enjoy retirement after her arrival at Blair Athol. It is understood that her Majesty desires to maintain privacy as far as possible during her temporary residence here; but every opportunity which the romantic scenery of the place affords for providing amusement—particularly out-door amusement—will, it is understood, be made available.

The reception of the Royal party at the different points on the road from Dundee to Blair Athol was most enthusiastic. At Cupar Angus, the first post stage out of Dundee, great numbers of persons were assembled, who cheered her Majesty in the most enthusiastic manner. The same reception was given her at every place on the route.

At Dunkeld, the scene was repeated. Decorations of evergreen, and shouts from the people, expressed emphatically the heartiness of the welcome of the people of Scotland, and more especially those of the favoured district, offered to the Queen.

From Dunkeld, the road, after passing Dowally Kirk, Dalguise, Kinross-house (belonging to the Duke of Athol), Moninearn, Donavard, Dundalondry, and the village of Pitlochrie, enters the far-famed pass of Killiecrankie, where a new road has been opened by Mr. Butler, of Faskally. The scenery in this pass is most romantic. Her Majesty appeared much struck with its grandeur and beauty. Here the Royal carriage halted, as shown in our engraving. Not more than four or five miles and further on is Athol House, formerly the Castle of Blair, now a family seat of the Duke of Athol. This is now placed at the entire disposal of her Majesty and suite during her Majesty's stay.

One or two trifling circumstances attended her Majesty's debarkation and landing at Dundee. As soon as her Majesty had landed from the large and acknowledged by bows and smiles the cheering of the multitudes of spectators, Lord Duncan presented the Provost, Mr. Lawson, to her Majesty, who thanked him and the authorities for the arrangements made to receive her. The Provost presented addresses from the Town Council; and the Dean of Guild presented one from the Guildry Incorporation. The Provost of Arbroath and the Provost of St. Andrew's also severally presented addresses from the corporations of those towns. During her Majesty's progress to the carriage (and she had a short distance to walk) she went on the right arm of the Prince, and the Princess Royal walked by the side of the Prince, holding his hand. (See the engraving.)

BLAIR ATHOL, Friday, Sept. 13.

There is little to record of the movements of her Majesty and the Court here than the mere ordinary routine, so strict is the privacy desired and obtained. For the purpose of retirement, a more favourable spot could scarcely have been obtained, combining as it does such quiet and seclusion with such beauty and turmoil of the world.

This morning the Queen was again early afoot, and went through the grounds with his Royal Highness and the Princess Royal, mounted on her pony. After breakfast, his Royal Highness, accompanied by Lord Glenlyon, Sir E. Bowater, and another gentleman of his suite, went out upon the hills to shoot grouse, of which there is a great abundance in the immediate neighbourhood of the castle.

None of the nobility or gentry of the neighbourhood have called, in respectful deference to her Majesty's wish for complete exclusion during her residence at Blair. The church, which is close to the castle on the other side of the high road, is being prepared for the reception of her Majesty and suite, a large pew directly opposite the pulpit, handsomely lined with crimson satin and cushioned and carpeted, being fitted up within the last day or two.

The body of Athol Highlanders, who compose the Queen's guard of honour are on duty immediately round the castle, twenty mounting guard at a time, and the main body being encamped under tents in the lawn, a little to the left of the house. At the time of her Majesty's arrival there were not more than 100 persons assembled, and these were drawn up on either side of the new Queen's gate, a little below the bridge of Glenfith. Prince Albert called out to the pom-pollons to drive a little slower through the crowd, but mistaking his words they went at full speed up to the entrance.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert have been to the old village of Blair to the lodge, where there was a party of sheavers at work shearing sheep. Her Majesty and the Prince remained for some time looking on, highly amused with the proceeding. There were some fine Scotch terriers with the sheavers, of which the Queen took great notice, patting and playing with them. The royal pair afterwards visited Glenfith, proceeding as far as the marble quarry, where there is a beautiful vein of green variegated marble. The Queen entered one of the sheavers' cottages, and found the "guide wife" at her spinning wheel, and conversed with her for some time in the most kind and condescending manner. If report speaks truth the simple and hospitable inmates, quite unaware of the rank of their illustrious visitors, produced a bottle and glass, and invited the Queen and Prince Albert to taste the mountain dew.

BLAIR ATHOL, Saturday, Sept. 14.

Yesterday, after the return of Prince Albert from the hills, the Queen and the Prince went in their pony phaeton for the purpose of visiting the Falls of Bruar, about three miles to the west of Blair Athol. The Prince drove. Lord Glenlyon, in Highland costume, and Sir Edward Bowater, attended her Majesty on horseback. These falls form one of the most interesting sights in the neighbourhood of Blair Athol. There are several separate falls, the waters rushing through a channel almost perpendicular. The sides above and around are covered with fir trees. The state of the weather, which had been threatening during the morning, prevented her Majesty from seeing the falls, as she would have had to walk a short distance. The royal party therefore turned back, after driving on the road towards Dalnacardoch. It rained heavily on her Majesty's return to entered her garden chair, which was drawn by two servants in plain liveries, and had been previously sent on for the use of her Majesty.

The Royal party did not return to the castle until a late hour. Covers were laid for sixteen. The dinner party consisted of Lord and Lady Glenlyon, Miss Murray, Oswald of Dunnikier, and Small Kier of Kindrogan, the Officers of her Majesty's guard of Athol Highlanders, with the members of her Majesty's suite.

Her Majesty took her accustomed walk in the grounds this morning, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Princess Royal. Gravel walks are being laid down and carefully rolled along the banks at the pass of Killiecrankie, for her Majesty has expressed her intention of paying a second visit to the sublime scenery at the bottom of the pass during her sojourn at Blair Athol.

Prince Albert and Lord Glenlyon, both attired in shooting jackets and caps, have just left the castle in his lordship's phaeton, to try some moors in a distant part of the Athol estates; the Prince will, however, return to the castle to accompany her Majesty in her afternoon drive.

The weather is as propitious as could be desired, which enables her Majesty and the Prince to pass a great portion of their time in the open air.

There is a rumour that the Queen intends to visit some parts of the Western Highlands and Islands before returning to England, and that the royal yacht will be ordered round to the west coast to receive her. Staffs and lons are mentioned as likely to be visited by her Majesty, in which case she will probably return by Inverary and the Clyde. A little incident occurred on Sunday which has created some observation in the dearth of more important or stirring matter. In reading the usual prayer for the Royal Family at church, the clergyman inadvertently omitted that for Prince Albert, and the Queen when leaving the church laughed and good-humouredly quitted the Prince upon the circumstance of his being excluded from the prayers of the congregation. Whatever occasioned her mirth, the Queen was certainly smiling and talking merrily to the Prince on leaving the church. It might have been caused by the mistake of the Prince, who, when the wooden ladies were being handed round at the offertory, put his hand in his pocket and took out some gold, but the ladies were not thrust into the royal pew.

Although the majority of our illustrations have been severally referred to in our narrative of the Royal Visit, it may be interesting to add a few incidental notes on the localities and incidents.

The second engraving—King William the Fourth's Deck at Dundee—presents a very attractive appearance. Our artist was highly favoured in being the only person allowed to be in that part whence the sketch was taken. The Royal party were attired in mourning: Prince Albert wore a white hat, with a crape band; and the Princess Royal wore white trousers. The guard presenting arms are the Rifles. The triumphal arch erected here was raised within 35 hours: it was designed by Mr. Leslie, civil engineer, and constructed under the superintendence of Mr. C. Ower; the contractor for the work being Mr. Boyd: it had a fine and imposing effect, with its appearance of solid masonry so artfully counterfeited as at a very short distance to bid defiance to detection.

In the High street, at Dundee (see the third engraving), five were planted across the street, and festooned with flowers, which had a very pleasing effect. The guard presenting arms here also are the Rifles; and the body-guard, the Scotch Greys. A little to the west of this street, in the North-gate, are the remains of an old cathedral, which contained four places of worship, one of which was pure Gothic. Three of these churches were completely destroyed by fire, on Sunday morning, Jan. 3, 1841; measures were taken for repairing or rebuilding two of them, and of these one is just completed. This structure is said to have been originally built by David, Earl of Huntingdon, in 1185: at the west end is a tower, 156 feet high.

The Pass of Killiecrankie (a portion of which is shown in the next view,) commands the Blair of Athol, and stretches for the space of a mile or upwards along the termination of the River Garry. The hills rise from the bed of the river, flanking it on the western bank with a precipitous wall. The bold rocks, lining its channel, are mantled over with masses of waving ash, birch, and oak, the light and graceful foliage of which, moving and changing its lines with every breeze, contrasts finely with the bleak crags that start at intervals through its leafy screen, and at length soar into the abrupt and rugged outlines of Ben-Vracky.

This pass, in reference to its military history, has been styled the Scottish Thermopylae, and until the present road was constructed, might have been called with no less propriety the Via Mala of Scotland. But the dangers of the pass, which contributed not a little to its sublimity, have disappeared with the progress of art, and those unprecedented facilities of intercourse which have been thrown open by modern enterprises.

The next engraving shows Blair Castle, as seen from Ben-y-glis, which almost appears to the rank of mountains. Some of these hills are clothed to the tops with fir, relieved by masses of rich verdure; others are more barren, but strikingly grand. At all hours of the day—from the early morning, when the summits of the hills are hidden in mists, to the night, when their bold outlines form a grand amphitheatre enclosing the domain—the scene is beautiful in the extreme.

Blair Castle is, by no means, the castellated structure which its name imports. It is a large, straggling, and irregular building, which, upon a near approach, arranges itself into a central mansion of three stories, extending to the width of eight windows in front, and two in depth, without any architectural pretensions, the battlements and bastions with which it was formerly surmounted and flanked having been long since swept away, in order to disarm it of the importance attached to it in the feudal times, as the key of the pass into the northern Highlands, and commanding the valley and pass of Killiecrankie. On the left of the main building, and nearer the high road from Perth to Inverness, is a long and low range of buildings, which contains many large and convenient apartments, in which ample accommodation has been found for her Majesty's suite and attendants. Behind these are extensive offices and stabling, all built in the most plain and unpretending style, which is the character of the whole edifice, although there are several spacious and magnificent apartments on the basement and principal story, furnished in excellent taste.

The castle fronts the south, and although enclosed on all sides by lofty hills, is situated on a high range of table land, which is completely shut out from the lower valley of the Tay by the mountains forming the d-fle of Killiecrankie. Although there are few trees, and those of small size, in the neighbourhood of the castle, all the mountains around it are clothed nearly to their summits with wood, the dark and majestic forest of Athol forming, with the lofty and cloud-capped range of the Grampians in the distance, a splendid background to the picture. The main entrance, from which the castle is distant about half a mile, fronts the high road from Perth, and is a massive turreted structure, one of the few remaining relics of the old feudal times. The scenery in the neighbourhood is extremely wild and romantic: deep ravines, through which the mountain streams find their way to the Tummel or the Garry; lofty craggy peaks appearing at a distance like a sheer thread running down the precipitous sides of the mountains; dark masses of larch and fir, and the bold and naked crags towering above all, form a combination of natural beauties which have rendered this portion of the Highlands deservedly celebrated.

The historical recollections connected with the castle are extremely interesting. In 1644 it was besieged by Montrose, who experienced a very unexpected resistance on the part of the brave men by whom it was garrisoned, which compelled him to retire. In 1653, Colonel Daniel, one of Oliver Cromwell's generals, marched against it with a numerous and well-appointed army, and eventually succeeded in taking it by storm. It afterwards, when under the command of Sir Andrew Agnew, stood a long and vigorous siege, against the troops of the Pretender immediately preceding the battle of Culloden, which compelled the assailing party to raise the siege. But the most striking event in which it formed a prominent part was the well-known and bloody battle of Killiecrankie between Lord Dundee and the Government forces, under the command of General Mackay.

The castle, with the rides and drives surrounding it, has an air of the most perfect seclusion and repose.

The gardens extend along the Tay, and command the most delightful and picturesque views. In the immediate vicinity, several thousand acres of forest trees were planted between forty and fifty years ago, greatly improving and ornamenting the scenery around the Duke's domain. On the opposite side of the Tay, is Birnam Hill, the lower part of which was covered with trees in the time of Macbeth, and now celebrated for its blue slate quarries. The extensive lawn on which the castle stands, is nearly 450 feet above the level of the sea at Perth. On the river Burn, about three miles from the village of Blair, there are several beautiful cascades, one of which is between 150 and 200 feet in height.

Our engraving represents the Falls of Fender, in the grounds of Blair Castle: three falls are formed by a burn falling into the water of Tilt; they have been visited by her Majesty, attended by Lady Glenlyon.

The village of Blair, with the entry of the Royal party; and a group of cottages in the neighbourhood; are engraved in this page.

MONUMENT TO GRACE DARLING.

Upon no occasion has the public sympathy been more worthily excited than by the untimely fate of Grace Darling; and, to perpetuate these sentiments, as well as to awaken kindred courage, and cherish kindred virtue, in the breasts of future generations, it has been resolved to erect a monument to the memory of the gentle maiden. Mr. Davies, the sculptor, of Newcastle, has received the commission to execute this interesting but unostentatious memorial, to be placed in St. Cuthbert's Chapel, on Fern Island. It will be, as the engraving shows, a cippus, of stone, six feet in height; with the cross of St. Cuthbert, and the following inscription:

MONUMENT TO GRACE DARLING.

To the Memory of
GRACE DORSEY DARLING,
A Native of Edinburgh,
And an Inhabitant
Of these Islands;
Who Died Oct. 26th, A.D. 1843,
Aged 26 Years.

Pious and pure, modest and yet so brave,
Though young so wise, though meek so resolute.

Oh! that winds and waves could speak
Of things which their united power could teach
From the pure depths of her humanity!
A maiden gentle, yet, at duty's call,
Firm and undimmed as the lighthouse reared
On the island-rock, her lonely dwelling-place;
Or like the invincible rock itself that braves,
Age after age, the hostile elements,
As when it guarded holy Cuthbert's cell—
All night the storm had raged, nor ceased, nor paused,
When, as day broke, the maid, through misty air,
Kissed far off a wreck, and the surf,
Beating on one of those disastrous isles—
Half of a vessel, half—no more; the rest
Had vanished!

NEW CHURCH, NEAR OSWESTRY.

Impure examples of the Norman style of architecture are becoming nearly as abundant as "carpenter's Gothic," among our new churches. The specimen here engraved is, however, a meritorious exception to the above architectural delinquency: it is pure Norman; and, although it will contain 480 sittings, the actual cost of the structure will be £1450, which is a small sum. We mention this circumstance as a set-off to the plea so frequently urged in extension of the poverty of the pseudo Norman and Gothic churches of our day—disproportionate funds. Now, here is an instance of preserving strict architectural character at a comparatively small cost, which is highly creditable to the skill of the architects, the Messrs. Pearsons, of Oswestry, from whose design, and under whose superintendence, the above church has been erected.

This interesting edifice has just been completed in the village of Llanymynech, near Oswestry; the funds having been raised by private subscription, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels. It is constructed entirely of stone, with the exception of the arches and ornamental portions, which are of moulded fire-brick: the roof is covered with grey tiles. The tower is very characteristic in its details: at the apex of the roof is a round ball, whence spring the vane and weathercock. There is a chancel, which is no shown in our view.

The interior has little decoration. The roof is open. All the seats are open, but are provided with low backs.

EXTRAORDINARY PARCEL BY THE POST-OFFICE.—Last week, one of the most extraordinary packages, ever sent through the same medium, reached the post-office of Glasgow. This was no other than a parcel containing some fifteen or twenty live frogs. The contents of the parcel were discovered by two or three of them jumping out at the post-office. The frogs, it is believed, were of the Egyptian or some other rare species, and were addressed to Dr. Buchanan, of Moor-place, in that city. They reached their destination in safety.

COTTAGES AT BLAIR ATHOL.

DONCASTER RACES.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF THE LEGER DAY.

Among the truest of all aphorisms is that which declares "there is a tide in the affairs of men." According to historians, the popular flood sets from east to west—at all events, that is the way the stream of gentility flows in the great metropolis. Occasionally, of course, there are exceptions to the general rule, as to all others—the latest variation it is our purpose to treat of in these presents. During the current week the north has been the fashionable point of the compass. The Court is away in bonny Scotland, exchanging the regal for the rural purple—"pomp and circumstance" for health and heather—the imperious ermine for the dun deer's spoil. But all this is to be a sealed book to the million; it is the Queen's pleasure that none intrude on the privacy of her Highland home; and shall not that wish be our law? Turn we then to another northern tryst, where the public was welcome in the exact ratio of its extent. Our scene is Doncaster Races—a rare rendezvous, such as erst it was in the time of the autocrats, the Fitzwilliams, the Harewoods, and similar worthies. The meeting of 1844 was the most brilliant within moderate memory. The recent fomentation of the turf has left it more bright and sparkling than ever; things had come to the worst and they have mended.

On Monday last the Great Northern Meeting commenced, and ended yesterday. Our affair, however, is with its principal feature, the renowned Leger, and, consequently, the time of action is limited to one day. This was Tuesday—which somewhat heavily, with clouds, brought on the fortunes and misfortunes of full many that in anxiety witnessed its dawn. By a very early hour the human tide had begun to flow, and long before noon it was high water—hot water in the rooms. There all who could were betting—these to make their book, those "to mend it, or be rid on't," (which means "going for the gloves"). All sorts of casualties had been busy with the field, so that, at the last hour, out of 109 entries, only the poor units remained—and nine were declared to start. First of these was the Curé, a goodly steed, though small (and having an ungainly right foot withal), backed at even to win, and next him Foigh-a-Ballagh, the champion of Ireland, alone, just before the race, at 3 to 1. Others also had friends at miscellaneous estimates, as will also here be seen. Precisely at three of the afternoon clock the coursers began to appear—among the first being the pair aforesaid—"Foigh" looking as like a clipper as anything lately exhibited in horse-flesh. Thus, the cynosure of all accounts, the "nine" paraded before the stand, and eventually passed it for the great essay in the following order:—Foigh-a-Ballagh, first by a length; The Curé, The Princess, Lightning, Red Deer, the Amulet colt; Bay Mornus, Little Hampton, and Godfrey. The usual functionary started them, the matter being too unimportant to call for the aid of my Lord Bentinck. Godfrey made what they called the running, which was a bad substitute for an exercise gallop; in fact, the speed all through was, as Jim Robinson called it, "paltry." Of course, the lot came together to the straight ground. There Foigh-a-Ballagh was in front, with the Curé on his quarters outside, and the brace began to do their endeavour in earnest. Both were flagged—the latter deserving all he got, for he bolted half-a-dozen lengths from home, and finished a cur as well as a loser. The Princess was a good third. Her gallant owner called for an investigation of the winner's mouth in the morning. Won't there be wigs upon the green if requests like these are to become common? There is a story of a Parisian and a Gascon who were playing a game of piquet, together when the Frenchman exclaimed, "Hullo, monsieur! you're cheating!" "Very likely," replied the provincial, with a horrible face, "very probable; but, observe, I don't like to be told so." Unless we are wrong, here and there men will be found who won't relish an imputation

THE NEW COMET DISCOVERED ON SUNDAY LAST—See page 191.

The Ven. Charles Parr Barry, F.R.S., F.S.A., Archdeacon of St. Albans, president of the section, took the chair, and addressed the meeting in advocacy of the interesting character of the remains of the Mediseval Age (from the Conversion of the Saxons to the time of Henry VIII.).

The first paper was one by W. Hatcher, Esq., of Salisbury: the subject an illustrated model of Old Sarum. The model was beautifully executed on the scale of two chains to the inch, and represented Sarum a fortified town in the time of the ancient Britons.

Dr. Spry then laid before the section a pencil drawing of a presumed fresco painting in Lenham Church. This was found during some repairs which were done to the church. The subject was allegorical, and represented an angel weighing two souls (a good and a bad one), and the sinner seeking forgiveness of the Virgin Mary, and the whole was highly emblematical of the covenant of mercy displayed in the New Testament. In the course of his remarks the Doctor vindicated the clergy from the charge which was frequently made against them of keeping back the truths of the Bible from the masses of the people. The charge was not correct. The price was the prohibition.

A desultory conversation followed, in the course of which some severe remarks were made upon the spoliation now going on in many ecclesiastical edifices, chiefly through the ignorance and caprice of churchwardens, to whom their care was too often entrusted.

A paper was then read by Mr. Woollaston, on the frescoes in East Wickham Church, drawings of which he obtained, after much difficulty and opposition on the part of a person who had paid a fee for liberty to erect a mural tablet, by which the paintings would be inevitably destroyed.

This led to the adoption of two resolutions, in pursuance of which letters were immediately despatched, to prevent, if possible, the erection of the monument against the walls of the antique church of East Wickham. Dr. Buckland also stated, under the authority of Mr. Hawkins, of the British Museum, that Llanthony Church, Brecknockshire, famous for its antiquity, was about to be pulled down; and that ancient ecclesiastical edifices had been turned into a public-house, and then despoiled, as is part of the monastery of St. Augustine, at Canterbury, now used as a brew-house.

An account of "Ecclesiastical Embroidery in the Reign of Edward III.," with drawings of conventional patterns and figures, by the Rev. C. H. Hartshorn, was then read. Specimens of beautiful tapestry, elegantly embroidered on rich Genoa velvet, were produced, and illustrated. The rev. gentleman hoped the day would soon arrive when the fingers of the ladies of England, instead of working the coarse wools of Germany, would be employed in this elegant art, which was early learned, but had been erroneously reported to have been lost, to the present generation. The address was ardently applauded by the ladies, who formed the greater part of the assembly.

A paper on the "Burke and Badge of the Ancient House of Peilham," was read by J. R. Flanché, Esq., and was well received; as was also a lengthy, and apparently learned, production, on the "Succession of William of Arc," by Thomas Stapleton, Esq., F.S.A., after which the assembly separated, some to visit the magnificent Cathedral, and others to the collection of curiosities of Dr. Faussett, both which have been thrown open to the members of the Institution.

The evening meeting at the Guildhall was more crowded than at any preceding sitting. The Rev. Robert Willis, M.A., F.R.S., Jacksonian Professor, Cambridge, and president of the Architectural Section, took the chair at eight o'clock, and proceeded to read a translation of an account of the destruction of Canterbury Cathedral by fire, and its rebuilding; written by Geivase, a monk of Canterbury, who flourished in the thirteenth century, whose opinions the rev. gentleman most ably sustained. The reading of the translation excited much movement, the quaintness of style and expression being carefully preserved; and the comments of the president were much applauded.

Dr. Buckland, during a desultory conversation which ensued, stated some facts, which, coming from so high an authority, deserve serious attention. Two instances had come to his knowledge of churches having been destroyed by spontaneous combustion, caused by guano having accumulated, in consequence of birds being allowed to fly through the towers. On visiting the Cathedral of Canterbury this day, he saw at least fifty pigeons flying through as many broken windows in the tower. If such a state of things were allowed to continue, and a storm arise, it was his opinion that the ancient edifice would be in great danger of being set on fire.

Other papers were read by different members, when the assembly departed to a conservatory at Barnes' Rooms, which was kept up until a late hour.

FOURTH DAY.

The interesting locality of Richborough, fully described in THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS, No. 77, page 259, was visited, to-day, by the members. The Dean of Hereford, Dr. Buckland, Dr. Spry, Mr. Bateman, and other eminent gentlemen joined the party. After the inspection of the ruins and excavations, a visit was paid to the mansion of John Godfrey, Esq., of Brook-street House, at Ash, near Wingham, and eventually to Barfreston. The rich sculpture of this venerable church, and especially its richly-ornamented doorway, excited universal admiration.

In the evening, under the guidance of Doctor Buckland and R. Smith, Esq., a visit was paid to the collection of Dr. G. Faussett. The objects principally embraced rather illustrations of the state of the arts in the Anglo-Roman and early Saxon epochs.

Mr. W. J. Taylor has struck a medal in commemoration of the first annual meeting of the Association. On the obverse side is the inscription "British Archaeological Association, 1843," and upon the reverse the inscription "First Meeting, Canterbury, 1844—Lord Albert Conyngham, President," which encircles the arms of the city.

FIFTH DAY.

The members of the Historical Section met. Amongst others previously noticed were—T. Amyot, Esq.; T. C. Croker, Esq.; W. H. Amner, Esq.; G. P. R. James, Esq.; P. Cunningham, Esq.; J. O. Halliwell, Esq., F.R.S., F.S.A.; and several other eminent literary gentlemen. The noble President, Lord A. Conyngham, in the chair.

The Secretary, T. C. Croker, Esq., read a letter from Miss Halstead, relative to the history of the Reculvers in the time of Richard III.

Mr. Halliwell described some curious manuscripts he had that morning found in the Cathedral.

Mr. John Barrow, a paper upon the State of the Navy in the time of the eighth Henry.

Mr. Croker, upon the "Autobiography of Robert Boyle, Earl of Cork and Ossory," on which it was a severe critique.

Mr. T. Wright, upon the Civic Archives of Canterbury, detailing several curious entries, illustrative of ancient times, manners, and customs. After which, a few other papers of minor interest were read, and the meeting adjourned until the evening, when a Mummy, said to have been brought from Thebes by Colonel Needham, was opened at the theatre. The leading families of the neighbourhood were present.

T. J. Pettigrew, Esq., F.R.S., F.S.A., after a lucid address, proceeded to the unearthing. This was performed after much delay and difficulty, and the subject declared to be Har, the son of Unfer, the son of the House of Sakena-Eb.

LAST DAY.

The whole of the business of Saturday consisted in the adoption of gratulatory motions to the several executive members; after which, a vote of thanks was passed to the noble chairman, and the interesting proceedings terminated.

During the week, the members of the Association visited the objects of antiquity with which the city of Canterbury abounds. Our space being limited, we have not room to note the whole of the antiquities inspected. We, however, furnish the following original information respecting three of the most ancient of them, which will prove interesting from the fact of their state up to the present time being presented to our readers.

The monastery of St. Augustine is commonly believed to have been founded originally by the saint whose name it bears; and in one of the works in the library of the Cathedral, it is stated that "the ground thereupon to build was given by grant to Augustine by King Ethelbert, for dedication to St. Peter and St. Paul." By later records we find that St. Dunstan, in the year 978, renewed that dedication, adding to those of the Apostles above named that of St. Augustine.

Up to the present day, the history of this monastery is exceedingly curious. At the dissolution of religious houses, Henry VIII. "seized upon it," we are told, "as a palace for himself." Queen Mary afterwards granted it to Cardinal Pole for life. Having reverted to the Crown at the death of Pole, Elizabeth, in 1573, paid a visit to the city of Canterbury, and kept her court within the walls of this edifice. Lord Wotton subsequently became possessor of the monastery, and here it was that Charles II. was entertained at the Restoration.

STAIRCASE IN THE CONVENTUAL BUILDINGS, CANTERBURY.

At the present day, this building is a magnificent ruin. The west front stretches along 250 feet, and the walls, including an area of about fourteen acres, are still in part standing. For some years the chief building adjoining the ancient gateway has been occupied as a public-house; and the gateway itself, with a splendid room, the ceiling of which is very curiously painted, has been for some time used as a brew-house, and the painting miserably defaced by the smoke and steam. The landlady has turned the great court-yard into a bowling-green, the fine chapel adjoining the north of the church into a fire-court, and the great room over the gate into a cockpit. We are, however, glad to learn that these acts of Vandalism are at an end in this case. To preserve from complete destruction so noble an edifice, the ruins of which are consecrated by the religion of our forefathers, has been the object of the honourable member for Maidstone, Mr. Hope, who has purchased the estate for the express purpose of preserving it from further demolition and desecration, and restoring its pristine beauty.

Proceeding westward, from the ruins of St. Augustine's Monastery, we reached the brow of a hill upon which stands the venerable church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, celebrated as the building in which Queen Bertha is said to have had the service of religion performed to herself and her Christian attendants, by her chaplain Luthard, before the arrival of the Roman missionary. Here also Augustine first performed mass, and King Ethelbert is said to have worshipped.

ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH, NEAR CANTERBURY.

The body of this interesting church—now under substantial repair—is built of Roman bricks and flint stones, strongly cemented with a concrete matter, which we found to be quite as hard, if not harder, than the flint portion itself. Upon entering the church by the eastern door, we found the masonry of the period when it was built, for the authorities could not exactly agree in our hearing, whether its erection preceded the Saxon invasion or not. The opinion most general was consonant with that hitherto credited, that it was built of the materials, if not upon the site, of a Roman edifice: the masonry has been carefully restored, and every provision has been made to prevent the original from being marred by the mixture of modern masonry. The ancient font, which it is pretended is the identical one used at the baptism of King Ethelbert, is now being cleaned prior to its being again used in the sacrament of baptism. The inscriptions, which are of great antiquity, have been carefully preserved. One in the old black letter character, engraved in brass, is inserted in a mural stone, of which the following is a copy:—

MEDAL OF THE BRITISH ARCHAEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

Pray for the Soules of Stebyn Sawrs and Alps his wife the which decessed the 7 day of May M.CCCC.CC.CC. and sex, on whose soules Et have mercy. Amen.

St. Pancras Chapel is an edifice of great antiquity, situate on the eastern side of St. Augustine's Monastery. The materials and architecture appear to be Roman, and from the most ancient records of the city deposited in the ecclesiastical archives to which we had access through the liberality of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral, we perceive that the tradition is that this was King Ethelbert's private chapel in which he worshipped his ancestral gods before his conversion to Christianity.

(For the two engravings, the ruins of the Augustine Monastery, and the fine Anglo-Norman staircase, acknowledgment is due to the publishers of the Journey Book of Kent, of which work they form illustrations. This volume is one of the series, to be entitled The Journey Book of England, which we hope to see completed; for the portion already published, is unquestionably, the best work of its class: the information is correct, and sufficiently copious for any reasonable tourist, without being tediously minute.)

THE ROYAL VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

WE have still the gratifying task of recording the daily pursuits and amusements of the Sovereign in the mountain retreat to which she and her illustrious Consort have repaired in merry and romantic Scotland. It must be gratifying to every loyal subject to find that an opportunity has arisen to enable her Majesty to recruit her health and strength after a perilous period, and to relax from the heavy duties and responsibilities which attach to royalty, even where the Sovereign rules over a loyal people. It has been said that, "uneasy lies the head which wears a crown," and doubtless such must be the case when a kingdom is torn by domestic discord, or agitated by foreign commotion; but it must not be supposed that the task is an easy one, in cases where, as in the instance of our beloved Queen, her sway is one of peace and love. In the best of times, the ruler of a nation like England, which excites the jealousy, if not the hatred, of foreign nations, from her very power and influence, there are various difficulties to contend against. Of late, too, there have been many portending symptoms of evil—"war, horrid war," has been the theme of every tongue. At one time the danger seemed imminent. Such was the complication of events, such the malignity of a small faction in a neighbouring state, that at one time it seemed almost impossible to avoid war without incurring a consequence almost as disastrous—the loss of honour. But, happily, under the beneficent auspices of Providence, wise and moderate councils have had the ascendancy both in France and England, and peace is likely to be perpetuated. It is true that, according to the French papers last received, impotent and unworthy attempts are still made to raise doubts of the continuance of the good understanding between France and Morocco; but we look upon such demonstrations as the last dying struggles of desperate men to effect their object of creating mischief. These displays of petty spite and bitterness only serve to prove the danger of the crisis which has passed, and at the same time confirm our supposition that the Sovereign and the Ministry have had of late weighty cares and anxious forebodings to contend with. We repeat, therefore, that it must be matter for unmixed gratification that our gracious Sovereign has not been prevented from throwing aside for awhile the cares of state, and is able to enjoy a privilege scarcely denied to the humblest in the land—that of enjoying the luxuries of ease and retirement, and reaping the advantage of recruited health and strength, from change of air and scene, and cessation from the daily routine of toil and anxiety.

The correspondents of some of the daily papers, individuals for the most part, exceedingly clever in making news out of everything, have been fairly puzzled to fill up a letter with a record of the daily proceedings of the Queen. Thus, one of these gentlemen says:—

Were it not for the anxiety which naturally pervades all classes of her Majesty's subjects to hear of the welfare of their Sovereign, and the interest excited by her Majesty's present mode of life, there is as little variety in this tranquil routine, that the daily movements of the Royal party are scarcely of sufficient importance to be chronicled.

Now, it must be candidly admitted that it is a sad thing for a journalist, when there is a paucity of startling events, and when it is almost impossible to discover any "moving accidents by flood or field;" but in this case we believe that our brethren generally will rejoice in the circumstance. For ourselves, we are unfeignedly glad that one great object for which her Majesty travelled to Scotland has been achieved, and that she is able to enjoy that "tranquil routine" which, after the many exciting events to which we have alluded, the Queen must so ardently desire. Nor do we agree with some of the carping spirits who object sometimes that unimportant and seemingly frivolous incidents connected with the Court and "the World of Fashion," are chronicled with minuteness. A people so attached as the English to their Queen, naturally take an interest in ascertaining her daily habits and pursuits, not from vulgar curiosity, or from a desire to intrude upon the privacy of the domestic circle, but rather to admire, if not to imitate, the judgment and good sense which prompt the most illustrious of the land to set a good example at home. It is in England only that the magic words "at home" are thoroughly understood. Greatness does not always exist merely of the "pride, pomp, and circumstance," of splendour and festivity; but, as in the case of the "good Queen Charlotte," rank may be even more ennobled by the exercise of piety, and the proper performance of domestic duties. Our gracious Queen, following so good an example, fulfils with dignity not only the duties imposed upon her by the State, but, what is almost of equal importance, she is exemplary in the performance of those of an attached wife and mother. If "trifles make the sum of human bliss," so do apparently trivial and monotonous pursuits form, in the aggregate, tasks of importance. With these views, we do not regard with indifference the innocent, but unexciting, routine of her Majesty's daily life in Scotland; but we rather derive pleasure from the reflection that a Queen may for a time throw aside the tracasseries and pomps of royalty, to indulge in healthful and innocent "rural felicity," and the delights of a happy domestic circle.

The "simple annals" of the Royal visit to Athol may disappoint those who delight in excitement and stirring incident; but yet these unpretending records of the amusements of a Queen, and an accomplished English lady, must, nevertheless, interest all who admire true dignity when allied to unaffected simplicity, courtesy, and good-breeding.

BARRY, THE CLOWN, ON THE THAMES.

NOVEL FEAT ON THE RIVER THAMES.

Talk of Apollo and his team
Of winged horses, by which phrase
We mean his swans, we more esteem
And give approval in our days
To him who, by the aid of geese,
Has sail'd up good old Father Thames,
And prov'd a new, unheard-of use,
Of pie-bald feathers:—writing names
In Hist'ry's Album falls of this—
But not being Scotch, no "second sight"
May we s'er hope-for of the bliss-
Ful pleasure of unmixed delight
Of seeing one with music borne along
By some Goose quills, the trumpet stops of song!—ANNA.

On Monday last, "the Silent Highway" (as Old Father Thames has been portically named), was scared from its propriety by the performance of an eccentric feat of very rare, though not unprecedented enactment. Mr. Barry, one of the clowns at Astley's theatre, to give écclat to his "Benefit," on Monday evening, announced his intention of sailing from Vauxhall-bridge to Westminster-bridge in a washing-tub, drawn by four geese. The crowd assembled to witness this strange undertaking, was very great. The road from the new Houses of Parliament to Thames-bank was almost impassable, and an immense number of persons stationed themselves upon the wharfs and barges. The opposite shore, particularly Bishop's-walk, was also thronged, and for long before the hour fixed upon a number of boats filled with anxious spectators rowed up to Vauxhall-bridge, and took up favourable positions. At about half-past three o'clock Mr. Barry, in his clown's dress, and accompanied by several of his friends, arrived at the bridge, and all things being prepared, he stepped into his tub and proceeded on his "voyage." The tide being in his favour he went along smoothly enough, and he had but little difficulty in making the geese swim in their proper course. An immense number of boats accompanied this strange water party, and the intrepid voyager having disembarked at Westminster-bridge amidst loud cheers, proceeded to the theatre.

A similar feat was performed on the Thames, several years since by Usher, the celebrated clown.

NEW THEATRE ROYAL, MANCHESTER.—John Knowles, jun., Esq., lessee of the late Theatre Royal, at Manchester, has just completed his purchase of the site and buildings of the late Wellington Hotel and Carriage Bazaar, in Peter-street, whereon he proposes to erect the new Theatre Royal. The architects appointed are Messrs. Irwin and Chester, who are preparing designs for the structure. The estimated expense is £17,000, and it is calculated that the new theatre will be opened by Christmas. The style of decoration will be that of the age of Francis I., closely resembling the style of the Princess' Theatre, Oxford-street. All the most recent improvements in general construction and stage detail will be introduced in the new edifice, for the purpose of insuring which the proprietors of the principal London theatres have liberally afforded the Manchester architects every facility.

DEATH OF MR. ROSS.—Mr. Ross, who was a great favourite at the theatres on the Surrey side of the water, died on Friday week. A little before the Christmas of last year he was engaged by Mr. Webster for the Liverpool Theatre. On the journey thither he caught a severe cold, dangerous symptoms appeared, and in May he returned to London. At his own request he was conveyed to Guy's Hospital, where his case received every attention. He expired about twenty minutes to seven on Friday night. It is a curious fact that he had a presentiment upon the subject, and declared that he should no

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday.

The Emperor Abderrahman may be said to reign absolute monarch over the empire of our infatigable Parisians. The fashion—the vulgar—the rage is Morocco. Not only has it led to the deposition of the lawful Sovereign, but to that of the "Police." The new dance, the "Marocaine," with its curious steps, and still more eccentric music, is said to be destined to reign paramount this winter with our dancing deities of the "fantastic toe."

Louis Philippe still intends coming to England about the 5th of October; but he will wait for fair weather to cross over. Great is the contest at Court amongst those who wish to accompany him. He has about him officers with great names of olden time, which would sound well at Windsor—such as the Duke of Praslin, Peerage, the Count de la Rochefoucauld, &c.; but the heroes of the Empire and Republic looked the preference. However, a real aristocracy being one of the necessities of France, the acute royal statesman has availed himself of the victory in Morocco to create a Duke in the person of Marshal Bugeaud. The Duke of July is the first creation of the present reign which has been openly announced. The Duke of Nemours, and that of duc de Nemours were secret creations secretly enregistered at the Chamber of Peers. However, the anxiety for titles is greater than ever, although by the new French law any one can assume them; and the establishment at Versailles of the Hall of the Crusades, where all the old names of France are enregistered, and their ancestors portrayed, has given a new impulse to ancestral taint.

All is prepared for Louis Philippe's trip. Admiral La Suse has been to Portsmouth to choose an anchorage. The manufacturers of the Gobelins, and of Sevres, and the jewellers have furnished the supply of presents for the occasion, and nothing has been neglected to make the rapid passage of the Citizen King as bright as that of a meteor.

Within the last few days Paris has become crowded by a concourse of lovely women, not the habitual élégantes and beautés of Paris, but beauties of far more blooming complexion. The provinces have furnished this tribute of curiosity to the French Babylon, and amongst the new comers are especially observed a numerous body of the fair daughters of Albion. When weather permits, the gardens and temples of pleasure in the outskirts are their rendezvous. The Jard de France, on the island at Belleville, where the Parisian rockers go to celebrate their marriage feasts, is about to disappear, in the improvements of the capital, and other celebrated places of suburban réceptions have declined—the Champs Elysées absorb the gay crowd. Speculating on this point, and not satisfied with that most picturesque Assemblée of France, the Cirque Olympique, its elegant amphitheatre, and three thousand seats, a new edifice is now to be erected for performances in the open air, as in the days of the Greeks and Romans, to contain 12,000 spectators! A Stadium, 250 feet long, and 100 broad, will allow of efficient chariot races, as well as the introduction of modern hunts to the life, and gladiatorial combats. But, in the meantime, it is at the Jardin Marabout, in these al fresco terrestrial Elysian fields of Paris, that, during the fine weather, the Académie of Paris assemble as they did in London, at Ranelagh and Marlborough gardens, in the days of Charles II. It is there that wit assembles, who chronicle the gay doings of Paris, in the vein of Horace Walpole.

The Champs Elysées have become the cynosure of the French fashionable world. All that is distinguished in rank, genius, and art, are crowding to its dazzling pavements. Comparatively a short time since, this spot was deserted and dangerous; the homeless and the wretched here scraped from the view of Parisian splendour. The Columbus of this new splendid place was a horse-dealer. Here have palaces arisen which may rival the boasted architectural splendour of a Palace. Each day some new celebrity joins the ranks of the exclusives of the Champs Elysées. Here reside in magnificent palaces Lady Cowley, Marshall Sebastiani, the Duchesse d'Albani, the Princesse Bagration, here is the splendid hotel of the Baron de Manteuffel; further removed is the beautiful hermitage erected by General de Montalivet, and the hotel of the Princesse de Ligne, the Ambraser of Belgium, and Duc Charles de Brunswick. The celebrated marine painter occupies the mansion of M. de Beaupré, the celebrated dentier. The Champs Elysées will quickly unite the high fashion of your boasted Belgrave-square with the refined elegance of your Regent-park.

One of those amongst the foreign residents whose expenditure has contributed most to the splendour of the Parisians, the opulent American, Mr. T—n, with his handsome wife and daughters, is said to be about the point of leaving the capital of pleasure. His name will long be associated with the reminiscences of many a life and many an anecdote. One of the most amusing of the latter is the following: Alphonse Karr, the author of the satirical monthly periodical The Wasp, turned into the side of the first gorgeous life of the American millionaire. He soon after gave one still more splendid, under the auspices of the Procureur de V—, thanks to whose mediation the whole Faubourg of St. Germain flocked to Mr. T's hall. Foremost amongst the guests was the Duc de Nemours. To the latter's astonishment the Amphitryon fixed upon him the most indignantly useful look, with which he followed him wherever he moved. This lasted so long that the Duc could bear it no more, and walking up to the master of the house, he begged to know whether he had been so unfortunate to have given him some offence. "Offence, indeed!" exclaimed Mr. T. "have you not written the most scurrilous prison-mistress, wife, and daughters?" The Duc was thunderstruck. Fortunately the Princesse de V. intervened, and explained to the worthy Jonathan that he had only heard the last syllable of the Duc's name—that the author of the satire was Alphonse Karr, and that this was the Duc d'Esters.

Time and space are wanting, or else I should record a thousand floating topics of conversation in Paris, such as the appearance at the Grand Opera of two savages, brought from the wilds of Brazil; and the new translation of "Hamlet," read a few nights since at a grand soirée at Victor Hugo's.

FRANCE.

Neither the French papers, nor our private letters from Paris contain any news of consequence this week. The opposition press is still engaged in concerning M. Guizot for concluding peace with the Emperor of Morocco on such terms. Their attacks, however, do not seem to excite much attention even in Paris, and as still less interest would attach to them here, we shall not make any extracts from their voluminous commentaries. Another subject which engages the attention of our Paris contemporaries is the Repeal Dinner given to O'Connell. Last, but not least, is the approaching visit of Lord Palmerston to Paris. The journals insist that the noble lord has some political object in view. The Solier speaks with particular confidence on this point.

The seigneur de Nemours of the 11th inst. publishes accounts from Algiers of the 16th. The news of the conclusion of peace with Morocco, which arrived on the preceding night, had been hailed with considerable satisfaction. On the 11th some Moorish horsemen presented themselves at the camp of General Lamoricière, near Beni-Mansour. They were the bearers of letters from several chiefs, and from the Emperor's son himself, demanding a suspension of hostilities, and announcing that Abderrahman was entirely disposed to subscribe to the conditions of France, and that a negotiation to that effect was then proceeding at Tangier. All the letters from the West declare that Abd-el-Kader had not appeared on the Algerian territory. Some of them positively state that the Korair was still in Morocco, and that the Emperor had pledged himself to remove him into the interior, and confine him in a fortress, in whatever part of his empire France might require. The Nemours states, which arrived at Toulon on the 10th, brought the news captured at the battle of July.

M. de St. Arnaud has arrived in Paris from his estate in Périgord, and is to leave in a few days for England to receive the King, who is expected to embark on the 3d of October at Toulon, with two of his ministers, and probably one of his sons. The remainder of the royal family is to stop at the Château d'Eu.

The Revue de Paris announces that the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London had written a most respectful letter to the King of the French, inviting him to an entertainment in the city. "The King," it says, "was extremely grateful for that mark of attention on the part of that celebrated corporation, but declined accepting the invitation, on account of his health and the shortness of his stay in England. His Majesty would have gone to London had it been possible to avoid the ceremony of a formal reception. The King wishes that, in the present circumstances, his journey to England should preserve the character of a mere visit from one Sovereign to another."

According to letters from Rome of the 5th inst., the Pope had signed on the preceding day the dispensations necessary previous to the union of the Duke d'Angoulême with Princess Caroline of Naples, his cousin-german.

Accounts from Toulon of the 18th inst. announce, that the schooner Etoile had been despatched on a mission to Tunis. It was believed that she was the bearer of an order to Admiral Paschal de Paoli to return to Toulon with the naval division under his command.

A severe storm of thunder, accompanied with hail, has visited Marseilles, Toulon, Bordeaux, Bayonne, and several other places in the south of France, where it has done immense damage to the vintage. The vintage this year is very plentiful, and it is said that the wine promises to be of excellent quality.

The Moniteur contains a despatch from Rear-Admiral Gourbeyre, Governor of Guadaloupe, in which the damage occasioned by the late fire at La Baasette is estimated at 2,100,000. It had been ascertained that the fire broke out accidentally, and that no lives were lost.

The Toulonnais contains an article upon the subject of the treaty concluded between France and Morocco, in the course of which it expresses great doubts as to the duration of the peace. The Toulonnais also announces that the Prince de Joinville was daily expected in Toulon harbour, where great preparations have been made to receive him. The same journal states that Abd-el-Kader was encamped in the valley of the Waddi-Asia, between Oudjda and Taza, 20 leagues from the Algerian frontier.

The following interesting account of the circumstances which preceded the signing of the treaty between France and Morocco, may be considered as the official French version of the transaction.

"The Pasha of Larache, Sidi-Bon-Sellam, made the first overtures on the 5th inst., when he wrote, in the name of the Emperor, a letter containing the most pacific assurances, and in which he declared that his master, who, notwithstanding the hostilities, had not ceased to be our friend, was disposed to subscribe to all our conditions. The Consul-General of the Two Sicilies, M. Martineau, undertook to carry that letter to the Prince de Joinville. He embarked in the steamer Var, and sailed at Cadix on the 6th. Sidi-Bon-Sellam had already given us many proofs of his duplicity, and the Prince could therefore place little confidence in his letter. He hesitated, however, to ascertain, before entering into any negotiations, the extent and nature of the powers which the Princesse had received from the Sultan. The Prince consequently ordered evening of the 6th. Mons. Warner, and Mons. Martineau, who was returning to his consular post, took passage in her. They reached the roads of Tangier on the 7th. M. Martineau went ashore, where he was met by the Kaid, who had been sent to await his orders. The moment the Monsieur functionary heard of the presence of a French envoy in the roads, he mounted his horse, and rode to the Pasha's camp, to apprise him of the fact. At nine o'clock the Pasha and the Kaid came into town, and called on the Consul of Naples, who shortly afterwards caused a signal, previously agreed upon, to be hoisted on the terrace of his house. M. Warner immediately landed, and was received at the Manoir by the civil and military authorities of the place. Troops of a rather good appearance lined the passage from the pier to the Caishah. The Kaid, in saluting him, exhausted the entire vocabulary of eastern compliments, and the cottage, preceded and followed by a guard of soldiers, commenced its march. The population seemed favourably disposed, and the women uttered the joyful cry, so well known in Algeria, which is peculiar to the women of the Barbary coast. A post of honour was under arms at the gate of the Caishah. Sidi-Bon-Sellam received M. Warner as an old acquaintance, and when the latter had informed him that he was instructed to verify the full powers with which he said he was invested, the Pasha expressed his regret at not having demanded a special letter to that effect from the Emperor. But, being anxious to obviate an inconvenience, that the distance at which the Emperor was then from Tangier rendered irreparable, the Pasha affirmed, in an act duly drawn up and written in the presence of witnesses, that he had been ordered to treat with the French Plenipotentiary. According to Monsieur Warner, the word "order," used by the Pasha, indicates, both that the negotiator, in the name of the Prince, is furnished with full powers, and that he has no responsibility to incur. M. Warner and Sidi-Bon-Sellam parted on the best possible terms; at 2 o'clock the Corier put to sea, and returned to Cadix. The act, signed by the Pasha, was deemed sufficient by our negotiators, to show that the Pasha was empowered to treat, and, on the 9th, the whole of the French fleet sailed from Cadix for Tangier, where it arrived at 10 o'clock on the following morning. The Kaid Abou, Governor of Tangier, repaired on board the Suffren, and renewed, on the part of the Pasha, his application for peace. The Prince received with distinction the Kaid Abou, a brave soldier, who, on the 6th of August last, was appointed by public acclamation governor of the place and commander of the garrison. The Prince presented him with a pair of pistols, as a token of remembrance of our attack and his courageous resistance. At two o'clock M. Warner, accompanied by M. Augier, an avoué, a quatuor-master, and a sub-officer of the marine, landed at Tangier, and submitted the treaty to the approval of the Pasha, who did not hesitate an instant to accept it. A signal flag was then hoisted on the Neapolitan consular house, when Mons. de Glücksberg and de Nyon landed and repaired to the palace of the governor, with whom they definitively signed the treaty at five o'clock that evening. Our flag hoisted on the palace of France, was immediately saluted with twenty-one guns."

The Duke of Glücksberg arrived in Paris on Monday. He is said to have brought the original treaty concluded with the Emperor Abderrahman of Morocco, and to have come to obtain the ratification of the King of the French, with which he is to return to Tangier.

Since writing the above the following news has been received from Paris by express:—

"Prince de Joinville arrived in Cadix on the 18th inst., with a part of his squadron."

"Information was received at Perpignan on the 22nd, that a revolutionary movement had been made at Carthagena; that similar movements were discovered in many parts of Catalonia; that the authorities had taken measures to suppress them; and that the Director of the Poste, the Director of Customs, and one of the Judges of Malaga had been arrested."

SPAIN.

Our Madrid letters of the 18th inst. inform us that M. Martineau de la Rosa had at length accepted the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs. This appointment is officially announced in the Madrid Gazette. It is stated that the general result of the elections is favourable for the Ministry.

A dinner was given at Madrid on the 17th to the newly-elected deputies and senators. M. Martineau de la Rosa and the other newly-elected members were present. M. de la Rosa availed himself of the opportunity afforded by his health being proposed to explain his political principles. He said that he equally repudiated despotism, of which he had been the victim, and the excesses of the Revolution; that he abhorred them with so much the more reason, as he knew, by sad experience, that the abuses of power brought on revolutions, as the excesses of liberty led to despotism.

The Queen of Spain has conferred the Grand Cross of the Royal Order of Charles III. on the Count de Bessou, the French Ambassador at Madrid.

The Academy of Commerce presents the release from prison of Don José and Don Ramón Pina, Don José, and Don Manuel Almaraz. Don R. Fernández, Don M. Salazar, and Don Serran, who were arrested on account of the pretended conspiracy so much spoken of a few weeks ago. These unfortunate men are now set at liberty, on bail, never having been brought to trial, and not even knowing the charges brought against them. Such is the liberty of the subject in Spain, at the present moment.

On the 15th Mr. Bulwer, and the eldest son of Sir Robert Peel, were at Tania, and they have probably by this time returned to Madrid.

PORTUGAL.

Liabon letters to the 16th inst. have reached us, but they scarcely contain a paragraph of political news. Public attention was directed to the ensuing session of the Cortes. The ministers, it is said, are confident of a majority in the Deputies, although in the Peers they will probably be in a minority. The terms of the late August remains for the most part imperative. In a recent decision the Supremo has laid aside the Government, reversing the sentence of an inferior judge, by which the Parafraza was condemned for language certainly sedition. Senhor Cabral has not proceeded to carry the decree into effect by transferring any of the Relaxado judges to other localities.

One of those sudden and terrible falls of rain, which make Portugal at times resemble the tropics, occurred on the 3rd inst. in the Douro district. A cloud opened over Pego, and a torrent of water came down in a rush. Gardens, fields, and vineyards, were instantaneously swept away. The river of Pego was swollen at once to such a height, that five houses who were constructing a wall on its banks were drowned. The bridge of Pego and all the neighbouring walls and boundaries were merged in a common destruction. Other lives were lost in different localities.

BRUSSELS.

The Brussels papers notice some noise at Verriens; some hundred persons of the working classes of that manufacturing town left their work for a time; they assembled in the square, broke some windows, and cried "Down with the Jesuits!" under the windows of some of the principal inhabitants, whom they suppose to be favourable to that religious order. The disturbances, however, were speedily put an end to, and some persons were arrested.

SWEDEN.

There have been some disturbances in Sweden, caused by the discussions in the Diet on the Constitution. The commissions of the 24th and 25th of August might have been very serious if rigorous measures for their suppression had not been adopted. This was accomplished, it is said, without the employment of the military, who remained in their barracks, and were ready to act. The police had hired a number of assistants (militia, day labourers, and others), all of them tall and powerful men, who mingled with the crowd, and who not only inflicted summary punishment for every attempt to create disturbance, but also arrested the most conspicuous among the rioters. The unexpected arrangement effectually deterred the mob from indulging in disturbance, and they gradually dispersed. The persons arrested, amounting to fifty-six in number, were fined. Among them were two persons deacons, the others were people belonging to the lower class of society. It is somewhat singular that in this insurrection the spirit of hostility was not directed against the nobility who first rejected the representation plan, or reform bill, but against the priesthood, especially the Archbishop. After the danger was passed, the Archbishop solicited an audience of the King, and was received with the most marked favour. The committee which drew up the new representation plan was chosen by the minority of the Diet, and consisted of only eight individuals. The coronation of the King and Queen was to take place on the 24th inst.

TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople, of the 4th inst., announce that Commissioners have been appointed to investigate the proper form of administration suitable to the province of Albania, as it is considered that from the peculiar habits of its people it cannot be reduced to order by the same laws which operate in other parts of the Turkish empire. The French shopkeepers at Constantinople and at Pera, who have enjoyed for many years privileges contrary to the letter of the law, are, it appears, in despair at the Porte now exhibiting a determination to resume its inherent rights, and to make those shopkeepers contribute to the expenses of the state. The shopkeepers are applying to their several ambassadors, and an embarrassing discussion is likely to take place between the Porte and the ambassadors upon the subject.

POLICE.

A CHECK UPON THE SOCIETY MARIA.—At Guildhall on Monday a young woman, named Elizabeth Morris, was placed before Sir Peter Laurie, on a charge of having taken a quantity of laudanum, with a view of putting a period to her own existence.—The head of St. Bartholomew's Hospital stated that the prisoner was brought into the hospital on Wednesday night, she having taken poison, and it was with great difficulty that she was recovered by the surgeons, life having been very nearly extinct. From inquiries made it appeared that she had been seduced by a married man.—Sir Peter Laurie said he should send her to the Old Bailey for attempted suicide. He had put an end to persons attempting to drown themselves; he would now try the same cure for attempted poisoning. He had no doubt that those who took poison did not do so for the purpose of self-destruction, but for the purpose of exciting sympathy; and such merited charity was more calculated to do injury than any thing else.—The girl fell back fainting, and exclaiming, "Merry, oh, merry!"—Sir Peter Laurie, we think, acts with much judgment in attempting to check the dangerous mania for attempting suicide, a mania which, we think with the worthy knight, is often committed either to excite sympathy, or to gain notoriety. The latter seemed to be the cause of the suicides from the Monument.

ACCIDENTAL DEATH OF AN ACTRESS.—At Union-hall Police-office on Saturday, Thomas Paines and Jeremiah Grant, two chapmen in the service of Mr. Thomas, brother of Westminster, were charged with causing the death of Mrs. James Scott, a retired comedian, lying at 4, North-building, Mrs. James Paines terrace, Webber road, she observed the prisoners letting down beer into the cellar of a beer-shop next door to her house, from a dray which was close up to the pavement. In a few minutes afterwards she saw Mr. Scott, whom she had previously known, walking along the pavement on the same side of the way. He seemed to be a little in liquor, and when he arrived near the beer-shop he stumbled off the pavement into the road, and in falling one of the horses attached to the dray kicked and struck him on the head, and, in a moment afterwards, both horses went on, and the wheel of the dray went over the unfortunate gentleman's breast. The witness added, that there was no person standing at the head of the horses at the time, both prisoners being engaged in the cellar. Mr. Scott was carried to a surgeon, but he expired while in the act of taking a draught. The prisoners said they were hardly engaged at the time of the unfortunate accident, and that they left the horses standing quietly at the door of the beer-shop with their nose-bags on, and never knew them to have moved from their position unless they were driven on. Mr. Cunningham requested the men for leaving their horses, but believing that there was not any culpable negligence, was satisfied with holding them to bail to appear that day morning.

WHOLESALE ROBBERY AT A SHOEWOMAN.—At Marlborough-street Police-office, on Monday, Anne Dupierre, of Doyne, a young Frenchwoman, underwent a second examination before Mr. Malby, on a charge of having stolen and pawned a large quantity of shoes, the property of Mr. Van Bever, shoemaker, Burlington-arcade, with whom she lived as a shopwoman. The charge was made against the prisoner last week, when some immunities were thrown out against a Miss Cook, in whose behalf a Cal. Lofus interested himself, but many of the statements being unsupported by evidence, we did not think it fair to give an ex parte report of the case. It is now stated that the Colonel Lofus in question is not Colonel Fennell Lofus. Upon this occasion, Mr. Lumley, from the office of Mr. Flower, attended for the prisoner; and a clerk from the office of Mr. Geary, for the prosecutor.—Mr. Van Bever was called, and a statement which he made on the former occasion, relative to the deficiency in his stock, the admission of the prisoner, Adelle Dupierre, that she had pawned the property, and the steps he took both against the prisoner and another young woman formerly in his service, in consequence of a statement subsequently made to him by the prisoner, was read over to him. The solicitor then asked Mr. Van Bever various questions, to which he replied, that he had never at any time in his life given the prisoner shoes to pawn for him. On the 9th of August he left England to go on the Continent, and he returned on the 24th of August. The prisoner had money given to her for expenses during his absence. During the time he was out of England the prisoner had never received permission to pawn any goods, nor was he aware that she had pawned any until the robbery was discovered. Mr. Van Bever underwent a very long cross-examination by Mr. Lumley, and much irrelevant matter was gone into. Mr. Van Bever emphatically repeated that he had never authorised at any time the pawning of shoes or boots. He added that the receipts in the shop had fallen off very much within the last week or two. This he attributed to a conspiracy between the prisoner and his former shopwoman. He had secured information that the prisoner had sent customers to another shop in the Arcade. Had never expressed a determination to any one to get Miss Cook out of the Arcade. After the prisoner and Miss Cook were in custody, did not say to his solicitor, that he only wanted to punish Cook, and not to hurt the prisoner. What he had said was that from what Dupierre had told him, Cook had been his ruin. Had never promised to give £20 if Miss Cook were got out of her shop. On taking stock, had found 105 pairs of shoes and boots deficient, but from the quantity in the hands of the pawnbrokers, which he knew to be his property, his loss was much larger.—Thomas Wood, shopman to Mr. Wood, pawnbroker, 65, High-street, produced samples of 74 pairs of shoes which the prisoner had pledged at the shop since August. This witness said that the prisoner had been in the habit of pawning shoes at his employer's shop for some years.—A shopman in the employ of Mr. Young, pawnbroker, 53, Princes-street, said the prisoner had pledged between 30 and 40 pairs of shoes since August last. The prisoner had pledged shoes at the shop for a considerable period.—The prisoner, when called upon for her defence, in broken English said she had never known anything about pawning shoes until sent by Mr. Van Bever. Mr. Van Bever wanted to get Miss Cook out of her shop, because she had spent a shop-shop for herself he had not done so much business.—Mr. Lumley, for the prisoner, said he should only urge the great improbability that the prisoner could have pawned so large a quantity of shoes, and in her own name, without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Van Bever. There was a great deal of anxiety on the part of Mr. Van Bever towards Miss Cook, and this was the foundation of the present charge. The pawnbrokers also proved that the prisoner had for years been in the habit of pledging shoes with them, and thus afforded strong presumption that the prosecutor must have supplied her with the shoes at least during that period when she was not in his service.—Mr. Malby said there was no proof before him that these shoes were Mr. Van Bever's property. From the evidence which had been produced, he felt it to be his duty to send the case to a jury.—Mr. Van Bever's solicitor then said that his client's shop was set on fire on Monday week, and this act he believed to have been committed by the prisoner, who was alarmed at the prospect of detection which Mr. Van Bever's proposal to take stock held out.—No evidence, however, was offered on this charge.

A VICTIM.—At the Mansion house, on Tuesday, Algerine Sydney Sparkes, a quondam traveller to Mr. Edgar White, a wine and bottle merchant, was charged with obtaining goods from several tradesmen under false pretences. The justice-room was crowded with tradesmen who had been victimised. The prisoner exhibited the utmost sensibility, took abundant notes, and was continually conveying written suggestions to his counsel, Mr. Doane. The first charge was preferred by Mr. Garratt, of Chesapeake. It appeared from the evidence of Mr. Charles Hoyle, the managing man of Mr. Garratt, that on the 5th or 6th of August, the prisoner came into his employer's shop, and ordered a coat. The witness, as usual, asked him in his name and address, upon which the prisoner handed him the card produced, on which was engraved, "Edgar White, wine-merchant, &c." The article was sent to the address given on the card, and in a few days afterwards the witness called at the address, and saw Mr. White, who said he knew nothing about the matter, but that it must be his traveller, Mr. Sparkes, whom he described as a most respectable young man, who had been in his employment as a traveller for the last two years. At the time the prisoner ordered the coat, he (the witness) believed him to be Mr. Edgar White, and the person whose address was described in the card he had presented. The next charge against the prisoner was preferred by Mr. R. D. Smith, a boot-maker, carrying on business in London-wall, who deposed that the prisoner came to his shop and obtained some boots. He stated that he had been recommended by Mr. Wright, a solicitor. The goods had been sent to Mr. White's premises as directed. The witness had since seen Mr. Wright, who denied having given the prisoner any such recommendation as he had stated. Mr. Wright was a customer of the witness, and he (the witness) had on one occasion seen the prisoner in Wright's office in Newgate-street.—Mr. R. D. Smith, of Chesapeake, preferred the next charge. Mr. Bath stated, that on Tuesday last the prisoner came to his shop and purchased a dressing case, a set of chessmen, and a draught-board, and desired them to be sent the following morning by eleven o'clock, to 4 or 5, Water-lane, Tower-street, when they should be paid for. He (Mr. Bath) accordingly sent his boy with them as directed, but with express directions not to leave the goods without the money. The boy went and saw the prisoner, who said he was coming into the city in the course of the day, and he would call and pay for the goods. The boy stated that the bill was receipted, and he must either take the goods or the money back. On this the prisoner tore off the receipt from the bottom of the bill, and returned the latter to the boy. Mr. Bath further stated, that not being quite satisfied with this proceeding, he sent the boy, accompanied by his shopman, to the premises, being determined, as Mr. Bath expressed it, "Not to be done by a gang of swindlers." They came back without succeeding in their mission, and at last he (Mr. Bath) proceeded in person and saw Mr. White, who stated he knew nothing about the matter. On Friday last he (Mr. Bath) went again, and again saw Mr. White, for though the boy had been poised to watch for the prisoner, and give him in charge to a policeman, the latter never made his appearance. On Friday, however, White said he would go to the prisoner's lodgings, and the goods should be returned, and eventually they were given up. There was another charge against the prisoner, preferred by Mr. Hancock, from whom he had obtained a small outfit, consisting of shirts, silk handkerchiefs, and other articles, under the same circumstances as those already detailed in the previous cases. Mr. Hancock, however, admitted that by the receipt from the prisoner of 5s. on account, the transaction with him had become a civil matter, and therefore not cognisable before the magistrate.—Mr. T. Wood did not think there was sufficient legal evidence to convict the prisoner, and therefore ordered him to be discharged; but on leaving the dock was taken in execution by Wallhouse, the sheriff's officer, at the suit of one of his creditors under his bankruptcy.—[A great outcry has been raised against Lord Houghton's recent act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, on the ground that it takes away all protection from creditors. Doubtless, the creditor has a right to justice as well as the debtor, but when it is seen with what facility tradesmen give up goods to mere strangers, as in the above case, may it not well be asked whether they are not to blame themselves sometimes for their losses? It is a just and humane principle not to allow imprisonment where a man is unable to pay, and the law will be useful also in checking unlimited credit. We know it is the fashion to talk of the necessity of credit in a commercial country like this. We do not deny it; but we believe it is equally true that there ought to be no temptation to induce men to run into debt.]

A BARRACADED ASSAULT.—On Tuesday William Tuff, a cattle-dealer in Smithfield-market, was summoned before Sir Peter Laurie, for assaulting Mr. Quilter, a butcher, in Grosvenor-street, Panzer, by cutting off his whiskers. Sir Peter remarked that he had no doubt Mr. Quilter looked a great deal better for the shaving. To him, Mr. Q. appeared to have very large whiskers still.—The complainant, who is a very powerful young man, nearly six feet in height, stated that he was in Smithfield-market on the 16th inst., when he met a neighbour named Sturch, and the defendant came up to him and said he had just purchased two beasts which he thought would suit him. Mr. Sturch said he would look at them, and asked complainant to accompany him to judge what they were worth. Witness agreed to do so, and to Mr. Sturch what the animals were worth, and what they would weigh. A bargain was struck, and they all repaired to a public-house in Duke-street. While they were standing at the bar the defendant, without a word of provocation or observation, drew out a long pair of scissors, and quietly slipped off his right whisker at a stroke. Complainant was rebuffed by the impudence of the thing. "Oh," cried Sturch, "get a looking-glass." "Let's have a sight," said another. "He's got your whisker off," said a third. "If he has," complainant replied, "he had better serve the other side the same, he's got my hair cut off." All the bystanders had a peep for him, and while he was answering them and recovering from his surprise, the defendant took advantage of him with his scissors, and cut down the other whisker. He therefore now required redress from the Magistrate.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE BY A DWARF.—At Union-hall, on Tuesday, Harriet Thorne, a young female, about the size of General Tom Thumb, well-known as the celebrated dwarf, was charged with attempting to commit suicide.—Police constable 57 L. stated that about four o'clock on Tuesday morning last he found the prisoner lying in a state of insensibility in the Lower Marsh. He immediately took her to the station-house, where it was ascertained she had taken poison. Mr. Wagnall, the police-surgeon, was sent for, and with the aid of the stomach pump he succeeded in saving her life. She was afterwards conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital. It was afterwards ascertained that she had purchased six-pennyworth of opium at a chemist's, on Monday night, the whole of which she had swallowed just before the constable arrived. In answer to the charges, the prisoner said that she had travelled the country as a dwarf for nearly six years; but a month ago she quarrelled with her protector, who had deserted her. Her mind became so agitated that she was persuaded to destroy herself. Mr. Cottingham asked her whether she had any friends in London?—Prisoner replied she had none.—Mr. Cottingham said that he could not release her, after making such a determined attempt on her life, without having some security for her future conduct. The prisoner was accordingly sent to prison in default of bail.

CHARGE OF MURDER.—On Tuesday, at Warship-street, Alfred Edwards was examined on a charge of causing the death of an unfortunate female of the name of Jane Gregory, by administering to her a poisonous drug under the appearance of bread and butter. Evidence was given to the effect that the deceased was at No. 4, New Court, New Nicholas-street, Bethnal-green, with the prisoner, a maker of pickles. On Thursday evening week she drank a tumbler full of a dark fluid, which he had brought to her room in a quart wine bottle, and which he gave to her, saying it was brandy and bitters. In a couple of hours afterwards, Edwards having left her in the meantime, she went to the Britannia Saloon, Hoxton, before entering which she complained of nausea, and was not seen by the witnesses until the following forenoon, when they found her in a dying state in her bed, her face and hands livid and cold, and apparently labouring under the effects of poison. She said she knew she was dying, and repeated several times that she had taken nothing but the brandy and bitters Edwards gave her, and added that she was the cause of her illness. Edwards entered the room and heard her say so, and his reply was, "Nonsense, I have taken plenty of it myself before." Witnesses present then urged him to take some of the liquor. He said he would, poured out some, took it into his mouth, but directly spat it out again. Afterwards he went away, saying he would return again in five minutes, but did not. A surgeon was sent for, and soon after his arrival deceased died. The prisoner was remanded.

CHARGE OF ATTEMPTED MURDER.—At Marlborough-street, on Wednesday, Abraham Myers, of Old-court, in the Strand, was brought before Mr. Malby, charged with having deliberately stabbed Robert Clapard, the proprietor of the White Bear Livery-stables, Lisle-square, Leicester-square. It appeared from the evidence that Clapard and Myers were in the habit of meeting at the house of Mr. J. Banks, the Crown, Chancery-passage, Leicester-square. On Tuesday evening they met as usual, together with several other persons. Some altercation took place between the prisoner and Clapard, and blows were exchanged. This occurred in front of the bar about seven o'clock. About nine o'clock Myers went out, requesting some one to take care of his great-coat till his return. Having been absent about ten or twelve minutes Myers resumed his seat, and no apparent change had taken place in his demeanour. Clapard, who was sitting in a chair at the opposite end of the room to Myers, addressed the latter, saying in a familiar tone, "Come, come, my dear fellow, there should be no animosity between us, here is my hand, and with it my heart," at the same time extending his right hand. Myers, without the slightest hesitation rose from his seat, and approaching Clapard, took hold of the extended hand with his own left hand, and then said, "I freely accept your hand, but I'll have your heart's blood;" and suddenly drew from his coat-pocket a large butcher's knife, and made a desperate lunge at his intended victim. Clapard caught sight of the weapon, and, in order to turn the point from his side, to which it was directed, seized the knife with his left hand, when Myers violently drew it through the hand, cutting through the ball of the thumb in a most dangerous manner. Myers again raised the knife, and, repeating his threat, made a second lunge, which inflicted a flesh wound just above the left breast. The fact of Clapard being seated in a chair enabled him to throw himself backward, and to this may be attributed his fortunate escape, for the prisoner's determined purpose was evident to all present, who interposed as speedily as possible. The prisoner then dropped the knife, and was making his escape from the house, but was stopped by a waiter, and given into custody. The policeman who took charge of the prisoner handed to the magistrate a certificate from the medical attendant, which was to the effect that the present removal of the wounded man would be unadvisable. The prisoner, under the advice of his solicitor, reserved what he had to say until the next examination. The knife with which the attempt was made is nearly a new one, and of the largest size butchers use, being from eighteen to twenty inches long.

COUNTRY NEWS.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY ON THE SON OF CAMPBELL, THE POET.—A few days ago a commission of lunacy was held at the Ship Inn, Waltham Abbey, before Mr. Commissioner Walslow, to inquire into the state of mind of Thomas Telford Campbell, only son of the late poet, Thomas Campbell, described as of Dr. Allen's Asylum, High Beach, Essex. The case, from the station of the party, and his relationship to the celebrated author of the "Pleasures of Hope," excited much interest. Dr. Allen said that Mr. Campbell had resided at his lunatic asylum for about 14 years, and stated some acts of violence on the part of that gentleman. Dr. Allen said Mr. Campbell was a great poeticalist, and would walk 30 to 40 miles a day, chiefly in the vicinity of Epping Forest. While at High Beach he was supposed to have walked about 30,000 miles. He flattered King's horses, which he had taken, had got into his house, and would lie down in the sun to evaporate their ill effects. He took dislikes, unfavourably, to several patients. The 61, a day, formerly allowed for pocket-money, had been increased, because he had discontinued, since he had taken so external, which, as he said, was a substitute for ardent spirits. He would not wear woollen clothes, and preferred corduroy trousers, and other garments of a light description, as he said they were better to walk in. He was perfectly harmless; but in his Dr. Allen's opinion, he was of unsound mind. Some other evidence of a similar character was given, after which Mr. Campbell put several questions to the witnesses, and made some very pertinent remarks, observing that the witnesses had given their evidence very fairly, but were wrong in their conclusions; and explained to the jury such parts of the evidence as he seemed to think bore against him.—The jury returned a verdict, "That Mr. Thomas Telford Campbell was of sound mind;" so that a man who has been confined for 14 years as a lunatic, is pronounced to be perfectly sane.

REPRESENTATION OF HOCKINGSHAMSHIRE.—We understand that the Marquis of Chando, who has just attained his majority, will be proposed as a candidate for the representation of the county of Bucks, at the next election.

THE HARVEST.—It affords us the highest satisfaction that we can congratulate our readers on one of the most abundant harvests, in relation to the grand staple crop of the country—wheat, with which an indulgent Providence has ever blessed this kingdom. It is not only abundant, but it is also, in its general characteristics, of excellent quality; the exceptions to this description of it are not to a greater extent than usually occur in highly favourable seasons.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY.—A commission of lunacy has been held during the week at the Ship Inn, Waltham Abbey, to inquire into the state of mind of Robert Mayo, Esq., aged 49, a gentleman of fortune, of the county of Herts, described in the commission as of "Dr. Allen's Asylum, High Beach, Essex." It appeared from the statement of counsel, and the evidence of Dr. Allen and other witnesses, that Mr. Mayo has a family of six children, and is entitled to property amounting to about £3000 a year. He had, previous to 1840, exhibited some lightness, but while residing at Oxford, symptoms of aberration first manifested themselves. On one occasion, he got two of his children into a room, shut them in, and alarmed them much by brandishing two cutlasses. In 1842, hearing his wife was coming to Oxford, although he had previously been an ardent sportsman, he precipitately left, and went to Chesham, where he resided some time at a public-house, until it was found necessary to remove him, under the usual certificate, to the establishment of Dr. Allen, at High Beach. Dr. Allen and the other medical gentlemen were of opinion that Mr. Mayo was decidedly of unsound mind, and incapable of managing himself or his affairs. The remarks made by Mr. Mayo, in reply to the commissioner's questions, were of such an incoherent character as to satisfy the minds of the jury, and a verdict was returned, "That Mr. Herbert Mayo was of unsound mind, and had been so from the 21st of September, 1842."

GLoucester Musical Festival.—Gloucester Cathedral was opened on Tuesday morning, and there was a larger attendance than was expected. The service opened with Handel's overture to "Mithras," one of the most effective and impressive of that great master's instrumental productions. The "Te Deum," composed by Handel in celebration of the battle of Dettingen, followed. Dr. Bayly's celebrated anthem, "Hosanna in excelsis," or at least a considerable part of it, was given immediately before the service, which was presided by the Rev. F. T. J. Bayly, one of the stewards, from 2 Chronicles, v. 18. The collection made at the close in behalf of the charitable fund amounted to £169 12s. 4d. In 1841 the sum was £139 12s. 4d. In the evening there was a concert in the Ship Hall. "Satanstoe" was performed on Wednesday under the personal direction of Professor Taylor.

MELANCHOLY DEATH.—Last Thursday week, between the hours of eight and nine o'clock, the fingers were practising in Newington church, near Sandgate, Kent, when one of the bells being pulled over, its unfortunate ringers, Edward Mackay, was thereby drawn up, and his head coming in violent contact with the ceiling of the bellry he fell to the basement so dreadfully injured, that he died in about half-an-hour afterwards.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY AT MANCHESTER.—Yesterday week a gentleman, named Knowles, came out of the Branch Bank of England, at Manchester, where he had been to get notes for a cheque, and this, with some other money he had in his possession, amounting in all to £400, he placed in a small German pocket-book, putting it in his pocket, inside his coat. He felt the book in his pocket as he left the bank. He walked along Chancery-lane, and was on the point of turning into Fountain-street, when he again put his hand to his pocket, and found that his pocket-book was gone. Information was immediately given to the police, who took the most prompt means for the capture of the thief, but he has not yet been apprehended.

INCENDIARY FIRE.—A few nights ago a destructive fire (which is supposed to have been caused by an incendiary) broke out upon the premises of Mr. Parsons, a Frenchman, who resides in the Strand, near the Strand.

THE REASON.—Mr. Pope, tailor of Bond-street, Brighton, gathered a large quantity of pears from a tree at the back of his house a short time ago. A portion of the same tree is now in full blossom, whilst the other part is dark and faded. We may also mention, as an instance of the backward growth of raspberries, that Mr. George Lucas, fruiterer and grocer, of the same town, exhibited some very fine ones, grown out of doors, in his window on Tuesday.

FATAL ACCIDENT FROM THE SHAFTS OF A WINDMILL.—On Tuesday, Mr. George Salingham, an extensive miller, residing at Datchet, near Windsor, met his death from a stroke of the shafts of his windmill. The mill had been stopped, and while Mr. Sidingham was standing at the door, giving some change to a customer, a sudden gust of wind sprung up, which sent round the sails of the mill with great velocity. The shaft struck the unfortunate deceased on the temple, hurling him to a considerable distance, and when picked up he was extinct.

POWDER-MILL EXPLOSION.—On Thursday week, there was an explosion of the powder-mills of J. Wakefield, Esq., of Sedgwick, near Kendal, which was attended with the loss of the life of one man, who was nearly shattered to pieces. The unfortunate individual who met this untimely end, is a man of the name of William Sewardson, who was employed in the mills, has left a wife and six children. An inquest was held on the following day, but the cause of the occurrence was not discovered. A verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

A MAN KILLED IN A FIGHT.—On Sunday morning, a little before eight o'clock, a man named George Benson, a labourer, 22 years of age, was killed in a fight which took place by appointment, between him and a man named Henry Jones, aged 21, also a labourer, at a place much used for similar encounters on a Sunday morning, situated on the east side of the Kensington-canal. Five persons were apprehended and examined at Kensington Police Office on Monday, charged with being concerned in the transaction. They were all labouring men, and gave their names as Henry Jones, of 11, Pye's-buildings, Chelsea; John Hill, of 1, Little College-street, Chelsea; William Benson, of 8, Horton-street, Chelsea; Henry Key, of 6, Pye's-buildings; and James Foreman, of 3, Wellington-buildings, Chelsea. Jones was charged "with having caused the death of George Benson, by striking him with his fist in a fight in the parish of Kensington," and the other four persons were charged with aiding and assisting as seconds in causing the death. The evidence proved that the deceased and Jones quarrelled on Saturday night, and the fight took place by appointment next morning. After fighting a great many rounds, deceased received a heavy blow under the ear, fell violently to the ground, was raised upon his second's knee, and having made the remark that he had had "enough of it," sank upon the ground and expired. The prisoners were remanded.—On Thursday Mr. Paynter completed the examinations in the case, and the whole of the prisoners were committed on a charge of murder. The magistrate, however, intimated his intention to take bail.

THE FIRST COMMITTEE UNDER THE CONVENTION BETWEEN FRANCE AND ENGLAND.—James Bonnet, who, under the firm of Pricer and Co., general merchants, of No. 74, Fenchurch-street, and against whom a warrant was obtained on the 13th instant, was brought up at the Mansion House on Monday, charged under the law of France with fraudulent bankruptcy. Evidence was given in support of the charge, and the prisoner was committed, preparatory to his being sent to France.

REMARKABLE ACCIDENT.—On Sunday evening week, at the small village of Dalton, near Gateshead, a singular and dangerous accident occurred to a young woman, servant to Mr. Preston, farmer. She was ascending a plum-tree (presumably fruit), when the branches gave way; and in her fall she came in contact with a large bay fork that was placed against the tree, with its prongs pointing upwards, one of which entered the centre of her arm-pit, and, taking an oblique direction upwards, appeared under the collar-bone. It then pierced her neck about its middle, and again appeared in the back part of her mouth. Thus pierced and supported by the implement, she remained elevated a few feet from the ground, and was unable to render herself any assistance. Her shrieks, however, bringing the neighbours to the spot, they immediately released her from her painful situation. A surgeon was called in without loss of time, and she is now pretty well recovered from the effects of her truly singular accident.

FATAL STRAM-BOY ACCIDENT.—On Sunday evening, a wherry belonging to a waterman named Robert Henderson, of Kidsey Stairs, Lambeth, and containing nine persons, chiefly engineers, was crossing the river nearly opposite Mill-wall, when the Ariel, a Woolwich steam-packet, came up the river at full speed with another vessel in her wake, and the people in the boat being unable to get out of her way were run down. The Ariel struck the wherry, and immediately nine persons were seen struggling in the water. Assistance was at once rendered, and eight persons were taken out of the water alive, some of them in a state of great exhaustion. One unfortunate man perished. His name is John Hayward, aged 27, of No. 5, Tenby-place, Jamaica-place, West India Dock-road.

ANOTHER SUICIDE AT BLACKFRIARS-BRIDGE.—On Wednesday morning, about half-past five o'clock, as James Pope, a workman employed at the City Gas Works, was proceeding on board a large barge lying off Capel's Wharf, he saw the body of a man lying on the mud, about two yards from the wharf, and near to the covering of the Fleet ditch. Some letters, addressed to "Mr. Thomas Holden, Mitcham," and 14s. 6s. in silver were found in the pockets. The body has since been identified as that of Mr. Holden, the coach proprietor of Mitcham, and the cause of his committing the rash act appears a complete mystery.

ACCIDENT AT THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—On Wednesday, Edward Coshin, one of the messengers employed at the New Houses of Parliament, was at work at that part of the building which is contiguous to the Chequer Tavern, Abingdon-street; he was in the act of stepping from one part of the scaffold to another, when he took too wide a leap, overstepped his mark, and fell to the ground from a height of forty feet. He sustained a severe concussion of the brain, and was otherwise much lacerated, but without fracturing any bones. He now lies in a very dangerous state.

FALL FROM THE TOP OF A HOUSE.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Payne held an inquest at Guy's Hospital on the body of John Greenay, aged 12. It appeared that the deceased was a lad-boy employed upon some new houses in Newington. In the afternoon of Tuesday week he was at the top of the house attending upon the plasterer, when, by a false step, he slipped and fell to the ground. The height from which he fell was above 10 feet, and when raised by the workmen he was quite insensible. Mr. Kent, house-surgeon of the hospital, said that the deceased died from fracture of the skull, the result of the fall. Verdict—Accidental death.

SUICIDE THROUGH SCANDAL.—On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Swan, Bloomsbury, on the body of Harriet Haller, aged 49, of No. 4, Brunswick-row, Queen-square. It appeared that the deceased was found dead in her room, between six and seven o'clock on Saturday evening, having hanged herself from a crook in the wall by means of a cord. Her husband saw her alive for the last time in the morning. It further appeared that deceased was forewoman, and had been so for fourteen years, to Mr. Caldecott, upholsterer, of Great Russell-street, and that she had for many years lived in perfect happiness with her husband. About a fortnight since she exhibited symptoms of insanity, which her husband attributed to some scandalous allusions made about that time by some of his associates, male and female. Though there was no foundation for it, the scandal had rendered her extremely melancholy and restless, so much so, that she had not slept for the last fortnight. The medical adviser, Mrs. Caldecott, and her own husband, urged her to go into the country for change of air and scene, but she refused, and the consequence was aggravation of her delusions, and ultimate suicide. Verdict—"That deceased destroyed herself whilst in an unsound state of mind."

ACCIDENT TO THE HON. AUGUSTUS HEVEY.—On Thursday last, a serious accident befel the Hon. Augustus Hevey, second son of Earl Jermyn. The young gentleman was riding his pony in Ickworth Park, when the animal suddenly took fright and ran away. In his progress, the youthful rider's head came in contact with a tree, with so much force as to produce concussion on the brain, which rendered him for some time insensible, and very serious apprehensions were entertained of his recovery. Happily, he has since become much better, and it is hoped may be pronounced out of danger.

FIRE AND LOSS OF TWO LIVES.—On Sunday morning, a fire broke out in the house of Magdalene Springer or Stewart, a widow, residing in Hylth's Close, Lymington, which caused her death, and also that of a man named Thomas Todd, aged 18, a seaman, who lodged with her. Mrs. Stewart was found lying on the kitchen floor burnt to a cinder. The origin of the fire is not known, but it is supposed to have been caused by a burning candle falling amongst a quantity of shavings in the kitchen, where Mrs. Stewart was sitting. Both the sufferers were interred.

DESPERATE ATTEMPT AT SUICIDE.—On Wednesday morning, about nine o'clock, while the coachman of Mr. Colman, of Lambeth-terrace, was in the stable at the back of the house, he heard some one outside the coach-house door; upon looking out he saw a gentleman standing in a stooping position cutting his throat with a razor, just within the rails of the mews. He immediately caught hold of his arm, and with the assistance of a mechanic, who was passing, wrenched the razor from his hand. Mr. Taylor, of Lambeth-terrace, was passing at the moment, and observing the three men struggling, thought the one was in a fit; but seeing the gentleman had cut his throat he had him taken into the station, and sent for Mr. Colman, who attended immediately, and as soon as the crowd could be cleared out of the court-house, proceeded to sew up the wound, which was about three inches long. The mind of the gentleman was evidently in a deranged state. He was taken by the police to Guy's Hospital. In his coat pocket was found a circular from Mr. Stanbury, announcing his benefit; the same was directed to Mr. Cuttle, 8, Lynn's-inn, Strand.

ELECTION OF CHIEF RABBI OF THE JEWS.—The great body of the Hebrew persuasion in London is at the present time much agitated in consequence of the approaching election to the office of Chief Rabbi of England, which has been for some time vacant by the death of the Rev. Dr. Solomon Hirschel, and which is appointed to take place in the course of the ensuing month. The reverend candidates for the office are Dr. Nathan Marcus Adler, who has been Chief Rabbi of Hanover since August, 1839; Dr. Benjamin Auerbach, who has been Chief Rabbi of Hanover for ten years; Dr. Hirschel, who has been for a short time Chief Rabbi of Wolfenbutel; and Dr. Sampson Rivkin, who has been Chief Rabbi of Oldenburgh since 1831, and is at present Chief Rabbi of Kat

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE ORIGIN OF "PARADISE LOST."

They tell that a woodman,
Drove faint with heat,
Of noon's burning glory
Sought out a retreat.
Where the leaves were so thick
That the soft turf below
Had kept spring's green freshness,
Renew'd summer's glow!
So the woodman lay down,
In that dark forest hollow,
And slumber came
From the bare tree's light flower
To lull him to slumber,
To woo him to rest,
And the wood-pigeon cooed
With her soft wing his breast,
Till sleep's honey-dew
O'er his weary frame crept,
And his heavy lids closed,
And the woodman slept.
His slumbers were dreamless,
Until a shade fell
From a fern that might seem
The sweet spouse of the dell;
Then as the low wind
Stir'd the chords of a lute
His lips moved in murmurs,
His brow flash'd like fire;
But he wak'd not, although
He felt all through his frame
A magnetic power.
Of her presence, whose name
Thou hast from him sleeping,
And silent tears crept
From his deeply fringed lids—
O' how well that he slept!

Thus fully to laguer—
Yet why waken'd he sleep?
The tear lay about him
And saw that he wept;
She must weep that tear off,
She wept once more again,
On her finger there gleam'd
The first link of a chain—
Of a fever that bound her,
Through this weary life,
To one whom she loved not,
A moment of strife
Between duty and love,
Between awe and old
Made her slender form tremble,
Her warm cheek was cold;
But then duty triumph'd,
She gave one last look
To the tomb of her heart,
And she hastily took
From the mirror she carried
An unguessed look,
To leave her a record
Of faith and of grief;
She wrote two words there,
And the paper she sent
On the sleeper—these words—
"They were 'Paradise Lost!'"

It has lately been ascertained that the poet Campbell wrote two copies of "The Pleasures of Hope," which were quite dissimilar from each other. In the first copy, which is in Campbell's hand-writing, the whole poem consists only of about forty or fifty paragraphs, and altogether scarcely amounts to one-half of what it now does; it extends over twenty pages of MS., and may contain about 400 lines. At the end of the poem is "The Irish Harper's Lament for his Dog"—Tune. "The Nine Links of Yellow," word for word, as it is now printed under the title of "The Harper." The introduction to "The Pleasures of Hope," underwent many alterations.

ANOTHER EXPLOSIVE MISSILE.
A Mr. Lane exhibited before the Lords of the Admiralty, in the year 1811, a four-pound shot, wrapped round with a prepared cotton, and made very hard, so as to appear like a large cannon-ball, on firing of which, it has the usual effect of a cannon-shot; but the moment it starts from the cannon's mouth, it presents one solid mass of fire, and whatever it hits, whether rigging or hull of a ship, will immediately take fire.

A LARGE FISH.—TWO LIKE A WHALE.
A Suffolk paper states that on the 5th inst., a pike, weighing upwards of 12 stone (14 lbs to the stone), was taken from a pond at Bacton, in the presence of a number of spectators!

A PROFESSIONAL PASTORAL FOR THE LONG VACATION.
See Serpents Tiptoe—in rural scene,
Forgetting all the cares of Common Pleas,
Taking beneath some shady beech his station,
To up the honey of the long vacation,
Ye sylphs beware, should Tiptoe catch your grove.
For his attachment is no name for love,
The rustic lambskins cluster idly round,
Lured by his legal pipe's too dulcet sound.

CHINESE PROVERBS.
A word too much spoils the best affairs; a moment of patience accommodates the worst. The more acquaintances we have the less people we know.—From Captain Pidding's Chinese Gleanings.

THE POPE AND THE CARDINALS.
The Pope reached his 79th year on the 18th inst. He has filled the Holy See since February, 1831. The Sacred College is composed of 60 Cardinals. Two of the Cardinals were created by Pius VII., seven by Leo XII., and the remainder by the present Pontiff. Mgr. Tardif, the oldest, is 85 years of age, and Mgr. Schwarzenberg, the youngest, 33. At the end of last year Rome contained 175,701 inhabitants, not including the Jews.

THE PROSCOPE.
A new optical instrument, called the proscopium, because unlimited in its applications, was exhibited for the first time at the Polytechnic Institution on Monday afternoon. It is the invention of the ingenious secretary, Mr. Longbottom. The instrument reflects drawings magnified to an enormous size on an opaque disc. The subject chosen for exhibition was the celebrated "Ode to the Passions." As the representation of fitful fear, hurried anger, was despair, bright-eyed hope, capricious pity, &c., made its startling appearance on the wall or curtain, the portion of the ode illustrated was sung by some vocalists present, and was accompanied by the band.

A SCOTCH HAGGIE.
It is stated that her Majesty is exceedingly fond of "the haggie," a dainty much and universally esteemed by the Scotch in every station. The name is derived from "hag—to chop." In his edition of Burns's Poems, Allan Cunningham says in a note, "The joyous nationality of this poem is but part of its merit. The component parts of a haggie are sometimes inquired anxiously into by men who love the pleasures of the table. 'Pray, sir,' said a man of the south, 'what is it made of?' 'Sir,' answered a man of the north, 'I dare not trust myself with telling—I can never name all the savory items without tears, and surely you would not wish me to expose myself in a public company!'"

POPULATION OF CONSTANTINOPLE.
Constantinople, including the villages on the Bosphorus and all the suburbs, contains 450,000 souls, without the military. The mortality (again without the military) is, on an average, about 900 per month, or 10,800 per annum, which will make one in 60 annually.

A STRANGE FANTASY.
A story is told of a hypochondriac gentleman of rank and fortune in Ireland, who fancies one of his legs of one religion and the other of another. He not unfrequently puts one of his unfortunate legs outside of the bed clothes to punish it for unreligious errors.

BONNET.
'Tis ere—the hum of men hath swept away!
Lonely I stand beside the wave-washed shore,
To trace the changeful hues of dying day,
And list the dirge of ocean's moaned roar.
And now night stalks the heaving billows o'er—
Pale stars her heralds, dim blasts her train—
In triumph mounts her elon throne once more,
And girds creation with her clamorous chain.
Here would I nose in this lone hour awhile,
Gazing with awe upon the boundless sea,
And with high thoughts my traced soul beguile,
Breathless—and lost amid immensity;
Or in my mystic scroll above would scan
The might of God, the pinnacles of man.

BAPTISM IN TURKEY.
The ceremony of baptism is quite a private one in Turkey, and takes place without the interference of the clergy. The patriarch of the family, on the third day after the birth of the child, receives it in his arms. Without form, ceremony, or even ablution, he repeats the creed, or public call to prayers, in the right ear of the infant, and in its left whispers the name it is to bear. Sometimes the name is altered, from a superstitious notion that it is unsuitable to the individual, and a modification is admitted when a gentleman enters into the public service.

STRAM BY MEANS OF GALVANISM.
Some experiments are in progress for the purpose of ascertaining whether steam can be generated through the agency of galvanism, so as entirely to supersede the use of coal, so cumbersome as freight, in steamers having to make a long voyage. It is conceived that with very slight improvements, a flame of sufficient power could be obtained by means of galvanism for the purpose required.

NEW LIFE BOAT.
A new and extraordinary life boat is being built upon the diagonal principle, the planks of which are composed of India rubber and ground cork. Its specific gravity is stated to be two-thirds lighter than oak, and from which it is believed the boat is incapable of being bilged or sunk. Her length is thirty-four feet, and breadth eleven feet; is copper fastened and pulled twelve sails; has two lug sails, and steers with either rudder or oar. The Belgian government has directed three to be built for that coast.

BLAIR ATHOL AND GLEN TILLY.
What a change in a century! It is not quite a century since "the Forty-five," and here in sylvan retreat and Highland sports are a Queen of the deceased house of Hanover, her German husband, and her child in the very heart of the land of Stuart devotees—
"Down by Loch Tummel and banks o' the Garey,"
A hundred years ago their lives would not have been worth a pin's fee; now they see all but worshipped by the same race of men, guarded like idols, the wild deer chased, and the loveliest green of all the Scottish glens, Glen Tilly, and the romantic falls of Bruar, "promenade" like Kensington and St. James's—
"If you ever marry," said a Roman Consul to his son, "let it be a woman who has independent means to support the nation of a man of sensible taste."

THE ISLAND OF ICHABOE.

ICHABOE ISLAND.—THE GUANO TRADE.

This small island has, of late, become of immense importance to adventurers, from its being the deposit of the birds' manure termed Guano; and from its being by the latest advice, in a state of desperate mutiny.

Ichaboe Island lies off the western coast of Africa, within one mile and a half from the main, and forty-one miles to the northward of Possession Island, which is in latitude 16 deg. 37 min. S., longitude 13 deg. 8 min. E. Ichaboe is but about one mile in circumference; on the east side ships may anchor in perfect safety, in five fathoms of water, about two cables' length from its shore, a convenience of great moment in connexion with the new trade in guano. Great numbers of the right whale strike on this part of the coast about the middle of June, when they may easily be taken. In the months of October and November, the island is literally covered with jackass penguins and gannets, which convene here for the purpose of laying and incubation. The shores are also much resorted to by multitudes of far-seal. The south-east part of the bay, on the main land, directly opposite the island, is the finest place on this part of the coast for jerking beef, it being only four miles from a Hottentot village; and the springs of fresh water will supply any number of cattle.

It is, however, to its being the depository of guano, in almost incredible quantities, that Ichaboe owes its importance; and this information is stated to have originated in the following passage in Morrell's "Narrative of a Voyage to the South and West Coast of Africa":—"The surface of this island is covered with birds' manure to the depth of twenty-five feet." Upon this Lieutenant Petrie, R.N., who has just reprinted Morrell's "Narrative," remarks:—"Our author was quite aware of both the name and nature of guano; but, as it possessed less interest than other objects of traffic with which he was surrounded, he does not enlarge upon the discovery. In his first voyage, when at St. Lobo on the coast of Peru, the bird manure is again mentioned, under the Spanish name of guano. It is, says he, probably, the richest manure in the world, and is in sufficient quantity to load thousands of ships."

Lieutenant Petrie, in his appendix to Morrell's "Narrative," says:—"The trade in Guano, which has been lately opened to the coast of Africa, has not only raised high hopes as to its beneficial effects in improving agriculture, by affording an abundance of the richest manure, but on the commerce, and especially on the shipping interests of the country. It has already occasioned considerable improvement. Everything relating to it, therefore, is a matter of importance, and even the natural history of the article is something more than a mere matter of curiosity. Its name, it would appear, is of Peruvian derivation, and had been called in the language of the natives Huano, signifying dung or manure; the Spaniards now name it Guano, or Guano.

"The aborigines on the coast of Peru seem to have used guano from time immemorial as manure; and at the time of the European discovery of the country, strict laws had been enacted by the Incas, to guard the islands in which it is found, and to punish with death even those who killed the sea-fowls from which it was derived. Much doubt was entertained for some time after being brought to this country, with regard to the origin of guano; the Spaniards early questioned that which seemed to have been clear to the inhabitants of Peru; but chemical examination, and other evidence, leave it no longer undetermined, that the enormous accumulations of this matter on sea islands, in various localities, is nothing more than the droppings of the myriads of fowls which inhabit them for the purposes of rest and incubation."

"The first cargo of Peruvian Guano for the use of the British farmer, was imported in 1840, and since that time the importation of it has rapidly increased; but the trade in Guano, which has been opened last year to the south-west coast of Africa, bids fair to be augmented to a degree which quite baffles any calculation."

"Up to the 24th of May, in this year alone, twelve ships have already arrived in Liverpool, whose united cargoes amount to 6670 tons. A large number of ships are now loading, by last accounts, at Ichaboe, and many more are on their way with cargoes from that place, so that the market will, no doubt, be immediately supplied with abundance, at very moderate prices."

We have not room for Lieutenant Petrie's very interesting details of the "rookeries" of penguins, albatrosses, &c., which congregate on the shores; nor of the chemical history of the manure, or the testimonies of practical men as to its application.

Meanwhile, we turn to the unfortunate state of things at Ichaboe, which has been, in great measure, brought about by the success which has already attended the voyages thither for guano. We learn from a letter, dated there July 6, 1844, that the whole island was in a state of mutiny, and that a vessel had been dispatched to the Cape for a ship of war, to save bloodshed and protect the immense property about here—"between seventy and eighty vessels, the one getting almost hawse of the other; and should anything serious occur, the loss of property would be tremendous." It is, however, calculated in this account that all the guano will be removed from the island in the course of twelve months.

The following extract from a letter, dated two days later (July 8), shows that affairs have not improved. The writer is Captain W. Braderick, Star-o'-the-West:—

"We have had dreadful weather on the coast; two vessels have been wrecked, and several more have lost their anchors, and were obliged to go to sea without them. They have been out now ten days, and we have no account of them, therefore I fear they are no more. I have been here now ten days, and we have had four funerals from accidents, such as boats capsizing, &c. There are at present upwards of 80 vessels and no less than 3000 men on this small island, a great many more common men than officers; a large number of the latter are Irish labourers, and the consequence is that a mutiny is a matter of daily occurrence. Last Wednesday all the masters had to turn themselves into a body to take off the island two men who had drawn their knives and threatened to stab the first captain that should come near them."

Now are the perils of the guano trade confined to Ichaboe; for, in the Times of Thursday last, is a most interesting narrative received by that journal, from Captain Ironmonger, (brig Africanus), of the capture and destruction by the Moors of a portion of the crews of the ships Margaret and Courier, both belonging to the port of London, while in search of guano at the island of Arguin, on the coast of Africa. Mr. Ironmonger states, that he received the account which he has forwarded, from Captain Northwood, of the Margaret, whom he had rescued, with others of the captives, from the Moors.

The mode of shipping the guano, shown in the second illustration, resembles the old method of shipping coals by stiths, common in the north of England.

CURIOUS TREE AT BADEN-BADEN.

The annexed outline sketch may interest the arboriculturists and foresters of England. It represents two branches of an oak-tree, which, re-uniting above, again forms one single trunk, as undivided and complete as at the base. Nature, and not art, has produced this junction. The tree was, for the first time, observed in 1818, by wood-cutters in the Kaiserswald (now Mählbergwald), Grand Duchy of Baden. Being considered a great curiosity, this portion of the tree was cut off and fixed in a part of the grounds surrounding Mählberg Schloss, a late residence of the Grand Ducal family, and built on the foundations of a Roman fortress.

The circumference of the trunk, where it was cut, is at present, after having been barked and smoothed by the axe, four feet six inches; its height above ground eight feet nine inches, and the width of the space between the branches four feet nine inches.

CURIOUS OAK AT BADEN-BADEN.

Between the branches is seen the village of Orschweier; beyond are the vine-bearing hills of the Kaiserstuhl; and more distant still, on the right, the mountains of the Vosges in France; the Rhine flowing between these two ranges.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE GATEWAY OF ETHELBERT'S CASTLE.

Near to the Reculvers, and within a stone throw of the sea, stands this venerable relic of the Saxon times. It is situated in a lonely valley; a clear limpid stream freshens the sward which thrives around this time-hallowed monument. A stately oak seems to vie with it in its antiquity; its bare and rugged arms, studded with a few withered leaves, speak of nature's slow decay—tell the observer that it is not yet gone. Some straggling cottages, pitched here and there in the sweet recess, can hardly yet boast the name of village. But we are forgetting the farm-house built upon the site of an ancient palace.

The present tenant cares not for old associations. Who is Ethelbert to him, or he to Ethelbert? He even hints at the destruction of the only remaining portion of these noble ruins, viz.: the gateway, and he alleges, as an excuse for its demolition, "the obstruction to farm carts and cattle." The expense of pulling down and removing would cover eight or ten times that of erecting another gate elsewhere; and the work of a few hours will thus rescue a relic that ought to be the care of the nation.

ETHELBERT'S GATE, KENT.

Truly, something must be done to save it. A monument recalling scenes of some thousand years back—a memento of some ten or eleven centuries—ought not to be thus lost.

Linger here awhile, and in this green and pleasant valley let's conjure up, with the wand of fancy, the days of its glory—yes, restore it to its former grandeur. Let the ancient palace stand as in former times, its frowning towers threatening the outward enemy; the fine old gateway, with its stout and stalwart walls. Let us let us restore animation to the mouldering remains of its kingly tenant; breathe life into his crumbling dust; let him behold his palace as it was—as it is; let him see the work of a few centuries. The yard where once his haughty warriors paraded, is now the abode of swine! Ethelbert would shudder at the sight, and reproach us for disturbing him.

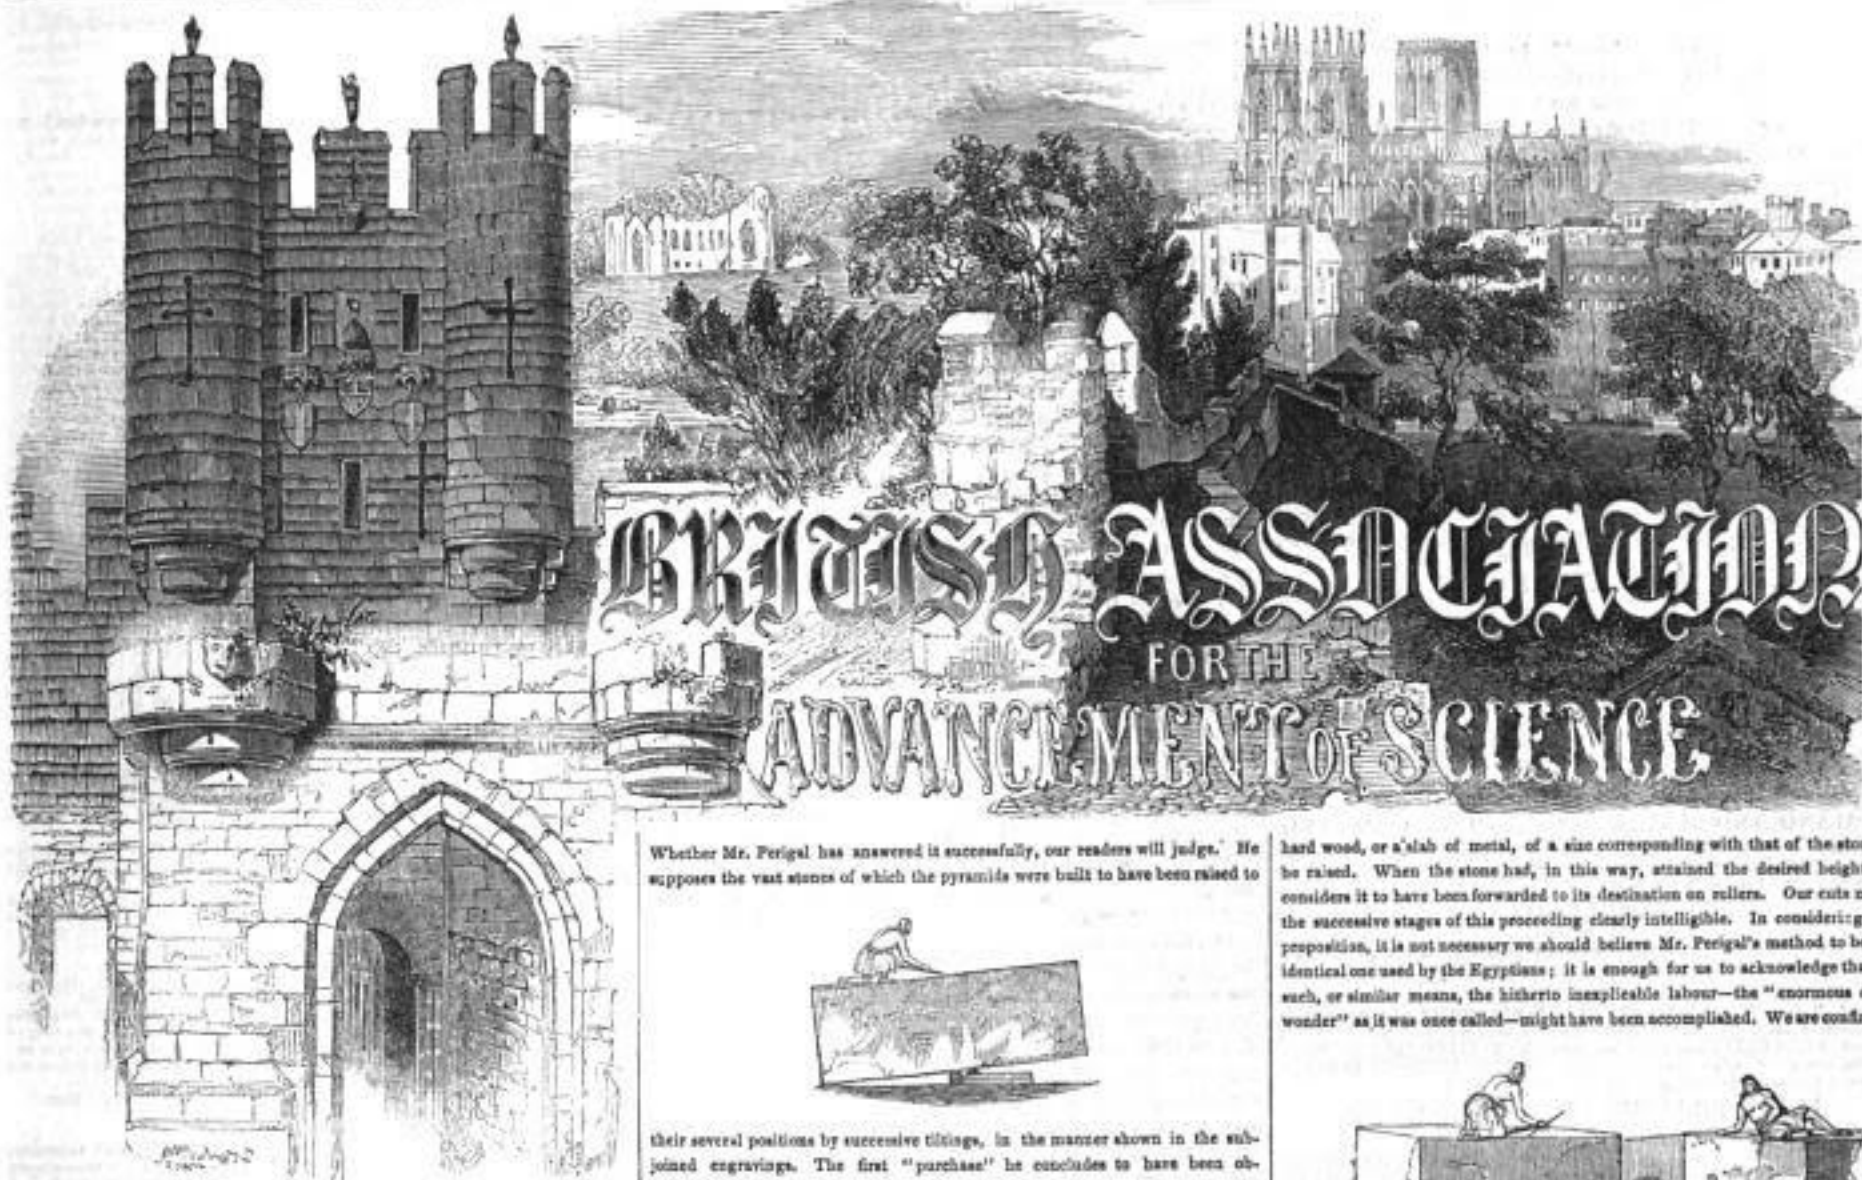

To the nation, or those who profess to represent it, we appeal: to them we appeal, trusting that these venerable remains will be rescued from destruction. Surely this is a case for the British Archaeological Association, whose proceedings at Canterbury we reported in our last.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.—We have just seen an excellent portrait of his Majesty the King of the French, drawn in pen and ink, by Mr. Minard, even with more than his accustomed delicacy and finish. The likeness is admirable.

THE WHARTON PEREGRINE.—The obstructions hitherto in the way of Colonel Tynte's claim to the Wharton peerage, are understood to be so far removed, that it is expected he will be called to the Upper House by the title of Baron Wharton in a few months.

A RAILWAY ON FIRE.—The suspension bridge erected for the purpose of the Middleburgh branch of the Stockton and Darlington Railway, where it crosses the Tees, a little above Stockton, having proved insufficient, a handsome one has recently been completed, under the direction of Mr. Robert Stephenson, consisting of long tubular girders resting upon solid masonry. The centre arch, or water-way, is probably the widest span upon this construction: it is, in forming the embankment at the west end of the new bridge, a large quantity of small coal, brought from 25 to 30 miles from the pits, has been made use of, and spontaneous combustion has taken place in this mass. The progress of the fire is not rapid; but such is the hold it has obtained that a complete deluge of water has proved useless. Measures are now taking to put in clay banks; that is, walls of wet clay, and this there is no doubt will prove effectual. In the meantime the passenger trains (10 each way), goods trains, and coals—say 3,000 tons (to which if we add coal waggons each way we shall nearly double the total)—run daily without any inconvenience or interruption.

The fourteenth annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science is now assembled in the ancient city of York, in which place, the public will remember, the first meeting of the Association was held. The locality is an admirable one for the purpose, being well suited in relation to the interests of many important counties, and admirably calculated to furnish abundant and instructive amusement to the visitors. Indeed, few spots equal it in antiquarian or geological interest. Our heading displays a general view of York, combined with one of the venerable City gates; the Minster; the Ruins of St. Mary's; the old walls; and other objects of interest. The president for this year is the Very Rev. George Peacock, Dean of Ely; and the vice-presidents, the Earl Fitzwilliam, Viscount Morpeth, Hon. J. S. Wortley, Sir David Brewster, Michael Faraday, and Rev. W. Vernon Harcourt. The reports on the Progress of Science, and of researches entrusted to members and committees of the Association, are understood to be of great interest and importance. With some of these we have been made acquainted; but as their details are mostly of a purely scientific character, we shall, in this notice, confine ourselves to a brief account of a paper which has already excited considerable attention among the mechanical illuminati of London. We allude to Mr. Perigal's plan of raising stones of enormous magnitude, for the construction of pyramids, temples, &c., supposed to be the one employed by the ancient Egyptians in the erection of their ponderous structures. The precise method used by the mighty builders of the Nile Valley has for centuries remained a vexed question.

Whether Mr. Perigal has answered it successfully, our readers will judge. He supposes the vast stones of which the pyramids were built to have been raised to their several positions by successive tiltings, in the manner shown in the subjoined engravings. The first "purchase" he concludes to have been obtained by removing the earth, beneath the stone to be raised, to the extent of one half, and then lowering the huge block into the space so formed, by the weight of a labourer placed on its unsupported end. After each tilt, he imagines the height gained, to have been secured by the insertion of a board of hard wood, or a slab of metal, of a size corresponding with that of the stone to be raised. When the stone had, in this way, attained the desired height, he considers it to have been forwarded to its destination on rollers. Our cuts make the successive stages of this proceeding clearly intelligible. In considering this proposition, it is not necessary we should believe Mr. Perigal's method to be the identical one used by the Egyptians; it is enough for us to acknowledge that by such, or similar means, the hitherto inexplicable labour—the "enormous cruel wonder" as it was once called—might have been accomplished. We are confirmed

BUILDING THE PYRAMIDS.

In this conclusion by the fact that a few years ago, Col. Dansey partially used a somewhat similar mode in raising a ship in dock; and also, that in 1834, the authorities of the British Museum successfully tried a modification of the same principle, in moving and placing the Egyptian antiquities in the Great Saloon. Our cut of the pyramids of Jaseh, and viewed from the summit of the one known as Cheops, places the notion of Mr. Perigal's discovery in a very striking point of view.

Next week we shall resume our illustrated chronicle of the important proceedings of the Association.

We have received a letter from Mr. Landells, the gentleman engaged by us to take sketches in the neighbourhood of Blair Athol, in which he informs us, that he has had the distinguished honour of submitting several of his sketches to the Queen, with which her Majesty expressed her gratification. Our daily contemporaries have alluded to the distinguished honour conferred on us through Mr. Landells, and the Standard, in its account of the sojourn of the Queen at Blair Athol, notices the reception of that gentleman, in the following terms:—

Mr. Landells, a gentleman connected with the Illustrated News, who is taking sketches of the scenery in the neighbourhood for that periodical, has had the honour of submitting some of them for her Majesty's inspection. The Queen expressed herself highly pleased with the spirit and accuracy of the sketches, and has commissioned Mr. Landells to paint for her two views, one of the Upper, and the other of the Lower Falls of Bruar.

The engravings given by us this week are from the sketches submitted by Mr. Landells to the Queen, and which elicited the Royal approval.

"A Constant Reader."—A fan produces coolness in a warm room, or in a theatre, even though the air which it agitates be very warm. To explain this, it must be considered that the air which surrounds us is generally cooler than the temperature of the body. If the air be still, the particles near the skin acquire the temperature of the skin itself, and form a sort of warm covering for it. The fan, however, by the agitation which it produces, constantly carries the air next the skin, and brings fresh and cooler air into its place; and such new particles of air, as it strikes the skin, takes heat from it, and carries off that heat, thus producing refreshing coolness. Such is the philosophy of the fan.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1844.

Soon after the passing of the Reform Bill, Sir Robert Peel made the memorable declaration that the "battle of the Constitution" must be fought in the Registration Courts. It is true that the new system of registration gave rise to a vast deal of chicanery, and we believe that many an independent voter suffered himself to be disfranchised rather than submit to the trouble, vexation, and, we may almost say, the disgrace of defending his vote against unscrupulous advocates, whose purpose was rather to diminish the ranks of a particular party than to do away with error and injustice. But Sir Robert Peel was not answerable for these dishonest attempts to serve party interests, at the expense of good feeling and propriety. We believe that the right hon. gentleman is totally incapable of attempting to increase the number of the Conservatives by trickery or evasion. The Reform Bill made an immense advance towards democracy, and totally changed the position of the electoral body. Its avowed object was to give the people a greater share in the representation; and we admit that it was wise and proper to extend their privileges as far as possible, without rushing recklessly upon innovation. Sir Robert was therefore right in endeavouring to provide a system which should protect the honest elector, and defeat the attempts of those who sought rather their own aggrandisement, and the ascendancy of a particular party, than the good of their country.

We admit at once that the first working of the Registration Bill did not afford a good specimen of legislation. The Registration Courts were rather arenas for evasion and legal technicality, than the spots where "the battle of the Constitution" could be fairly fought or gained. We are happy to find, however, that the amendments which have been made from time to time have been productive of a state of things much more satisfactory. The Registrations which are now proceeding have not presented any of the anomalies noticed in former years. There have been few, if any, records of a decision by one barrister totally at variance with the judgment of another, and instead of day after day wasted in frivolous objection, or abusive controversy, the business is rapidly disposed of, just claims are allowed, and, on the other hand, when the right to vote cannot be established beyond reasonable dispute, it is set aside at once, and upon just and fair grounds. This is as it should be. The elective franchise is one of the most valuable privileges which an Englishman can enjoy; and it is the interest of honest men, let them belong to what party they may, to take care that it is not exercised dishonestly or fraudulently. The man who can show that he is fairly entitled to a vote, should be encouraged and assisted in his endeavours to make good his claim; but we hope, for the honour both of Conservatives and Whigs, that the disgraceful struggles which have been made to harass and cheat men of their elective franchise, will never be renewed.

We are glad to find that we were not deceived in supposing that Mr. O'Connell, when the surprise and exultation consequent upon a supposed triumph should have passed away, would become more reasonable, and would lower his tone of exultation into one more consistent with the real position in which he stands. It is not our intention to enter into the vexed and irritating question of the legality or illegality of the conviction. Suffice it to say, that even Mr. O'Connell himself begins to doubt whether he has been liberated entirely upon the merits of the case. According to our accounts from Ireland, all his dire projects of vengeance and retaliation are abandoned for the present. In his last speech he dwelt only upon two of his propositions—the renewal of the Clontarf meeting and the Peace Preservative Society. Even these two seem likely to fall to the ground. Indeed, the first is disposed of, for the committee report against the meeting, and the learned gentleman entirely concurs in the propriety of not attempting such a perilous step as a monster assemblage, in defiance of the Government, and despite of the eventual consequences of the first effort of that kind. As to the other great step for the regeneration of Ireland—the Peace Preservative Society—every one may understand what is meant by the request made by the committee for more time to consider of the matter. We feel confident that no long time will elapse before a communication will be made, to the effect that it will be as well, if not better, to let the Repeal Association continue the "even tenor of its way," without the assistance of the controlling power of the £100 subscribers.

With respect to the "Banquet to the Martyrs," as the file celebrated last week is termed by the Irish papers, our readers will gather from our account of it that it was not such a formidable demonstration as some of the most sanguine of the agitators might have expected. It is true it was a monster assembly, consisting of some seven or eight hundred guests; but there was no great display of enthusiasm. Mr. O'Connell's speech was an admitted failure, and if the truth must be told, there was "metal more attractive" in the oration of a subordinate agitator, Mr. Maguire. If the latter gentleman was a little inclined to violence, and seemed disposed to wage war by wholesale upon the whole of this "woful wicked world," yet his outpourings of wrath were so tempered by dry and cutting humour, that it was evident he did not desire to be quite so severe upon the Saxons in general, or upon Mr. Attorney-General Smith in particular, as the literal meaning of his words would have imported. Upon the whole, looking to the last proceedings at the Repeal Association, in conjunction with the tone of the speakers at the Monster Banquet, we do not think there is anything to justify the sombre anticipations of those who affect to see tokens of increasing dissatisfaction in Ireland, and augmented difficulty for the Ministry. Doubtless, there are abundant elements of discord, and ample scope for the Government to exercise their powers of Statesmanship when they come to consider their Irish policy, but yet we fully believe, that if a firm but conciliatory policy be adopted, as we have no doubt it will be, the career of agitation may yet be stopped. Already, the agitators are relaxing. Mr. Smith O'Brien has left Dublin, and Mr. O'Connell will ere long be wandering over his native mountains, in company with his henchmen.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The preparations for the reception of the King of the French, at the Castle, are proceeding with the greatest rapidity under the superintendence of Mr. Saunders, the Inspector of Palaces. Independently of the suite of rooms (consisting of the King's and Queen's chambers, the King's drawing-room, the ante-chamber, and the council chamber, forming a portion of the state apartments), which will be devoted exclusively to the use of his Majesty, the whole of the state-rooms will be in requisition during the sojourn of her Majesty's royal and illustrious guest at the Castle. The orders at present are, that all the arrangements connected with the apartments to be occupied by his Majesty shall be completed by Saturday, the 5th proximo, but the King is not expected to arrive until the Monday following. The private apartments will be ready for the reception of the Court on Wednesday next, on which day, it is stated, her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the Princess Royal, may return to the Castle. It is not expected, however, as the Queen will not leave Blair Athol until the morning of Tuesday, that it will be possible for the Court to reach Windsor until the following Thursday. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, and Prince Alfred, are expected to leave the Pavilion, at Brighton, for the Castle, on Tuesday next. There is now not the least doubt of her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and a portion of the Infant Royal Family, paying a visit to the Isle of Wight during the autumn. Osborne House, small, confined, and inconvenient as it is, and in every respect unbecoming the residence of the Sovereign, is now in course of preparation for the reception of the Court, which is expected to arrive there immediately after the departure of the French Monarch from Windsor.

We have some reason to believe that it is the intention of the Queen to honour Brighton with a visit, on her Majesty's return from Scotland.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—It is most likely the Court intends to spend some time at the Isle of Wight. The Monkey, one of her Majesty's steam-vessels, has proceeded to Brighton, to be placed under the orders of the Lord Chamberlain, to take furniture, &c., from the Royal Pavilion to the Isle of Wight.

THE ROYAL CHILDREN.—We are happy to announce that the Prince of Wales, the Princess Alice, and Prince Alfred, continue at the Pavilion, Brighton, in excellent health. The Royal Infants are taken carriage drives daily on the cliffs, and the older ones occasionally take pedestrian exercise on the Chair Pier, attended by Dowager Lady Lytton. The time fixed for their departure for Windsor is next Tuesday.

THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.—The Brussels Gazette states that King Leopold has been slightly hurt in the leg while following the chase at Ardennes.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER AND THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, have left Gosport, Levenstern, the seat of Earl Howe, for Witley Court, Worcestershire, the residence of the Queen Dowager.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived in Glasgow last Saturday, accompanied by the Marquis of Douglas, the Earl of Dunmore, the Hon. C. A. Murray, &c.

The Duke of Wellington is expected to leave Windsor Castle early in the week after next for Apsley House, en route to participate in the approaching splendid festivities at Windsor Castle in honour of the visit of his Majesty the King of the French. The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro have arrived at the Castle, from a tour of six weeks in Germany, and shortly come to town to attend the nuptials of her ladyship's cousin, Miss Hope Vere, with Lord Loftus, eldest son of the Marquis of Ely, which are fixed to take place the week after next.

THE ORDER OF THE GARTER.—A Chapter of the noble and illustrious Order of the Garter will be held at Windsor Castle, on Friday, the 11th of October, for the election of two knights. The King of the French, it is expected, will, as a European Sovereign, be elected an honorary Knight of the Order during his sojourn in this country.

Earl de Grey is spoken of as one of the probable new Knights of the Garter.

The Marquis of Lansdowne and family have arrived at Paris.

Lord Palmerston arrived at Frankfurt on the 17th inst.

THE EARL AND COUNTESS OF LINCOLN.—It is stated, on good authority, that, through the mediation of friends, a reconciliation has been effected between the Earl and Countess of Lincoln, and that the slight differences which had caused a partial separation have been amicably adjusted, to the satisfaction, not only of themselves, but of the respective members of the noble families with which they are so intimately connected.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.—Sir James left town on Sunday evening by the eight o'clock train of the London and Birmingham Railway, and is now at Netherby Hall.

THE MARQUIS OF DONOGAL.—We regret to state that the Marquis of Donogal is at present labouring under very serious indisposition at Belfast, and that the most melancholy fears are entertained as to the result.

A matrimonial alliance is said to be arranged between an accomplished young person in her own right, who attained her majority last year, and a revered gentleman collaterally related to a noble earl possessing large estates in the west of England.

The Duke of Palmella has arrived in London from Lisbon.

DEATH OF LADY HUNTER.—Accounts have been received of the death of the above lady. Her ladyship was daughter and heiress of Mr. James Dickson, of Aston's Hill, Warwickshire, and married, in 1797, General Sir Martin Hunter, G.C.H. The deceased lady was in her 70th year.

DEATH OF LADY ELLEN FANE.—We regret to say that this lady died on Monday last. The deceased lady was third daughter of the Earl of Macclesfield, by his first marriage with Miss Edwards, eldest daughter of Mr. Lewis Edwards. Her ladyship was married last Nov., 1839, to Mr. John William Fane, eldest son of Mr. John Fane, of Wormsley, Oxon, and nephew of the eighth Earl of Westmoreland.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

RE-OPENING OF ST. PAUL'S.—The metropolitan church, which has been so long closed for repairs, is to be re-opened to-morrow (Sunday).

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY'S VISITATION.—On Tuesday morning the Archbishop of Canterbury held his triennial visitation at All Saints' Church, Maidstone. There were present, A. B. Hope, Esq., M.P.; Archdeacon Lyall, Dr. Burnaby, and upwards of one hundred clergymen. The Archbishop delivered a long benediction, in the course of which he directed attention to the state of education in that county, and to the prospects of the church generally. He stated that, from what he could hear and see, and from what he could gather from the speeches of dissenters at their various meetings, that there was a growing dislike on their part towards the church, and that some serious designs for its overthrow were in contemplation. From external violence, or the internal dissensions which at present agitate the church, the Archbishop anticipated no ill consequences, although he admitted that it was in the highest degree painful to contemplate them. After discussing at some length the subject of church extension, the Archbishop recommended the formation of auxiliary branches on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and concluded with sundry points of advice to the younger clergy, as to the manner of conducting their ministrations. A dinner was given to the Archbishop in the evening at the Star Hotel.

On Tuesday the Lord Bishop of Exeter consecrated a new church at Woodbury Salterton, Devon.

The Lord Bishop of Norwich consecrated a new church at Lakenham, Norwich, on Tuesday, in the presence of a number of the clergy. It is dedicated to St. Mark.

The Lord Bishop of Chester has instituted the Rev. Henry Deek, curate of Helidon, to the rectory of St. Barnabas, Manchester. His lordship has also instituted the Rev. H. P. Hughes, curate of Hyde, to the ministry of Christ Church, Dolphinholme.

The Lord Bishop of Norwich has collated the Rev. John Hedingfield Collyer, M.A., of Backford Hall, Norfolk, and Vicar of Wroxham, with Salhouse, in the same county, to the archdeaconry of Norwich, vacant by the death of the late Venerable Archdeacon Bathurst.

The valuable rectory of North Creake, Norfolk, has become vacant by the death of the Venerable Archdeacon Bathurst. The living is worth £1109 a year, and is in the gift of Earl Spencer and the Bishop of Norwich. By the death of the Archdeacon, the living of Holesley, Suffolk, has also become vacant. It is in the gift of W. Rolton, Esq., and is worth £636 per annum.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.—The following circular has been addressed to members of Convocation:—"Oxford, Sept. 23, 1844.—Members of Convocation are respectfully informed that the Vice-Chancellor, although requested by the Senior Proctor, has refused to give any information as to the day of the nomination of his successor. Whether this information will be open to Dr. Symonds, members of Convocation may decide for themselves from the events of the past year. At all events, it is to be hoped that they will hold themselves in readiness to come up on the receipt of a notice of the day, if the discovery of it proves possible; or if not, to show in some other marked way their sense of this fresh act of injustice."

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE TOWER.—Preparations have been commenced for the extensive improvements about to be made in the Tower, agreeably to plans approved of by the Government. Barracks are to be built on the site of the small structures, which were destroyed by fire in 1841. The alterations in the Jewell-chapel proceed but slowly.

FAIL IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—In consequence of the large supply of wheat and flour at Mark-lane on Monday, and a general tendency to a decline in prices on Tuesday, the bakers throughout the metropolis lowered the best bread to 7d. the 4lb. loaf, and the second quality to 6d. In Blackfriars-road, the New-curt, Whitechapel, Westminster, and other populous parts, many of them only charge 3d. for the 4lb., weighed on delivery, and excellent bread.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—This structure is so far advanced that the committee of Lloyd's have announced to the subscribers that the subscription-room will be prepared for the transaction of business in a short time. The centre area of the Exchange is nearly all laid down with the tessellated pavement. The building is entirely cleared externally, and workmen are employed in placing the dagstones, many of which are from eight to ten feet square. Iron gas pillars are erected at short distances from each other, on every side of the edifice, and the gas pipes are almost all fixed. The bells, fifteen in number, and weighing above 100 tons, have been in the tower some days. They are so arranged that they can be played in three different keys. The key in which they are set in "E" flat; by the introduction of "A" natural they can be played in "B" flat, and by "D" flat being introduced, they can be played in the key of "A" flat. The tunes to be played besides "God save the Queen" and "Rule Britannia," have not yet been finally determined. It is intended, if possible, to have a tune played which was a favourite with Sir Thomas Graham, and composed by Mosley, one of his most intimate friends. The entire machinery of the clock is considered the finest specimen of mechanism of the sort extant. It cost £2000 for the manufacturing of the tools alone, but which it is stated will be available for any similar work.

BILLINGSWORTH WARD.—Mr. Thomas Sidney, of Ladgate Hill, was on Thursday elected Alderman of Billingsworth Ward, in the room of Anthony Brown, Esq., who resigned on his election as City Chamberlain. Mr. Sidney's proposer was Mr. Park, and his seconder Mr. Bower. There being no other candidate, Mr. Sidney was elected as a matter of course.

ELECTION OF AN ALDERMAN FOR THE WARD OF PORTOKEN.—The nomination for an alderman of the ward of Portoken, in the room of Mr. Thomas Johnson, resigned, took place on Wednesday. The candidates are Francis Graham Moon, Esq., one of the present sheriffs, and David Salomons, Esq., who lately filled the office of Sheriff of London. Mr. Salomons resigned. Mr. Wood proposed Mr. Moon, and Mr. Phillips seconded the nomination. The Lord Mayor inquired if there was any other candidate to propose, and no answer being given, Mr. Sheriff Moon said, he came amongst them as an independent man—he was called a Tory, but he did not consider the office of alderman a political one. He was a preserver of every thing that was good, and a reformer of everything bad. (Cheers.) He was well known in the ward from his boyhood. Whatever might be the result of the election, he should feel the same respect for the high character of Mr. Salomons as he had always entertained. If returned, he should endeavour to do his duty honestly, independently, and impartially. Mr. Salomons said he was a magistrate for the counties of Kent and Sussex, and therefore acquainted with the magisterial duties. He owed his appointment to the political party to which he adhered, viz., the Whigs. (Hear, hear, hear.) He thought at the present day it was too much to say that a person of the Jewish persuasion was unfit to administer justice. He thought his public character qualified him to hold any office in the power of his fellow-citizens to give him. (Hear, hear.) He was an Englishman born, and had as great a regard for the welfare and honour of the country as any one he was addressing; and he trusted no technical point of form would prevent him from taking an office of honour if he should be elected. (Loud cheers.) He was perfectly willing to sign a declaration consistent with his conscience, and no other declaration ought to be required of him.—The Lord Mayor took a show of hands, when a considerable majority were held up for Mr. Salomons. His lordship declared the election, on a show of hands, to be in favour of that gentleman; upon which a poll was then demanded by Mr. Moon. At half-past four o'clock the numbers for the day were—For Mr. David Salomons, 81; and for Mr. Sheriff Moon, 57; being a majority for the former of 24. On Thursday the Lord Mayor, at twelve o'clock, adjourned the poll till Friday, as he was compelled to attend the election for Billingsworth Ward. The numbers at that hour were—For Mr. Salomons, 122; for Mr. Moon, 94: Majority, 28.—The poll closed finally yesterday, in favour of Mr. Salomons, the majority for that gentleman being 31. The numbers were—for Salomons, 169; Moon, 138.

ALBERT PARK.—The Earl of Lincoln has directed Mr. Page and Mr. Thomas Cubitt to survey and lay out Battersea-fields for a park, to be called Albert Park. They have received instructions to plan an ornamental piece of water for a bathing place, to be screened with plantation. There will be a carriage drive from Battersea-bridge to Nine Elms, in front of the river. Chelsea College, from this park, will appear to great advantage.

THE LATE SIR ARTHUR COOPER.—A monument and statue have, within the last few days, been erected in St. Paul's Cathedral, to the memory of the late Sir Arthur Cooper, the eminent surgeon. It was raised by subscription, confined to the members of the profession of which he was so valuable and valued a member. The greater proportion of the donors were pupils of Sir Arthur Cooper. The statue, exclusive of the pedestal, is eight feet high, and the likeness is considered a good one.

THE PROPOSED HOSPITAL IN BLACKFRIARS.—On Monday a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of the parishes of St. Bride's, Fleet-street; St. Anne's, and St. Andrew's, Blackfriars; and Bridewell parishes, was held at Hadley's Hotel, New Bridge street, for the purpose of taking measures to prevent the contemplated establishment of an infirmary for the cure of cutaneous diseases, at the house, 25, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, formerly occupied by Mr. Barber, the solicitor. Mr. W. F. Delane took the chair, and in the course of his address stated that in the house at which it was intended to have the infirmary the means of accommodation were extremely small. It had been calculated by the projectors of the institution that they would have 400 patients a week, all of whom would have to be in attendance nearly every morning. As it was impossible that all could be accommodated at once, a large majority of them would have to wander about the adjacent streets, or to take refuge under the porticoes of the neighbouring houses. Resolutions affirmatory of the danger to the interests and health of the parishes to be approached from the infirmary were agreed to, and a committee was appointed to carry out the object for which the meeting was convened.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Wednesday a meeting of the friends of this society was held at Exeter Hall, to celebrate the 50th year of the society's existence. The platform was filled with dissenting ministers from all parts of the country, and some clergymen. In the body of the hall there were upwards of 4000 persons. Sir Culling Eardley Smith, Bart., took the chair, and was supported by Mr. Prichard, late consul at Tahiti, the Rev. E. Bickersteth, M.A., rector of Wotton; Dr. Vaughan, president of the Lancashire Independent College; Dr. Jenkin, principal of Coward College, London; Dr. Colclough, Dr. Leitch, Messrs. Sherman, James, Callow, Jay, Blackburn, Parsons, Harris, &c. A resolution, expressive of gratitude to Providence for the favour bestowed on the society during the last fifty years, was moved by the Rev. E. Bickersteth, M.A., rector of Wotton; seconded by Dr. Bunting, president of the Wesleyan Conference, and carried unanimously. Dr. Leitch moved the second resolution, deploring the persecutions of the Christians in the islands of Madagascar and Tahiti, and expressing towards them cordial sympathy and prayerful solicitude; also condemning the conduct of France towards the Queen of Tahiti. Fifty years ago this society had only three missionaries, now it had 700; then there was one station, now there were 85, with various preaching places around them. Since its formation a million and a half sterling had been expended, chiefly the contributions of British Christians. The resolution, having been seconded by Dr. Hamilton, was carried. A subscription on behalf of the society was commenced, and £4000 were announced.

THE PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS IN WESTMINSTER.—Considerable improvements have been under the consideration of Government, to be effected in the neighbourhood of Westminster. The houses of a notorious character are to be taken down, and a most excellent improvement, not only morally but sanatorially, will be effected. It was in Orchard-street that Oliver Cromwell had one of his palaces; but in those days Palmer's village was close beside it, and was the seat of gentlemen's country houses. In James-street, where Lady Dacre's almshouses now stand, Lady Dacre had her residence, and this by her will has been devoted to the erection, many years since, of one of the first institutions in England, being nearly equal to that of Christ's Hospital in the city of London. Peter-street derives its name from having been built on the grounds upon which formerly stood a splendid mansion belonging to an ancestor of the present Lord Peter. Lady Dacre left to the City an estate of between two and three acres of ground, and that called Palmer's village, which has been occupied in small tenements for a number of years. The whole of this space is to form a part of the new street from Westminster Abbey to Buckingham Palace.

BRITISH PORCELAIN.—Mr. Smith, of Conduit-street, has just completed a Russian roshan, a superb Dinner and Desert Service of Porcelain, manufactured at his Works in Staffordshire. The service extends to 300 pieces, and the pattern comprises exquisitely painted bouquets of flowers, and splendid ultramarine, relieved with gold in devices of truly classic taste. The forms of the several pieces are very novel and very beautiful: those of the tureens, compotiers, &c., have the best characteristics of the antique gracefully combined; and the effect of the whole is so creditable a specimen of British skill as to satisfy the most sceptical of the tasteless preference too often extended to Continental manufactures in this branch of art.

EXTENSIVE SEIZURE.—A seizure of foreign watches and jewellery was made on Saturday from a dealer in Greek-street, Soho, by a landing warden, lately appointed, named Griffiths, of the estimated value of upwards of £3000. The watches consist of 120 gold and 36 silver, with upwards of 1400 gold and silver keys, rings, brooches, &c. This branch of contraband trade has lately been carried on most extensively through the medium of the steamers running to the continental ports, and from the small compass occupied by such wares, the utmost vigilance is too often eluded.

IRELAND.

THE CONGRATULATORY DINNER TO O'CONNELL.

The dinner to congratulate O'Connell and his fellow-travellers took place on Thursday week (a report of which appeared in a late edition of last week) at the Music Hall, Dublin. Nothing of a very remarkable character occurred. Between 700 and 800 persons were present. Mr. O'Connell sat on the right of the chairman, W. S. O'Brien, M.P., and to his right sat the Bishop of Ardagh, Right Rev. Dr. Higgins. On the left of the chair sat the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, next him Lord Fife and the Bishop of Meath, Right Rev. Dr. Cantwell. After the health of the Queen, which was given with all the honours, the chairman proposed the "Health of O'Connell and the Repeal of the Union." The toast excited great enthusiasm. Mr. O'Connell, in his speech of acknowledgment for the toast, urged every one to renewed exertion for Repeal, and spoke in a triumphant tone of the prospects of the Repealers. He said there should be no rest from agitation, till Ireland was righted. Mr. John O'Connell, Dr. Grey, Mr. Stiele, and other travellers, responded to the compliments paid to them as fellow-prisoners of O'Connell; the Rev. Dr. Cantwell, prelate; Mr. O'Hear, Dr. Marcellus, the Catholic Bishop of Clogher; the celebrated priest, the Rev. Thomas Maguire; Mr. Grattan, M.P., the Lord Mayor, Cash Powell, Esq., M.P., Mr. Staunton, and Lord Fife, subsequently addressed the assembly, which broke up about 12 o'clock. Among the toasts were "The Healths of Lord Deane, Cottenham, and Campbell," "The Catholic Hierarchy, and Clergy of Ireland," and the "Protestant Patriots of Ireland."

Mr. O'Connell's speech was infinitely inferior in importance, or at least in humour, to that of the Rev. T. Maguire, the parish priest of Ballinamore. The rev. gentleman discovered in such an epigrammatical and caustic vein, that we cannot resist the temptation of making a few extracts from his speech. So far as the art of dealing out denunciations against opponents is concerned, we think Mr. Maguire is scarcely inferior to his great prototype. The rev. gentleman said, "The Queen can do no wrong, according to the principles of the British constitution; but I know well what wrong a daring, stiff-necked, base, and truculent Ministry, backed by an infamous Tory majority, can do." (Cheers.) We are told by the highest authority that can be quoted—an inspired authority—that no man that ever lived could tame the tongue; there is not a word about women in the text. (Laughter.) The sacred writer positively tells you, that though you may tame the lion and the tiger—and Pliny himself declares that even the adder has been tamed—but yet we are told by the holy and inspired writer, that there never yet was a man who was able to tame his tongue. We all know that Chief Justice Peasefather could not tame his tongue. (Laughter and cheers.) We all know that Sir J. Graham (groans), who is his political father, for it was he who made a Repealer of me (laughter)—we all know that he could not tame his tongue, an instance of which we had in his saying that the Papists of Ireland had arrived at the maximum of concession. (Hear, hear, and groans.) We all know that Lord Stanley (groans) could not sometimes tame his tongue, particularly when O'Connell was concerned, and when he had a tyrant majority at his back to cheer him and halloo him on. But O'Connell, with a good cause, and superior temper, had often brought the little eloquent, but, at the same time, glibbing and intemperate Stanley to his senses. (Hear, and cheers.) Gentlemen, I believe you will all admit that Lord Lyndhurst could not hold his tongue with his "allens." Ac. The sentence is too well known to require being repeated. (Hear, hear, and groans.) I now ask you if the lying, fawning, hypocritical, Lord Brougham and Voss, for he is now Voss of præterea nihil, will ever be able to hold his tongue? (Hear, hear, and groans.) I recollect in my boyish classics a sentence which struck me very forcibly as describing a man who had lost all that he had possessed in the world. It was non hominem sedit. The voice is all that remains of the man—all that remains of the once eminent Henry Brougham is the poor empty Voss. The pretty-faced, beautiful, bearded Lord Brougham, has now become, not the glory, but the shame, of the country and of the Legislature; but peius magis cavescat. I suppose you now think that I am coming down to Mr. T. B. C. Smith. (Groans and laughter.) Facilis decessus decet; and though I expose myself to the danger of being frightened by him, I will not hesitate from mentioning the General Attorney who is so by patent, and who has more Christian names than Christian virtues. (Cries of hear, hear, and loud laughter.) John Bull has been lately wrestling with France, but we kept pulling, and dragging, and slipping him, until he was at last brought upon his knees, when he cried out Peccator, for fear of Ireland. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Therefore I say, as John Bull sits three times as much as he ought, he requires five times more sleep than we are disposed to give him. But let him give us the large dose of justice that we demand, and we will allow him to rest in peace, and it can then be said of him that justitia et pax acculeat eum; "justice and peace have embraced each other." And remember, gentlemen, that although we deny England peace, we refuse her war. (Cheers.) And why do we refuse her war? Believe me it is not from fear. (Cheers.) You will recollect—at all events the Liberator will recollect—that at Castlebar I offered to meet any force they could bring into Ireland, on three months' notice. It was not then convenient for them to prosecute me, because I would be my own counsel, and would have spoken some wholesome truths, which they might not like to hear—truths which, though they might be unwise for me to speak, might be good for my country. (Cheers.) The reason why we are quiet in this—we are united and schooled by O'Connell, and determined to take his advice." (Cheers.) Mr. Maguire then referred to Sir Robert Peel: "I believe he has inflicted enough on this country. Of course I attack England through his person. I believe she has inflicted enough on us. Will Peel now give us a coercion bill to ease all? If he do—harkness in (laughter); if he do, I remind him of the motto—'Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return.' I would charge the word 'dust' for 'dirt.' (Roars of laughter.) Peel himself is not inclined to be brought to such a state; but his party will make him wallow in the mire." (Hear.)

Here is the conclusion of Mr. Maguire's speech:—"The waters of Ireland are naturally good of themselves, but that, through social disorders, through religious bigotry, and through unfortunate sectarianism, those waters have been embittered. (Hear, hear.) The mantle of Elijah fell on Elias, the mantle of Moses has fallen on O'Connell. (Cheers.) He is destined to deliver the children of the promise, long as they are labouring under the proud court of Pharaoh. (Renewed cheers.) I will tell you what—he, by a powerful and uninterrupted agitation, has given the waters a healthy taste. He has purified them by agitation, and by a certain Altit said, known well to England. By this salt he has purified them in such a manner as that the Orangemen are beginning to come to them. (Hear.) They are no longer the putrid, muddy, and semi-asphaltic waters they once were; but they are becoming pure and healthy. O'Connell has invented a moral screw. (Hear, hear.) Talk to me of your steam! Talk to me of your atmospheric attraction and power! Talk to me, sir, of the great original Archimedean screw! But O'Connell has invented one stronger than all the others; for, by means of his moral screw, he says to the navy of England, 'Go, and fight, and to the army of England, 'Come, and fight.' (Hear, hear, and cheers.) O'Connell says to the Rhadamanthuses—"You want to preserve a kind of ambitious or delusive conception in the territories of Queen Penzance; I say, come down here, get into the harbour of Kingston, and then take the puff up, and make a show of yourself at Waterford, a spectacle to men and angels"—then O'Connell begins to work his moral screw again, and says to the rest of the navy of England—"Ah, you want to be before Tangier, and you want to be before Neghore; be off instantly, and into the harbour of Cove." (Hear, and laughter.) Thus he commands the navy and army of England, and thus he speaks to every Power in Europe, by means of his moral screw. I have been through every part and parish of the country; and I say there are seven millions Repealers, and out of that number I will give you one thousand altogether of place-hunters, and expectants, and men afraid to speak out. Well, then, there are seven millions Repealers, and half a million Protestants, who are Repealers also, for unquestionably we shall have half a million Protestants. That will settle the question. All you have to do is to give a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether—to abide by the Liberator—to take his advice—not to go an inch to the right or to the left without that advice, and Repeal is certain."

A PROPOSAL FROM THE DUBLIN CORPORATION.—A special meeting of the Corporation was convened by the Lord Mayor for Wednesday, to consider a proposition from a leading Conservative member of the Town Council, that the British Parliament should assemble in Dublin every third year.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday was again much crowded, but the proceedings possessed very little interest. In the absence of Mr. W. S. O'Brien, the chair was taken by Mr. F. Cumming. Some small sums were received towards the "Independent Fund," and after an address from Mr. Kelly and Mr. H. Grattan, Mr. O'Connell made another speech, which, however, deserves but little attention. The tone of it completely confirms the view we took last week of the conciliatory disposition of Mr. O'Connell, in spite of his denunciations after his release. It is only necessary to advert to two points, the Clontarf meeting, and the decision of the committee in regard to the Preservative Society. The first of these proposals is negatived, and the second is in abeyance. Mr. O'Connell observed that, on the last day of meeting, it was referred to a committee to report whether it would be proper to hold the Clontarf meeting. There was an object in holding it, as it was a constitutional privilege; for they alleged that they were entitled to meet, and that the number did not make a difference, provided they came unarmed, and assembled with peaceable intentions. But they had indicated that privilege, and it was not now necessary to hold it. And he, for one, considered that if that principle had not been vindicated he would be for holding it at all hazards. The committee had ordered him to report that it was their unanimous opinion "that the Clontarf meeting should not be held." His next topic was with reference to "the Preservative Society," with regard to which the committee begged leave to sit again upon the inquiry. His two propositions, therefore, were, that further time should be given to consider the nature of the Preservative Society, and that they should avoid the least approach to any violation of the law. Further time was necessary, because the step to be taken must be considered and entered upon more deliberately. There are four prosecutions which had been directed against him were failures (cheers), and it was a solemn duty which he owed to the people of Ireland to keep them from any violation of the law. (Cheers.) He therefore agreed with the committee that it was right to deliberate upon this subject, and that they should have further time to consider their report. (Cheers.) It was right that people's minds should ripen upon the subject of the difference between the simple absolute repeal, and the repeal with a tendency to admit principles of federalism. There was, he was happy to say, a great growing spirit of nationality in a large portion of the party calling themselves Conservatives. They were beginning to consider the question of the restoration of the Irish Parliament. (Cheers.) It was therefore necessary to undeceive the public mind, and make them understand that the association received Federalist and Repealer alike. There could be no federalism without the repeal of the Union Act, and that Federalists and Repealers sought alike. The repeal rent for the week was announced at £260 15s. 6d.

RECORDERSHIP OF CORK.—Mr. Fenayth has received his appointment to the recordership of Cork.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—On Wednesday, J. E. Hyndman, one of the City coroners, held an inquest in the Four Courts Marshalsea, on the body of Mr. James Morris Drought, who died in that prison on the preceding day, after an incarceration of upwards of eighteen months, for a debt of £25. It appeared by the evidence, that some time after his imprisonment he took to his bed, from which he has never since risen; he was of a highly respectable family, and upwards of seventy years old. This is the fourth life that has fallen a sacrifice in the same prison within a short period. It may not be out of place here to inquire when the unfortunate imprisoned debtors of Ireland may hope for relief, by the extension of the Insolvent Debtors Act passed last session for the relief of English debtors to this country? England and Scotland—by the advantage of this measure, but not Ireland! Is the justice? If it was were extended to Ireland, hundreds of persons now suffering incalculable loss to be liberated, and enabled to apply their exertions for the benefit of their now starving families, besides the enormous saving of expense in supporting destitute paupers in the country. If the measure were now in force, there would not be a dozen persons remaining in the above prison whose debts exceed £200, and consequently, it would not be necessary to maintain that establishment at its present enormous expense.—Dublin Freeman.

THE ALLEGED PLATE ROBBERY BY AN OFFICER.—A letter has been written by Lieutenant Piddicome to a brother officer, dated Haulbowline, near Cork, in which he states that, since his liberation on bail, he has been called upon by Lieutenant Colonel Burton to tender his immediate resignation, a demand with which he refused to comply, as he felt confident that he should, at the approaching trial, which was to take place in Dublin, be enabled to prove satisfactorily his complete and entire innocence of the foul crime laid to his charge.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE LATEST NEWS RESPECTING HER MAJESTY.

BLAIR ATHOL, Wednesday.

The Queen took her usual walk this morning in the grounds of the castle, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Princess Royal on her Highland pony. Her Majesty, it is said, spends at least ten hours every day in the open air, and the pure and bracing air of the Highlands has had the most beneficial effect upon her health.

A large supply of silk, woollen, and velvet tartans, of the finest texture and most novel patterns, has been sent up within the last two days for her Majesty's inspection.

A further excursion to Glen Tilt is projected for this afternoon. The Queen and her illustrious consort, accompanied by the ladies of her suite, Lord Glenlyon, Lord C. Willsie, &c., went yesterday down Glen Tilt to the Forest Lodge, his Royal Highness Prince Albert driving the pony phaeton. There being no post from London yesterday, the Queen set out at the unusual early hour of two o'clock, and the royal party reached the Lodge at half-past three, where the Queen and her suite partook of luncheon, which had been sent on in the morning by Lord Glenlyon. The foresters had been sent out at an early hour to drive in the deer, but the wind being unfavourable they were extremely shy, and after some hours spent in endeavouring to come within shot, during which her Majesty rode with Prince Albert some distance on her Highland pony, the sportsmen were obliged to return to the Lodge, the entire sport of the day being a hind shot by Lord Glenlyon. The Queen returned to Blair Castle at seven o'clock.

The Earl of Aberdeen left the castle this morning for Laggan, the seat of the Marquis of Aberdeen, to whom the noble earl is about to pay a short visit. He will return to Blair Castle to-morrow night.

It is said that one of the huntmen in charge of the other hounds has been dispatched to Haddo House to procure some others, there being none in the neighbourhood of Blair, and the Prince having expressed a wish to witness the exciting sport of an other hunt before leaving the Highlands.

It is now stated that the Queen will leave Blair Castle on Tuesday next, at half-past eight or nine o'clock, so as to arrive at Dundee between two and three in the afternoon, which will be within two hours of high water. Preparations were being made for a luncheon on a right royal scale for the Queen and her suite at Dundee, but I hear her Majesty will not alight, but go at once on board the royal yacht, which will proceed immediately down the Frith of Tay with the other steamers of the royal squadron.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.—Louis Philippe was to leave Paris on Wednesday evening for the Chateau d'Eu, preparatory to his departure for England. He was to be accompanied to Eu by M. Gaisot and Admiral Mackau, who will also attend his Majesty to Windsor.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—We hear that the visit of her Majesty the Queen Dowager to Earl and Countess Howdown, at Selton House, near Grancham, has been postponed from the 2nd until the 10th of October. In consequence, it is understood, of her Majesty being invited to meet his Majesty the King of the French at Windsor Castle.

BANQUET TO SIR ROBERT AND LADY SALE IN LIVERPOOL.—On Thursday evening a splendid banquet was given to Sir R. and Lady Sale at the Town Hall, Liverpool, the Mayor (T. Sands, Esq.) in the chair. After the usual loyal toasts, the Mayor proposed the health of General Sir Robert Sale, who he said had filled Europe with his fame, and handed down the British flag to the world's approbation. He alluded to the more than ordinary difficulties the Gallant General had had to encounter, and spoke in a very touching manner of the conduct of his heroic wife, a captive to a barbarian. He concluded by proposing "The health of Sir Robert Sale."—Drunk with three times three. Sir Robert replied in a very concise manner, but in his usually blunt and effective way; and after many remarks illustrative of the gratitude he felt for his kind reception, concluded by proposing the health of his Worshipful the Mayor. The health of the Bishop of the diocese followed, and was responded to by Dr. Tattershall. The company broke up, evidently highly gratified with the delightful entertainment provided, and the cordiality and kind feeling that prevailed.

RECORDS OF RACES.—Thursday.—The Early Stakes of 25 sovs. each, were won by Sir J. Gerard's Pluto, beating the Cur, and two others. The Two Years' Stakes of 50 sovs. each, were won by Wynyard's beating Alaris. The Gold Cup of 150 guineas, was won by Mr. Salvo's Alice Hawthorn. The Weight Stakes of 5 sovs. were won by Jinglepot. The Consolation Plate was won in four heats by Captain Harcourt's I by Inheritor, beating Epilogue and two others.

THE DUBLIN CORPORATION AND THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.—On Wednesday a special meeting of the Town Council of the Corporation of Dublin was held, which was very fully attended, to discuss the following proposition of Dr. Maunsell:—"That a humble address be presented to the Queen, praying that her Majesty be graciously pleased to hold her court, and to summon an Imperial Parliament, to meet at least once in every three years, in her royal city of Dublin. Also that she will recommend to the consideration of Parliament the propriety of making such provision as shall secure that the same be done in future times." Dr. Maunsell supported his motion in a long speech, in the course of which he contended that it was calculated to serve Ireland. If agreed to it would decrease absenteeism, and bring capital to Ireland. Dr. Maunsell also argued that it was no novelty to charge the locality of Parliament. The speech was listened to with great attention, but the motion did not even find a seconder, and it therefore of course fell to the ground. Mr. O'Connell replied to some remarks of Dr. Maunsell, which personally concerned him, and in reference to the motion said, it was consequential to see that in political matters they had now come to unanimity of sentiment. Things could not now remain as they are. (Cheers.) There must be a change. (Renewed cheers.) And God forbid that that change should be effected without the assent of men of all persuasions and all religions. He should consider it not a blessing but a curse, if it were forced on any one portion of the Irish people. He rejoiced to see—and every hour was telling him—that new combinations were about to be formed. Every assistance he could possibly give would meet more than half-way the exertions of those who sought for Ireland those advantages of which the Learned Doctor had been speaking. (Cheers.) He would give the Irish a Parliament once in three years, but he (Mr. O'Connell) liked to have one in Dublin every summer season. (Applause.) A spirit of unity was now beginning to manifest itself, and, in the course of a few weeks, he believed one great junction of all parties would take place totally devoid of religious partisanship—combining in love for the benefit of their common country. (Great cheering.)—[A very general feeling of disappointment was evinced that Dr. Maunsell's motion had found no seconder. It was understood that if it had, the repealers would not have opposed, and that the motion would have been carried without a dissenting voice.]

MR. BELANEY AND THE MON IN THE NORTH.—Last Wednesday week the mob set fire to a farmhouse where Mr. Belaney was residing, at the village of Northumberland, near Sunderland. When Belaney, who, with his brother and some friends had been enjoying themselves in the dining-room below, found that the house was in flames, he gave the alarm, and escaped with his party through the corn fields to the house of one of the witnesses on his trial, who keeps an inn in North Sunderland, where they remained in the night. On Thursday. On that evening, a post chaise was ordered from the Black Swan Inn, Alnwick, and proceeded to North Sunderland, with a Newcastle friend of Belaney; the post-chaise left Sunderland about four o'clock, with Belaney, his brother, and his solicitor, who travelled the coast road to Alnwick, where they arrived about seven o'clock on Friday morning! The people mustered strong at Alnwick to give him a salute at the Willow Tree, but the gig was immediately sent going with the solicitor and driver at a rapid pace, and got to the public house before the people arrived; his friend jumped from the gig, and Belaney got in and drove off, at a slashing pace, to Felton, nine miles from Alnwick, on the other side of which place, he left the gig and walked away. The driver brought the gig back to Alnwick. The mail coach took up Belaney about four miles from Felton, and conveyed him to Newcastle, where, it is supposed, he is now on a visit to a respectable tradesman. Belaney, when at the Willow Tree, looked most respectable, thin, dirty, and shabby, and appeared to feel greatly the effects of his confinement, and the reception he had received since his arrival in the north.

FOREIGN.

PROJECTED INSURRECTION IN SPAIN.—A letter from Bayonne of the 22nd instant, confirms the rumour of an intended movement, on a grand scale, of the Carlists of Navarre; money, and munitions of war, along with a large number of printed proclamations, having been for some time past in readiness. Colonel Jose Maria Ladrón, the nephew of the Carlist General Santa Ladrón, who was shot in Navarre, in 1833, by the Christian General Lorenzo, with a force of 400 to 500 men, was waiting an opportunity to commencing the movement. Colonel Ladrón and Corsets, chiefs who are highly popular in Navarre, had undertaken the organisation of the Carlist forces in that province, when orders were received from General Balmaceda for the discontinuance of their preparations. The reason assigned for this unlooked-for limitation is, the repugnance of Don Carlos to acts of violence, and a lingering hope that the succession may be adjusted by a marriage between the Prince of Asturias and Queen Isabella.

THE BRAZILS.—By the brig Olive Branch, of Jersey, which has arrived at Falmouth from Bahia, with advices of August 1, we learn that the reports already published of the detection of the packet, and the cause being the pending treaty between Great Britain and the Brazils, are correct. The packet was hourly looked for at Bahia when the brig sailed. Accounts of the assassination of Monte Video were also received as authentic at Bahia, and it was reported that a force was in readiness to co-operate with Monte Video against Rosas' army. Exchange at Bahia, 26 d. 1/2 pence falling.

THE QUEEN'S SECOND VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

[In renewing our illustrations of the Royal sojourn in Scotland, we have the extreme gratification to notify to our readers, that our artist, Mr. Landells, has been honoured by the Queen's commands to execute for her Majesty two sketches of the Falls of Bruar, the scenery of which has been so much admired by the Royal visitor. We now continue our illustrated chronicle, from the late edition of our Journal of last week.]

BLAIR ATHOL, Wednesday.

A heavy shower of rain came on suddenly at one o'clock yesterday, and continued to fall in torrents for upwards of two hours. This necessarily compelled her Majesty to defer her drive until a late hour in the afternoon, and Prince Albert was also obliged to retreat from the moors above Bruar, where his Royal Highness was enjoying excellent sport. The rain ceased to fall at half-past three. As soon as the sun made his appearance the carriages were ordered to convey her Majesty to the Falls of Tummell. The Royal party left the castle in two carriages and four, preceded by outriders.

As on the previous occasion, when visiting the Pass, her Majesty addressed several questions to an old Highlander, named William Macdonald, who haunts this neighbourhood. The old man is exceedingly proud at having been selected by her Majesty to point out the beauties of his native land, and dilates with eloquent enthusiasm on being thus honoured by his Sovereign.

The positions were then ordered to drive along the high road to Perth, and, on arriving at the Falls of the Tummell, her Majesty alighted, and proceeded on foot to view the waterfall. Her Majesty walked at a rapid pace along this road, which is nearly a mile in length, and was not, as may be supposed, in a fit state for ladies, on account of the heavy rains which had lately fallen. Her Majesty, however, heeded neither the mud nor the loose gravel, but walked, leaning on the arm of Prince Albert, Lord Glenlyon acting as cicerone. Lady C. Coke, Lady Canning, and the other members of the royal suite were also of the party. On arriving at the confluence of the two rivers, where the Tummell first falls over the rocks into the Garry, her Majesty expatiated in enthusiastic language on this meeting of the waters.

After having passed three quarters of an hour in viewing the beauties of this spot, and in the immediate neighbourhood, her Majesty walked back to the carriages and returned to the castle.

Prince and the Princess Royal. At eleven o'clock, her Majesty and the Prince, attended by two servants with led ponies, left the castle on foot, and, unattended by any of their suite, forded the river Garry, as seen in our illustration, attended by a Highland guide. The Queen was dressed in black, with a shepherd's plaid shawl, and looked remarkably well on the little white pony; Prince Albert wore a shooting jacket, trousers of shepherd's plaid, white hat and cravat. The Highlander wore a short grey jacket, and carried the Queen's parasol.

Her Majesty and the Prince, with their guide, then proceeded to climb the precipitous hill of Tulloch which overhangs the back of the castle. Her Majesty succeeded in attaining the summit of the rocky mountain, a work of much labour and some peril. It appears that instead of taking the ordinary pathway, the Queen took one much more steep and difficult of ascent, the Royal pair having to cross the stream of the Garry twice, as also several mountain burns and narrow ravines.

Her Majesty, we understand, is generally up, and sometimes walking in the grounds, as early as seven o'clock in the morning; she breakfasts between eight and nine, lunches at two, takes a carriage drive between three and four, and dines at eight. The intervals are spent in making short excursions, accompanied by some of her suite, to various points of interest within the park. The Prince generally spends the earlier part of the day in shooting, accompanied by Lord Glenlyon, and several hardy Highlanders to carry the game.

The Princess Royal is taken out every day for walking and riding exercise. Her Royal Highness is a quick, lively, entertaining child, and it is said her remarks upon the persons and things passing under her notice are very amusing. It is stated that her Royal Highness can already repeat the names of all the hills in the neighbourhood. She has a most companion in the young heir of Glenlyon, an interesting boy of her own age.

It seems to be certain that her Majesty will make an excursion to Loch Tummell and Loch Rannoch; but it is also talked of that she will visit Dunkeld, though that is not likely, at least till on her way back. It is, we understand, confidently expected at Dunkeld, but little is said about it at the castle.

Her Majesty continues her habits of early rising. At seven o'clock Peter Mackay, her piper, sounds the pibroch under the windows of the castle, when her Majesty rises, and all are expected to follow her example. Her Majesty has also given instructions that a bouquet of fresh-picked heather shall be in her bedroom every morning, together with a bottle of pure water from a spring in Glen Tilt, famed for its crystal purity.

Her Majesty appears to have a great taste for things peculiarly Scottish. At Dunkeld, Monimusk, and Blair, she tasted, and not only so, but, as the report goes, highly relished, the Athol brose which was procured for her; and oatmeal cake is an established and especial favourite. "Scotch broth," as English men term it, is also in daily requisition at the royal table. It is even whispered that her Majesty is not altogether unacquainted with the mysteries of Scotch "haggis."

The Princess Royal, young though she be, is not slow in these things to imitate her royal mother. Not a child in all broad Scotland likes better to lunch on milk and oatmeal cake, or dine on broth. Meeting the young son of Lord Glenlyon, the other day, in the castle avenue, she told him how much she liked his tartan dress, and how it was the same as was worn by the Prince of Wales.

Perhaps, the most extraordinary circumstance connected with her Majesty's visit to this quarter is the entire absence of anything like popular excitement, or even curiosity. The number of strangers is extremely few, so few indeed, that when her Majesty drives out in the afternoon there are generally not more than 20 people who assemble on the road to see and salute her.

[Nothing occurred during the latter part of last week, to require any detailed notice.]

On Friday (the 20th) the Queen and Prince Albert, after breakfasting at half-past eight, left the castle soon after nine, on their ponies, attended by the servant (Sandy as he is called) who has guided them on former occasions. They proceeded through a thick plantation at the back of the castle, up a hill which lies in a north-easterly direction. They continued on that and the adjacent hills until nearly half-past eleven, at which hour they returned to the castle. After an early luncheon, they again left the castle, to go to Glen Tilt, a spot which appears to be particularly selected by her Majesty for her excursions.

The next day her Majesty went out in the grounds, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Princess Royal, and took her usual ride.

Her Majesty, who was always partial to equestrian exercise, appears to enjoy these rides amazingly, and so simple and unostentatious is the whole turn out, that it is difficult to persuade the strangers who come to Athol to obtain a sight of her Majesty, that the lady in a plain black dress and bonnet, and a shepherd's plaid shawl wrapped round her, mounted on a little smiling grey pony, is the Sovereign, with whom ideas of great pomp, state, and splendour have been associated in their minds.

The Marquis of Breadalbane has paid a visit to her Majesty, to request the Queen to visit Taymouth, but the invitation, although very pressing, was declined.

It is said that the restraint which the Queen voluntarily imposes upon herself, of not going to any great distance from the castle until after the arrival of the mail from the south, is one reason why no excursions to any great distance are contemplated. The despatches are generally delivered at the castle at three o'clock, and the Queen peruses those which are addressed to herself or submitted to her by Lord Aberdeen, denoting answers to such as require immediate attention, and a special messenger is in constant readiness to be sent off to London, in the event of any matter of pressing or urgent haste occurring.

Her Majesty writes almost every day to the Duchess of Kent and the Dowager Countess of Lytton, and is extremely particular in attending to all the details of business, and signing any state papers that may be laid before her.

To show the complete freedom from all court formality which her Majesty has been enabled to establish in her Highland home, various little incidents which are almost daily occurring might be mentioned. One morning, about seven o'clock, a lady, plainly dressed, left the castle, who, though observed by the Highland guard on duty, was allowed to pass unnoticed, until after she had proceeded a considerable distance, when some one having discovered that it was the Queen, a party of the Highlanders immediately turned out as a royal body guard. Her Majesty, however, signified her wish to dispense with their services, and they all returned to their stations. The Queen in the meanwhile moved onward through the castle grounds alone, until she reached the ledge, the temporary residence of Lord and Lady Glenlyon, where, upon calling, with the intention, as was understood, of making some arrangements as to a preconcerted excursion to the Falls of Bruar, she was informed that his lordship had not yet arrived. The surprise of the domestic who was to be intimated as having called on his lordship. On her return, her Majesty having taken a different route, and finding herself bewildered by the various roads which intersect the grounds in every direction, applied to some reapers whom she met, to direct her to the castle by the nearest way. They, not being aware to whom they spoke, immediately did so, by directing her Majesty across one of the parks, and over a paling which lay before her; and which she at once passed, and reached the castle, a good deal amused, no doubt, with her morning's excursion.

On another occasion, the Queen and Lady Glenlyon having extended their walk a considerable distance up Glen Tilt, entered one of the gamekeeper's cottages, where they found no person except the gamekeeper's wife, he being himself on the hill with the Prince. They entered into conversation with the woman, and were soon furnished with a full account of all her little family arrangements, and also presented with a draught of goat's milk. On their leaving, she expressed her regret in a very homely way, that she did not happen to have any better fare to offer the ladies. It was only in the evening, on her husband's return, that she discovered who had been her guests in the morning.

One evening last week, two of the officers of the Athol Guard—the Hon. Mr. Drummond and the Master of Strathallen, had the honour of taking part in a game of whist with the Queen—an amusement that is generally introduced after the party have retired to the drawing room. The Master of Strathallen wears the sword which his great grandfather wielded at the Battle of Culloden, where he fell, and her Majesty, on learning the circumstance, made various inquiries relating to the history of the weapon, and the use made of it by his brave ancestor. After answering her Majesty's inquiries, young Strathallen is said to have added, with much gallantry, that he was ready to defend her Majesty, to the last drop of his blood, with the same good sword which had formerly been drawn against her royal ancestors.

BLAIR ATHOL, Sunday.

Early yesterday afternoon her Majesty left the castle, taking Lady Canning with her in the carriage. The Prince accompanied her Majesty, and the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Glenlyon, Lord Charles Wellesley, and Mr. Anson, followed on horseback. The royal party proceeded up the Glen towards the Forest-ledge, at which point it was expected the deer would be seen. Her Majesty's pony and guide had been sent on before, and when the party arrived at a place called Lachlann, about two miles on this side of the Forest-ledge, the Queen mounted her pony, and proceeded, attended by the guide, up the side of a high hill called Cairn Chalmers (or the Hill of Hawks), from an elevated point of which her Majesty could command a view of the deer, and of every sport that might be had. The Prince went on for the purpose of deer-stalking, but there was no sport, and after her Majesty had enjoyed her mountain ride nearly two hours, during the latter portion of which it was extremely cold, she returned to her carriage, and the party returned home, reaching the Castle about seven o'clock. They lunched at the Forest-ledge. These rambles up the hills seem to be the favourite amusement of the Queen. Had her Majesty been born and bred a mountaineer, she could not enter on them with more spirit. Wrapped in her plain shepherd's plaid, and equipped like a Highland guide wife, on her mountain pony, she leaves all state and following behind her, to breathe the pure air of the hills, and view from a 'vantage ground' the splendid prospects which spread themselves on every side. Nor is it at all holiday work to ascend these hills. On some there are winding pathways, but the Queen generally takes the more direct, and therefore the more difficult, road, and makes a way for herself, usually the more liked for being the shortest, notwithstanding that it often requires good horsemanship to keep the saddle at all. Some of the hill sides are nearly precipitous, but a sure-footed pony, a cautious guide, and a fearless rider, overcome all difficulties. Her Majesty seems resolved to "rough it" when she goes on these rambles, adopting, without show or affectation, the manners of the country. The exploits and proceedings of royal personages seldom escape magnifying in the telling, but it is no flattery to say that there are very few of the ladies of the country around who would undertake, or could go through, what are the daily recreations of the Queen here.

The Earl of Aberdeen, who takes many solitary walks in the neighbourhood, was yesterday for some time on the Hill of Talloch, at the back of the village. The Hon. Captain James Drummond, brother of Lord Glenlyon, Sir Philip Durham, and other persons of rank, have lately arrived at Blair Athol.

BLAIR ATHOL, Monday.

Her Majesty was afoot at an early hour this morning, walking in the grounds. The Princess Royal has also taken her usual ride on her Highland pony. The appearance of the parish-church yesterday differed widely from that of last Sunday. The congregation then consisted of the resident parishioners alone, and many of them were deterred from going to the kirk by the inclemency of the weather. Yesterday, however, all parts of the country, within a circuit of forty miles, sent their levies of holiday folk. At an early hour in the morning vehicles of every description, in as great a variety as are to be seen at the Cock at Sutton on a Derby day, rattled into the quiet village of Blair Athol, and groups of humble pedestrians made their way at once to the church, which was literally in a state of siege at ten o'clock in the morning. The service does not commence until twelve o'clock, but when the doors were thrown open at eleven, every pew in the church was indiscriminately invaded; and Lord Glenlyon's tenantry, the quiet country villagers, who had an undoubted priority of right to accommodation, were elbowed aside, and were pushed from their stools which they had occupied from childhood, by the substantial burghers from the towns in the neighbourhood.

As twelve o'clock approached, the congregation waxed impatient, but before Divine service commenced, her Majesty, with her accustomed punctuality, had already arrived at the church. Her Majesty came in the low close carriage, which was drawn by a pair of horses, and preceded by a single outrider; Lord Glenlyon's phaeton followed. As her Majesty entered the church the curiosity of the congregation overcame their discretion; the majority of them forthwith rose and stared at the Queen and the Prince with unseemly pertinacity, notwithstanding the hushing murmurs of the gentry of the neighbourhood. Her Majesty came into the royal pew leaning on the arm of Prince Albert. Lady Canning, Lady Glenlyon, Lady Caroline Cocks, and Lord Glenlyon, sat in his Highland dress, occupied the front seats of the pew. In the back seats were Lord Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, Lord Charles Wellesley, Sir Edward Bouverie, and Sir James Clark. Her Majesty wore a black silk dress, with a shepherd's plaid thrown over her shoulders, and a white crape bonnet. A guard of honour of the Athol Highlanders, but without arms, received her Majesty, and were stationed on the high road to the church.

After the usual service, according to the Presbyterian form of worship, Dr. Macleod preached an excellent sermon from the eighth to the fourteenth verses of the second chapter of Titus. The concluding prayer was delivered with an earnestness which came home to the business and bosom of every member of the congregation, and a distinctly audible "amen" was heard from every corner of the church when the clergyman prayed with heartfelt fervour that her Majesty Queen Victoria might long wear her crown, and that she might yet see many happy days, and that at the last, when she left her earthly throne, she might ascend a throne of imperishable glory.

The service concluded, as before, with a benediction, after which her Majesty, with Prince Albert, the noble host and hostess, and the members of the suite, returned to their seats in the same order as they arrived.

The Prince has again left the castle this morning for the deer-stalking in Glen Tilt; and, as the wind is favourable, it is expected that his Royal Highness will enjoy some excellent sport. Her Majesty will not leave Scotland, in all probability, before Tuesday next, the 1st of October, as her Majesty will thus be enabled to reach Windsor before the arrival of Louis Philippe on the 6th instant. The royal route towards the sea is not yet definitely settled, but the good people of Perth are anxious that her Majesty should embark on the Tay from their fair city. Lord A. Fitzclarence has pronounced it to be utterly impracticable for the royal yacht to get over the shallows in the river, but there are smaller steamers, drawing less water, in the royal squadron, and her Majesty could avail herself of one of these vessels to embark at Perth, and view the beautiful scenery on the banks of the Tay, as far as Dundee, where the royal yacht is lying in readiness to receive the royal travellers.

There will be a grand golf match on the North Inch at Perth, on Wednesday next, at which the Duke of Cambridge will be present, as his Royal Highness will arrive on that day at Broom Palace, on a visit to Lord Mansfield. Her Majesty and the Prince will drive to Dunkeld before their departure, to view Lord Glenlyon's beautiful grounds in that part of the county.

BLAIR ATHOL, Tuesday.

The life of secluded retirement which her Majesty has led since her arrival at Blair Athol has not been disturbed by any incident worthy of recording. The morning walk or ride in the grounds of the castle with Prince Albert and the Princess Royal, the afternoon drive or scramble up the hill-side on ponies, the dinner party, the being roused by the shrill pibroch on the following morning, and so on from day to day, jours perdus—to-day the same as yesterday, and yesterday the same as the day before. Were it not for the anxiety which naturally pervades all classes of her Majesty's subjects to hear of the welfare of their sovereign, and the interest excited by her Majesty's present mode of life, there is so little variety in this tranquil routine, that the daily movements of the Royal party are scarcely of sufficient importance to be chronicled.

The present propitious weather enables her Majesty and the Prince to pass a great part of the day in the open air, and were it not for the mellow autumnal

Paris, 23rd September.

As the winter approaches, the CORSEGES of DRESSES become high, and are either in the riding-habit style, or that of the closed pelisse.

PELLISSES and PRONGES made of taffeta have the corsages very long; they are generally busked, and open, although not laced, the space is, however, filled with a chemisette, buttoned on the shoulder. Poul-de-soie is the favourite material for morning pelisses; ribbons and passementerie (silk gimp trimming) are the indispensable ornaments.

EVENING DRESSES are composed of tulle, muslin, crape, or barège, either embroidered, or ornamented with ribbons, flowers, lace, or passementerie.

The employment of narrow velvet ribbon, for the ornament of DRESSES, Cloaks, Caps, &c., has become quite the fashion.

It is expected that CLOAKS will not be worn in the winter either so long or so full as they were last year.

HATS composed of velvet or satin placed on tight, also CAPOTES composed of ribbons, have the brims no larger than they have been of late, but they are more spread out, to allow of an increased quantity of ribbons or tulle to be placed inside.

CAVES generally have the lace in front placed on flat, and are frequently trimmed with narrow velvet.

Striped silks will be much worn this season.

LITERATURE.

HIGH LIFE IN NEW YORK. By JONATHAN SLICK, Esq. 2 vols. How.

Such of our readers as recollect the rare humour of "Sam Slick, of Slickville," will expect high gratification from this pair of towns, by "Jonathan Slick, Esq., of Weathersfield, Connecticut." It is true that families are chequered in brains as in bulk; but the present is an exception to the rule; for Sam and Jonathan are very brothers in grotesque humour; so that the most ardent admirers of one will be equally amused with the other, whilst both alike sustain the national reputation for hyperbole and broad grin.

Jonathan's volumes contain some two-and-thirty letters describing what he terms "high life" in the Transatlantic Metropolis. This phrase may mislead an English reader, for Jonathan's adventures lie in the New York counting-rooms, city residences, newspaper-offices, and political meetings, ball-rooms, and theatres; interspersed with sundry gaieties and flirtations with Miss Miles and a milliner girl, vivacious cousins, &c. Our first extract describes, with unmistakable drollery,

A FAMILY DINNER.

Two great doors slid into the partition, and there was another room just as much like the one we was in, as two peas in a pod. A table was set in the middle of the room, all covered with blue China dishes, and first-rate glass tumblers, and a silver thing to set the pepper-box in—you haint no idee how stish it was. But as true as you live, there stood that eternal nigger, close by the table, as large as life. I didn't know what to make on it, but sez I to myself, "If cousin John's got to be an abolitionist, and expects me to eat with a nigger, he'll find himself mistaken, I'll be darned to damnation if he don't!" But I needn't get so waddy; the critter didn't offer to set down, he only stood there to git anything that we want.

"Hoyon take verminally, Mr. Slick?" says Miss Beebe, biting off her words as if she was afraid they'd burn her. With that she took the liver off one of the dishes, and began to ladle out some soup with a great silver dipper, as bright as a new fifty-cent piece.

"No, thank you," says I, "but I'll take some of that as soup instead, if you've no objection."

The critter was just beginning to pucker up her mouth again, as if she'd found out something to pike fun at, but cousin John looked at her so eternal cross that she was obliged to choke in. I a-pose cousin John see that I felt dreadful uneasy, so he went, kind a cooing.

"She mean verminally soap, cousin Slick. Let her help you to some, I'm a-sartin so'll like it."

"Well," says I, "I don't care if I do." So I took up a queer looking spoon that lay by my plate, and tried to eat, but all I could do, the soup would keep a running through the spoon into the dish again. I tried and tried to git one good mouthful, but I didn't just as well have attempted to dip up the Connecticut river in a sieve, and the most I could git was two or three sprangles of little white things that I stored up from the bottom of the plate, that didn't taste bad, but, to save my life, I couldn't make out what they were made of. Arter I was a fishing and diving over so long, a trying to git one good spoonful, so that I could tell what it was, I looked up, and there was the nigger showing his teeth, and rolling about his eyes, like a black cat in the dark. It made me waddy, for I surmized that he was a-fairing to see me a working as to git a mouthful of something to eat. I couldn't hold in my heart, so I hurried up and flung down the spoon upon the floor, as splittin' as could be, and sez I to the nigger, sez I,

"What do you stand a grinning at there, woolly head? Go and fetch a spoon that haint got no slits in it; I'd as lief eat with a rake as that anything."

"Ha, ha, ha!" larled out the eternal black vagrant, "I thought you would not make the fork hold."

With that Miss Beebe giggled right out, and cousin John looked as if he would a burst to keep from larling too.

"Step your nose, sir," says he to the nigger; "pick up the fork, and give Mr. Slick a spoon."

I began to feel awful streaked, I can tell you; but I set down again, and took up the real spoon, which lay on a kind of towel folded up by my plate, and I began to eat, without saying a word, though I'd a-gin a silver dollar if they would a let me git up and licked the nigger.

Wal, arter I'd got a good mouthful of the soup, I couldn't make out what it was made of, for I couldn't remember of ever seeing the name Miss Beebe called it by, in the dictionary. "Maybe it's Latin," says I to myself, and then I tried to think over what it could mean, and if nobody had told me what the definition was in the Latin school which you sent me to down in Weathersfield. Verminally! Verminally! I kept a running through my head at the time. I knew what sooty meant well enough, and then it popped into my head, all at once, that certain comes from the Latin vermin, which means worms.

Warm soup! my gracious, the very idee of it made me feel awful bad at the stomach! But I might have known it by the looks, and I should if I'd ever heard of such a thing, for the little slim critters swimming round in the liquor, looked as much like angle-worms biled down white as could be. Arter I found out what it was made of, I rather guess they didn't catch me eating any more of their verminally soup; so I pushed it away half across the table, and wiped my mouth partly considerably with my pocket handkercher. The nigger took the whole of it away, and I declare I was glad enough to get rid of it.

"What on arth have they put this towed here for?" says I to myself; and then I stole a sly look over to cousin John, to see if he'd git one, or if they only gave towels to company. Cousin John had one just like mine, but he'd spread it out on his lap, so I just took up mine and kivered over my cashmere with it in.

Considering there was no oysters on the table, I made out a pretty fair dinner. I was beginning to think about moving when the nigger brought a lot of blue glass bowls about half full of water, and set one down by each of us. What they could be for I haint the least notion, but I kept a bright look out to see what cousin John did, and when I saw him dip his fingers into his bowl and wipe 'em on a sort of red towel which the nigger brought along with the bowls, I just went over the manoeuvre as natural as life.

Wal, while we were talking about the banks, and old times, and Weathersfield folks dying off so, that out of a nigger cleared the table right off as slick as a whistle, and arter I hardly knew what the fellow was up to, he come along and set down a set of decanters, and two color bottles with the necks all kivered over with sheet lead, and then he brought two baskets made out of silver, one on 'em was filled chock full of oranges, and tother was heaped up with great purple grapes; I declare it e'enmost made my mouth water to see the great bunches a hanging over the edge of the basket. I'd just put a whooper of a bunch on a little China plate which the feller set for me, and was considering whether it would be better to cut the grapes in to with the cunning little silver knife which was put by the plate, when, all at once, pop! went something, e'enmost as loud as a pistol, close by me. I jumped up about the quickest, I can tell you; but it was only the nigger a opening one of the cider bottles; he poured out some for me in a great long glass with a spindly neck, and I drink it all at a couple of swallows, without stopping to breathe. By jingo! but it was capital cider; arter I'd drunk one glass I began to feel as spry as a cricket.

"Here, knowtall," sez I, "give us another; these glasses are awful small; now, I like to drink cider out of a flat mug."

"Take care," says cousin Beebe, "I'm afeard you'll find the cider, as you call it, rather apt to get into your head."

"Not a bit of it," sez I, "I can stand a quart any day. Here, cousin Mary, take another glass, you haint forgot old times have you? though I a-pose they don't have apples and quillings here in York, do they?"

I don't remember what she said, but I know this, my eyes began to grow all-fired bright, and arter I got up to go home, that cider must have put more than twenty baskets of grapes on the table, and the oranges seemed to grow bigger and bigger every minute, and I know there was more than three times as many glasses and decanters on the table as there was at first. I rather think it was partly high tea time when I got up to go back to the sleep again. I insisted on giving cousin Mary a buss afore I went; and I won't beartin, but I kinder seem to remember shaking hands with the nigger, cotsums him! just afore I went down the steps.

Then, we have a true scene from "the land of liberty."

A POLITICAL MEETING, AND ITS DISASTERS.

A few nights ago, I thought I'd try one of them political meetings the Editors wanted me to attend and see how they carried on there. So Captain Doolittle and I went to one of the great halls hired for caucus, and crowded in by degrees, for the hall building was jammed full of human live stock long afore we got there. Arter a good deal of scuffling, we got up by one of the windows where we could see pretty much all that was going on. I never in all my born days saw such a lot of horned cattle together. Some on 'em was bareheaded, and a good many had more than a ear and a pair of trousers among four or five on 'em. One feller close by me had the rim of his hat slipped off till it hung down on his shoulders; the top was store in, and he had a black eye, besides another that wouldn't see straight. "Look where," sez he to me, "why don't you shout when we do?" "Because I aint a mind to," sez I, "how are you going to help yourself?" Just then a little pussy lawyer cum a crowding through the gate, and at the sight of him they all set up a noise that made my hair stand on end. I never heard anything like it, they yelled and hollered enough to split the ruff of the house. The clunked feller, with his hat knocked into the middle of next work, poked about with his heels till he got room to draw his fiddle bow across a stickery fiddle, that had two of the strings broke off and was cracked from end to end. Squak, squak, went the fiddle close to my ear, like a pig when he's being yoked. With that, a lot of fellows, some with their coat tails one off, and some with their trousers held up with a piece of lint instead of gaiters, and every one of 'em as ragged as year old collie, began to caw up and down the room, but such a double shuffle and pigeon wing, was enough to make a feller die a laffin. Our old white cow used to dance twice as well when she got into one of her tantrums. "Burr for your side! hurra! hurra!" yelled out a tall feller close by the fiddler, with a mouth that twisted one way and his nose running off on tother side, as if they had each other like cats and dogs; and with that he took off his old straw hat and shed it off into the middle of the dancers. It lodged on the top of a feller's head that was just then trying to cut a pigeon wing over one of the benches. "Hello, you feller you just took back that hat, will you?" sung out the tall feller, a pithing far and head over heels arter his hat. "No I won't, I'll be re-nubigated if I do," sez the feller cawing, a pushing toward the door, holding the hat down with both hands, as if he wasn't used to them kind o' things; "all fair in 'lection time. Hurra for equal rights!"

Just then there came in a gist of fellows a yelling and a kicking up their heels like all possessed. They'd brought in some more 'lection news. "Who on arth can these critters be?" sez I to Captain Doolittle. "O, that's a squad of Irishmen; don't you see how the hair's all worn off their heads a carrying brick bats on 'em," sez the Captain. "You don't say so! now by gracious how they do blather out their words, don't they?" sez I, but I might as well a been talking to a sine fence, for just that minute the hull on 'em set up a noise that was enough to make a feller's eye teeth jump out of his head. Did you ever hear four hundred thousand wild cats, and bears, and wolves, and screech owls, a scawling, and a howling, and a squeaking together? If you haint, there's no use trying to make you have the least idee how that eternal crowd of critters did hoot and yell. There they were a screaming, and a stamping, and a dancing, and a fiddling, all in a heap, till a feller could n't hear him self think, and wouldn't a known what he was thinking about if he did n't. "Now," says a little man by the window, "clear your pipes, feller critters; let's give 'em a song. I've got one printed off here so that you can all jive in. Them that can't read, or don't know the tune, can sing Yankee Doodle or Hal Columbia." With that he flung a hull gist of papers among the crowd and begun to raise his chequer rather strong afore the rest set in. By-um-by they all got a going and the way they roared out the song was awful, I can tell you. Some of 'em sung in one tune and some in another—every man went on his own hook.

Next is a whole-length portrait of

COUSIN MARY.

I declare I never did see anybody dressed out as cousin Mary was. She had on a frock of shining satin, with handsome pink splices all over it, and there was a great white ruffle round the bottom, made out of something that looked as white and thin as a gill's web the dayster she's married; and that was hitched up on one side half way to her waist, with a pink rose, made out of ribbon with long ends, that fell down e'enmost to the floor. A heap of some kind of shiny thin stuff was ruffled round her bosom, and hung down round her arms, for her neck sleeves were set, and made like a little gill's; and she had on a pair of white gloves, with tips to 'em, that came e'enmost to her elbows. One on 'em was fastened round her wrist with a wide piece of gold, and tother she let slip down so as to show her arm, which was plainer white, or else I suppose she would not have let folks see it. Mary allers had a tawny purty little foot, but I never see it look so small as it did in that glistering white shoe of hers; and, to own the downright truth, she didn't seem to be much ashamed to show it, but kept it stuck out from under her ruffler, as independent as could be, as if she'd made up her mind to be ready to make a curtsy any minute. There was one thing that kinder puzzled me a good deal; Mary's skin never was over white, but somehow it looked like wax-work, that night, and you never see a mirror-pink look brighter than her cheeks did; but instead of coming into her face and going away again, as every man loves to see the color in a gal's face when she's a talking, and knows that he's a looking at her, Mary's always kept just so; it didn't seem as if an arthquake would make her turn pale. The hair hung in long curls down her cheeks and on her shoulders, just as it did the other day, and she had a great white rose stuck in among the curls, on one side of her head, that looked as if it hadn't but just been picked off the bushes.

I looked at her pretty carefully, I can tell you, and I do think she would have been a critter that John might be proud of, if it wasn't for that stuck up way which she's got since she cum down here to York. She don't do nothing on arth natural, and as she did when she was a gal in Connecticut. Instead of standing up straight, and speaking to her company as if she was glad to see them, she stood with one foot stuck out and her hands just crossed afore her, and kinder stooping for'ard, as if she couldn't but just stand alone; I never see a critter's back stuck up as her's was, I a-ly thought she was a getting the rickets, and I felt as anxious about it that I turned to cousin Beebe, afore I went up to speak to her, and sez I, as of old time—"Cousin John, how did your wife last her back so? I'd a-pose it makes me feel uneasy to see what a great hump she's got a growing since she cum away from Connecticut?" With that cousin John looked at her, and I larled a little, but I could see he didn't feel just right.

A CARD AND SUPPER PARTY.

I felt kinder bad at the idee of touching cards, arter a cousin you not to, for, when you letten me at it and get me that all-fired lickin in the barn—but Miss Beebe stood right afore me, shuffling a brand new pack o' cards in them little white hands, and a lookin at me as certain that I couldn't stan' it—yet I felt sort o' loth and held back. "I'm afeard I've e'enmost forgot how," sez I a lumpin back. "Oh, never mind," sez one of the chaps in a red and green vest, and with checked trousers on, "Miss Beebe, will she show you how?" "Certainly," says the handsome critter—a smilin right in my face again; "shall I be your teacher, Mr. Slick?" "Just so," sez I—"I'd jump down my own throat, if you only told me so." With that I set down by the table—crossed one leg a-top of tother and wiped my nose. Miss Beebe, she leaned her arm on my chair, and the rest set down. "Wal, what shall we play?" sez the chap in checked trousers. "Oh, high, low, jack, and the game—Mr. Slick understands that," sez the rest, and a larf. I began to rile a trifle—"I guess, Mr. Slick, he knows a thing or two better than that," sez I; "he wasn't born in the woods to be scared at cards," sez I. They all choked in at that—one feller whiffled the cards, I cut, and the checked trousers took the deal. I got an all-fired good hand the first draw—ace, jack, and the two spot of trumps, besides a ten. Miss Beebe, she bent over till I could feel her breath agin my cheek, as warm and sweet as the steam from an apple-sauce cag when the sauce is set off to cool. I swear, it made me feel so kinder unsettled, that the cards danced afore my eyes, like pictures run crazy. We began to play. Miss Beebe kept a pokin that pesky little finger of hers among my cards every minute, puttin out then that I ought to play, one by one—and, afore I knew it myself, I'd beat the hull bring on em—three games without stopping. Miss Beebe she seemed to be e'enmost tickled to death to think I'd done em up so slick, and the men they looked streaked enough, I tell you—that one in the checked trousers above all. Just as we was cuttin in for a new deal, the doors right afore me slid back arter the wall, and there was another room spread out afore us like a picture. It was as light as day from one end of the room to tother—and it was enough to dazzle one's eyes to see the shiny silk tumbin down from the golden poles over the windows—the great whoopin lookin places a blazin all over that end of the room—the carpet kivered over and trod down with points—the pisters agin the walls and beile marble balcons a standing round, with the candle light a pourin down over em. Oh, gosh! it was enough to make a feller loose his breath, and never ketch it agin. There right in the middle of the room, was a table a-shinin and a glisterin like a heap of ice-chunks and new half dollars piled up together in the hot sun. The plates and the knives and forks, spoons and all, was solid silver—every thing else was silver but the glasses, and they were all pitted and pattered off, and cut down in time, till there was nothing but flash, flash, flash! wherever the light fell, and that was strong enough; for right overhead was another of them great gold sprangles branching out every which way, and rustlin over with fire. Miss Beebe she put her hand on my arm, just so as to let the tip end of her little finger lie agin my wrist. I swear! I made the blood tingle up my arm. We went into the room with the rest a-follerin arter, Indian style. A great strappin nigger stood at each side of the door-plate, when we went, with white gloves on, and towels in their hands—they bowed a'most to the carpet as we went by, and when we set down, then they stood right up on end behind our chairs, like india trainers get tryin to drill. They lifted up the kivers from a lot of dishes, and up ris the steam among the glasses and silver, till it seemed as if they hung in a cloud. O gracious, I can't begin to tell you all that them dishes had in 'em. There was little teiny teiny birds cooked hull, claws and all—partridges with their stomachs stuffed till they looked as puffy as cousin Jacob's squirrels a lyn there, like human babies, just baked over a trifle, and all sorts of wild varients that a feller e'en thought of killin. The niggers they dodged about, kinn places and a handin em round light lightin. They gin Miss Beebe and I each on a little bird—darn me if I know what it was, without it was a woodpecker steered hull. It a-ly seemed to be a shame to stick a fork into the teiny varmint. I kinder doffed my knife and fork about, till Miss Beebe got puffy intimate with her bird, for I wanted to see if it was the fashion to swallow em down, inside and all. She'd used her little chop party well up, when I sot my jaws a workin in earnest. The bird went down my throat about the quickest. It was awful sweet taste; and the leg bones scratched a trifle as they went down, but nosh to speak on. Wal, we had arter the squirrels and other wild critters rather hard, till I began to feel a dry.

Jonathan, on his arrival at New York from the Onion Beds at Weathersfield, puts up at "that great heap of stones,"

ASTOR HOUSE.

Look a here, did I ever tell you what a looking place that Astor House is? If I didn't, just you suppose that all the stem walls in old Connecticut had been biled down as smooth as glass, and heaped together, one a-top of tother, over two acres of clearing, up, and up, half way to the sky, and a little over; suppose then the hull eternal great heap cut up into winders and doors, with slantin' great slabs of stone piled up for steps, and pillars standing on end, on the top, to hold them down—higge, then the highest oak tree ever sot eyes on, and then you have some idee what a whooping concern that Astor House is.

We need not add that Jonathan's letters are brimful of drollery and palpable hits at some of the absurdities of "High Life in New York."

THE REFLEXIONS ON ETERNITY OF JEREMIAH DREXELIUS.

BURDS.

This is a reprint of Dr. Dunster's translation from the celebrated Latin work of the pious and learned Jeremiah Drexelius, whose writings are, at the present time, rather scarce, and little known in this country. He was born at Ansburg, in Germany, in 1581; he early applied himself to the study of divinity, and became so distinguished for his talents as a preacher, that he was appointed chaplain in ordinary by the Elector of Bavaria, which office he held for 23 years. He died at Munich in 1638. His works, which are very considerable, were first collected in two volumes folio, and published at Antwerp, 1643. Among them are to be found many meditations and devotional treatises of singular merit: one of these is the "Reflexions on Eternity," to which there are two companion works, "On Death," and "The Eternal Torment of Hell." Many of our best writers have borrowed freely from "The Reflexions on Death," particularly, says an old translator somewhat quaintly, "the learned Bishop of Down and Connor, in his excellent treatises of holy living and dying, and in most of his works, hath ingeniously preferred these thoughts of Drexelius to his own, by placing them in their stead."

It is impossible to glance at the present work upon Eternity, without being struck with the wisdom, tempered zeal, and fervour with which the learned divine seeks to impress upon the reader his duty in respect of the great truth under consideration. We agree with the translator, that the practical observations with which the work abounds are admirable, as well for the knowledge displayed in them of the nature of the human heart, as for the rich variety of the illustrations by which they are enforced. Hence, these "Reflexions" are neither dry nor uninteresting, but interesting and attractive, without trenching upon the solemnity of the great subject. The work was first translated in 1710, by Dr. Dunster, Prebendary of Sarum, and chaplain to Lord Maynard, at Sherr Hall, Walthamstow, Essex. The reprint before us has been revised and edited by a descendant of the Doctor, the Rev. H. B. Dunster, curate of Tottenham, who has published the work in the hope that the sale of it may possibly benefit the funds for a new church now building at Wood Green, in the above parish. We trust this hope may be fully realised, at the same time that the republication must benefit the present age. By the way, Dr. Dunster was disinherited by his Puritan family, because of his attachment to the church; they lived at Leyton, not far distant from the parish wherein it is now sought to aid the great cause—the building of the church at Wood Green—by means of the Rev. Doctor's erudition and piety.

We ought not to conclude without commendation of the beautiful emblematic illustration, and typographical neatness of this treasured volume.

THE MOTHER'S PRIMER. By MRS. FELIX SUMMERLY. Longman and Co.

This little book, quaintly termed in the title page "A Child's First Steps in many Ways," presents a few new points which are worthy of notice: Mrs. Summerly's views assimilating with the reforming notions of friend Felix. The "Primer" is chiefly recommended by some very sensible Rules for the Teachers of Children; but, first, the purpose of the book is stated to be "to give the first steps as well in reading as in some of those many things which should, at least, be taught while the child is learning to read." The following is a specimen of the "Hints to Teachers":

Long before a child begins reading, his mind may be kept in healthful employment in various pleasant ways: he may amuse himself with putting bricks together, drawing lines, and even large printing letters on a black board or slate; stringing shells into little parcels, &c. a learning the names of objects, their uses; stringing buttons or flowers; learning to distinguish and name the commonest colours. He may be taught to repeat any Nursery Songs and poetry, and to count with objects. He should be especially encouraged to ask questions, and have them reverently and intelligibly answered. I must beg leave to lay some stress upon this last observation, for it is unfortunately too much the practice to put off little children either with wrong or evasive answers. A child is soon discouraged from inquiry with such replies as, "Don't tease so;" "Little children should not ask questions;" "I cannot tell you now."

Some of the lessons are far beyond a Primer: such as those on the "First Elements of Form"—all which to very young children must be like telling the clock by almanac. The "Exercises on Colour and on the Calendar" are in better keeping with the range of the work. By the way, this Primer has an illuminated cover, and is printed with antiquated type in blue, red, and yellow; it has an artistic frontispiece, we think, by Mulready. One of the least intelligible signs of the day is the rage for revival: possibly, this may be the Primer of "Young England."

CURRIES; THEIR PROPERTIES, &c. By CAPTAIN W. WHITE. Some years since, a retired merchant, who had just returned from Calcutta, a very rich in wealth, printed a small pamphlet of Directions for making Curries, which he distributed gratuitously in every direction. We were, at the time, struck with the extended philanthropy, the enlarged benevolence, of the noble act; agreeing, as we do, with Captain White, that "few subjects are more interesting and important to Man than that of his diet; or is there any other which more generally affects the comfort and welfare of all classes of the community."

The pamphlet we are now called upon to notice is a more extensive affair than the Calcutta merchant's brochure. It sets out with asserting that "the highly nutritive grain of Rice, invaluable for its extraordinary twofold properties of vegetable and bread, is useless to us as a substantial food for man, from the want of cultivating a proper acquaintance with its natural concomitant—Curry." Captain White then enlarges upon the qualities and flavours of the True Indian Curry, and its excellence, more especially for persons just returned from India, who suffer much from change of diet. Curries are then considered "in a domestic point of view," particularly Fish Curries, which are unequalled: "some of the fish of this country, for instance, the salmon and the lobster, make the finest in the world. Eels, oysters, soles, mackerel, &c., make beautiful dishes; and the little sprat affords a most delicious one." The gastronomic Captain then shows how a dinner of carried cod-fish for four persons will cost but 9d. It appears, however, that "Selim's Curry Powder or Paste" must be used to insure the full benefits of the condiment, and there are added testimonials of its approval at the Lord Mayor's table, in the last Mayoralty, when the Mansion-house fare was anything but "Dining with Duke Humphrey."

INSANITY.—The extraordinary work of the celebrated Find on mental disease, is about to be translated in the Medical Times, with illustrative notes.

THOU ART THERE!

TRIBUTE TO THE UNQUIET AND VARIETY OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
(From a Correspondent.)

Art-wonder! Press-marvell!
Thy far fame is hurled
Over land, over water,
O'er ocean and world.
Where the cold North looks down
From his mountainous crest,
In the lap of the sweet South,
The glow of the West,
Where East breatheth palace
Up to the sun,
And his rivers of glory
Roll gold as they run—
Thou art there!

They gave thee, in Britain,
A land for thy birth,
The fairest, the boldest,
The bravest of earth!
But thy bright island prison
Can never detain
The wings that have borne thee
O'er mountains and moor,
The broad rainbow stretcheth not Over thy span;
Where'er the world's regions
Have dwelling for man—
Thou art there!

Doth sun light the valley,
Doth storm rend the plain,
Is there in the wild earth,
Or wreck on the main?
Where games and their treasures
From bosoms of oak,
In the home of the eagle,
The bed of the shark;
Where the fair steeds of Commerce
Run beautiful race,
And the steam-wings of Science
Annihilate space—
Thou art there!

When dawn-moon is dawning,
When day-dreams are bright,
When Eve gives her warning
For night's drowsy rest;
When the broad light of heaven
Plays full from the tower,
Or the gloom eclipse cometh
To cloud her too soon!
When the hurricane roareth
Its passion of dread,
And the Earth groans and shivers,
And thunders up its dead—
Thou art there!

At home, in old England,
Where man as you will,
Thy soul-drap solitude
Lingers still!
We watch thy fleet speeding
From city to field,
And all thou art heeding,
And all thou dost yield;
And from the fair coast, where
The frost waters foam,
To the land's very centre,
The heart of the home—
Thou art there!

Where the palace of Majesty Reared in its pride,
Watch royalty's grandeur,
And loyalty's side;
At the paying of tribute,
The spreading of feast,
At the font—as the altar,
Where Queens bend to priest,
Mid the pleasures, our regal ones
Woo warm sleep,
Or, when fond glory-whippers
Group round the throne—
Thou art there!

In the hall of our nobles,
Prince, prelate, and peer,
Mid cold lowly grandeur,
Mid high days of cheer,
At the hall and the gala,
The seat and the rare,
Where rich pleasure-volatiles
Ride in her char;
On the course, in the yacht,
In the street, at the play,
Where woe's the night out,
Or woe's the day—
Thou art there!

When the noble is gone
To the glowing link-side—
The home of his fathers,
His castle of pride!
When the city is still
On his desolate track,
And the treason on his fostered
Are sighing his back;
When his great name is joyful
Around him, and hark!
When his kind parents welcome him
Back to his park—
Thou art there!

When London is loud with Political strife,
And steamers are stirring
The tumult of life;
In the houses of senate,
The hustings, the poll,
With the rats they entrap, and
The dopes they ensoul;
When the bold mar and bully,
The weak cringe and bow,
In the midst of the national Quarrel at noon—
Thou art there!

Wherever men jostle,
Whichever men rage,
By martway or barrow,
At church or on Change,
Where wealth-seeking merchants
In fever have trade,
Or where becalmed thousands
Kneel down before God—
Mid the hard chase for gold,
Where fire-breath chains are given—
Or at the soul's shrine, where
The race is for heaven—
Thou art there!

The market, the warehouse,
The theatre, the goal—
Where'er the fierce contrasts
Of life may prevail—
In the square that is flowered,
The street that is dark,
Or where equalled wretchedness
Draws its tale;
Now gliding through gardens,
Now trading through mud;
At the morn by the Park,
In the night by the road—
Thou art there!

Where the rich artist painteth—
Where lordly ones rush—
With wealth on his coat,
And gold in his brush!
Where rich author rare
And less erudite throng
For his muse keeps a carriage,
And broods her wing!
Where rich actor dictates,
Mid plaudits of all,
And gathers up roses
When green curtains fall—
Thou art there!

In the field—in the fleet—
By the loom—by the plough—
In the ham and the huck—
All where guest thou;
Far landscape thou gatherest
Up from the land,
And city magnificence,
And all that grand;
By silver-spread river,
By silver-spread river,
By silver-spread river,
By silver-spread river—
Thou art there!

Where the world of Columbia
Spreads broad world afar—
In the home of the Sultan,
The land of the Caesars!
Where the pillars of Italy
Rise from the past,
And Rome's ancient splendour
In death seemeth vast;
In the haunts of France,
And the hundreds of Spain;
On the hills of the nation,
The waves of the main—
Thou art there!

Art weaves thy companionship
Land over land;
Science taketh no step without Grasp of thy hand;
Thou hast shed a new light
On a riveted age,
And the treasures of empire
Shine on thy page!
Where learning shiveth,
Where virtue is fair,
Where good men seek knowledge—
Behold! thou art there!
Thou art there!

HUMAN LIFE is a gloomy chamber, in which the image of the other world shone the brighter, the deeper it is darkened.
A GOOD CONSCIENCE is a spring when thou art thirsty—a staff when thou art weary—a screen when the sun burns thee—and a pillow in sickness.

NEW MUSIC.

ALL REMEMBER THEE. The Music by ROBERT GUYLOTT. Turner, Poultry.

This is an answer to Mrs. Norton's "None Remember Thee." The melody is pretty, in the Berlin style, the which to say is a compliment. The harmony, or accompaniment, might have been better.

LOVE ON A BALLAD. The Poem by FRANCES PAGET WATSON, Esq. The Music by ROBERT GUYLOTT. Turner, Poultry. This is a response to the Hon. Mrs. Norton's "Love Not." We hate parodies. The melody is flowing and pretty; but when will another musical Lucian appear, and assert the right of E flat against D sharp?

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Vauxhall Gardens.—On Monday night, this fascinating resort was opened with a series of musical and pantomimic entertainments, which appeared to give satisfaction to a very numerous company. There were the old vocal favorites, with new introductions, in the orchestra, ad fresco: the ballet of the "Vivandière," and comic pantomime in the rotunda, &c.; a brilliant display of fireworks; and "rack punch ad libitum," wherewith to protract the festivities of the night. The gala was the first of a series of six, announced to be the last previous to "the royal property" being razed to the ground, and covered with brick and mortar. The illuminated arcades, the glittering orchestra, and the superb saloons, were nearly as varied as ever; though, perchance, the recollection of "the light of other days," and the painful "farewell" may have dimmed the splendour of the fairy scene. The gala was repeated on Wednesday and Friday; and the reduced price of admission must have afforded thousands an opportunity of witnessing this said-to-be last of the glories of Vauxhall. There are to be three more nights next week, for which attractive entertainments are provided; and as the weather promises to be fine, no doubt the gardens will close with régal.

ANDREWS THEATRE.—Mr. Webster, the new lessee of this favourite house of entertainment, has made some vast improvements in every department of its interior. We cannot do better than borrow a description of them from a graphic contemporary:—"On that part of the premises occupied by the stage, the whole of the walls, which were previously in a very bad state, have been underbuilt throughout with brick and cement. And an excavation has been formed at the back of the stage of such extent as to afford space for additional scenic effects by sinking traps, &c., as well as to contain all the scenery not in actual use. An entirely new stage has been made, the whole of which is so constructed as to rise and fall by machinery, thereby disarding the old and cumbersome system of ropes and pulleys. Extensive property-rooms have been formed beneath and adjoining the stage, as has also a light and spacious green-room at the back. In the dressing-rooms every attention seems to have been paid to the comfort of their future inmates, being well lighted with gas, and having a liberal supply of water laid on. In the front of the house the forms of the public and private boxes are altered, so that they now all radiate from the centre of the proscenium. The pit is extended, and the seats lowered and more equally divided. The slips and gallery have also been altered in a similar manner, and in the saloon a large window has been pierced, so as to afford complete ventilation. The approach to the private boxes, so inconvenient and so much complained of in the old house, is greatly improved, as parties can now reach them by a new staircase, instead of being compelled to cross the stage, as was formerly the case, and the size of the boxes themselves has been much increased. The house is lighted by a central chandelier of glass, containing a number of small jets of gas, which produce a very brilliant effect. The ventilation, formerly so bad, appears to have been particularly attended to, copious supplies of fresh air being encouraged in such situations as will not interfere with the comfort of the audience, whilst the warm respired air will be drawn off upwards through the dome, and be thrown off by a cowl of five feet diameter placed upon the roof. The decorations of the house are of the simplest character, the colours being white and gold, and the boxes being lined with chintz of a handsome pattern, and furnished with crimson velvet cushions and curtains. The effect is remarkably good." The theatre will open this evening with several novelties.

Tagliioni is now at Brussels, where the eminent French actress, Mlle. Rachel, is also residing. The campaign for the season is about to commence, poor Corant Garden lying idle still. The active lessee of Drury Lane has been most industrious. His prospectus for the coming season shows that the entertainments will be limited to opera and ballet, even more strictly than last year. On the list of his operatic company stands the charming vocalist Anna Thillon, who in one opera alone drew crowds to the Princess Theatre for successive weeks. Madame Balfe, Miss Deley (who made a successful debut at this house in 1839), Miss Poole, Mr. Burdini, Mr. Weiss (both from the Princess), and Mr. D. W. King, are new engagements, and the vocalists of last year, Miss Reinforth, Miss Roper, Miss Betts, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Stretton, and Mr. Borroni, are retained. M. Duprez, whose name is announced, will probably not make his appearance till late in the season. Mademoiselle Carlotta Grist is promised, and two very good engagements in the ballet department have been made in the persons of Mademoiselle Adèle de Hamillatre and Mademoiselle Planquet. The first of these appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre at the commencement of 1843, and was universally acknowledged to be a most graceful dancer. Since that period she has advanced in her profession at Paris, and has sustained principal roles at the Académie. The progress which Mademoiselle Planquet made this year at the Opera is well-known to all the Auditors. Miss Clara Webster (a rising dancer), Miss O'Bryan, and Madame Giubaldi, also appear in the ballet list; while the male portion is very strong, including Petipa, Albert, Coralli and Montessu, and our own eccentric George Wieland. The novelties of the season are to be Aubert's "Sérène" (for Thillon), "Anna Bolena" (for Madame Balfe), an opera by Balfe, another by Benedict, who is appointed musical director for the season, and a ballet called "Le Corsaire." Mr. Bunn's prospectus, printed on paper, with a border in imitation of lace, is exceedingly neat and elegant. The theatre (Drury Lane), will open next Monday with the opera of the "Bohemian Girl" and a new ballet.

MRS. ROBERT AND LADY SALE.—These distinguished persons, with their daughter, Mrs. Stuart, and her son, arrived in Liverpool from London by the Mercury steamer, Captain Maclellan, on Wednesday morning, and immediately proceeded to the residence of W. A. Brown, Esq., Everton, where they will remain during their stay. In the course of the day the Mayor and his lady, Mrs. Hand, waited upon Sir Robert and Lady Sale, and accompanied by the remainder of the party, set out on a tour of inspection through the town, calling first at the Town Hall, thence to the Exchange and Underwriter's Rooms, Custom House, Albert Dock, Prince's Dock, St. John's Market, and the principal streets, and other objects worthy of attention. Their reception at each and all of these places was most enthusiastic, and must have been truly gratifying to the feelings of the gallant hero, his lady and family, who appeared to be as much objects of interest as Sir Robert himself, and Lady Sale more so, if possible. The East India Association presented, through their chairman, Charles Turner, Esq., an address of congratulation to Sir Robert Sale, in which they acknowledged deeply and gratefully the services he had rendered his country and the commercial public by achievements in the East. Lady Sale looked well; she wore a black watered silk dress, white satin bonnet, edged with crapes; and in answer to a question as to her health, said she felt quite recovered.

THE FRENCH NAVY.—The Press gives the following as the official state of the French navy:—It consists of 23 ships of the line, 29 frigates, 379 ships of ships of the line on the stocks, and 277 ships of frigates, 43 steam-vessels, representing a force of 2340 horse-power; 14 or 17 of these are ready for sea at the shortest notice; 18 steam-boats in course of construction, 18 trans-Atlantic steam-packets, 24 steam-packets of from 200 to 250 horse-power, employed by the Post-office in carrying mails in the Levant, to Alexandria, Corsica, and England. (These vessels are not calculated to carry heavy guns.) The class of seamen for 1844 amounts to 125,025 men, but of this number only 62,000 may be regarded as able seamen.

THE DISCOVERY OF FIRE.—Fire was entirely unknown to many of the nations of antiquity, and even at the present day it is unknown in some parts of Africa. The inhabitants of the Mission Islands, which were discovered in 1551, had no idea of fire, and expressed the greatest astonishment on first beholding it—believing it to be some living animal which fell from heaven. It is odd enough that a sleep when it should turn into motion, all but its head; for while we walk for a big or shoulder of motion, we never ask for a motion's head. But there is a fruit which changes its name and colour; grapes are so called when fresh, raisins when dried, and plums when on a roasting.

Life is a dream of time, from which death awakes us to the realities of eternity.

MORE INCENDIARISM IN SHEFFIELD.—A fire in the occupation of Mr. St. Clement, of Saxham, Salf. Bk. was first in three places on Saturday night last. This makes the third incendiary fire that has taken place in this parish within the fortnight.

RECAPITULATION OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The King of Prussia has just created a new branch of administration under the title of "Ministry of Finances," the object of which is to pay special attention to such complaints as the citizens may have to make against administrative, administrative, and judicial irregularities. (This seems a very useful sort of institution, but the members of the office are not likely to enjoy a similar one.)

A few days ago, the flax mills of Messrs. Calverton and Co., near Chollet, (France) were burned to the ground, with the exception of a small part of the building. The loss is estimated at 600,000*fr.*, but the proprietors are insured.

Some rather serious disturbances took place at Presburg on the 26th instant, between the inhabitants and some of the persons attached to the service of the Deputies of the Diet. It became necessary to call out an armed force, and before the tumult could be quelled one man was killed, and sixteen were wounded.

We learn from Geneva, that the house of Voltaire, advertised for sale during the last 15 months at 60,000 francs, remains as yet without a purchaser. The bed and furniture of this principal engine of the French revolution are still exhibited to the curiosity of travellers.

The King of Naples, with the view of perpetually preserving the Altesse (pavilion), dismantled from the ruins of Capri, the last of which were known to have been taken in the war, have employed artists of the greatest celebrity to imitate them on the walls of his own palace at Naples.

The Hanoverian Journal of the 18th September brings accounts of a dreadful fire at Genshaft (a town of 10,000 inhabitants) which took place on the night of the 15th of this month. Twelve or thirteen dwelling houses, and as many out-buildings, including many public institutions, were destroyed. Above 2000 persons are without shelter, and the loss of property cannot be less than 250,000 dollars.

Madame Tagliioni is said to have accepted an engagement in the United States for one year; 400,000 being secured to the fair sylphide, with probable contingencies of a much larger sum. With this tour La Sylphide takes leave of the stage, and settles down for life at her villa, on the banks of the Lake of Como.

Mr. Charles Tomkins, an eminent scene-painter of Drury Lane and the Lyceum Theatres, died last week. He had been for several months under restraint in a private asylum. His age was only 44.

Mr. Holman, the blind traveller, who was recently at Venice, is about to proceed by Trieste on an extensive tour. He has visited, amongst other objects of interest, the cathedral of St. Mark, at Venice, examining its various details, and ascertaining by the touch the most minute adornments. Mr. Holman intends to publish the result of his inquiries.

The Brussels Gazette states that on Monday last, a farmer was robbed and murdered on a public road near Malines.

The largest salmon taken in the Highland streams this season weighed 27*lb.* This fine fish was landed by Mr. Ellis, after a hour's play, without any assistance, and with a single gut line, in the waters of Ardsilly, the property of Wm. Grant Macdonald, Esq.

There is to be an exhibition of the products of industry next year at Vienna, but it will be confined to the manufactures of Austria; whereas the Berlin exhibition includes the products of the whole of Germany. The Emperor of Austria intends, it is said, to create a special order of merit for the manufacturers who shall be declared worthy of it, and the possessor of the decoration will be declared a baron; but his nobility is not to be hereditary.

Tesch, who, it will be recollected, attempted to assassinate the King of Prussia, has been tried, and sentenced to be broken on the wheel. Tesch received the notification of his sentence with perfect calmness, declined examining his right of appeal, and has since not only retained an imperturbable indifference, but even assumed a haughty and arrogant demeanor. It is, however, reported that an appeal will be laid before the Royal Court of Berlin.

The Austrian Government have given orders to arrest all persons found jostling in public securities in the streets or elsewhere after the Exchange hours.

The revolutionary Italians who are at Malta, and who have been endeavouring to excite men at Corfu and on the coast of Albania, for a new descent on the Papal States, have entirely failed in their attempts.

A Stockholm journal of the 10th instant says it is generally understood in Sweden that the Emperor of Morocco has abandoned all claim to tribute from Sweden and Denmark.

The project of still further facilitating the intercourse between Europe and India, by means of a railway across the Isthmus of Suez, is resumed, and hopes are still entertained of its being put into a train for an early accomplishment of the important design.

The railroad from Altona to Kiel was opened on the 18th, in honour of the anniversary of the birth of the King of Denmark. Prince Frederick of Holstein accompanied the municipality of Altona in the experimental trip.

A letter from Göttingen of the 11th announces the death, at the age of seventy-nine, of M. Gustave Hugo, a celebrated writer, and one of the Counsellors of Justice of the Hanoverian Government.

The Brussels journals of Saturday state that Mr. Dyce Sombre had arrived in that capital, and that he is on his way to London.

At a meeting of proprietors of East India Company's Stock, held on Wednesday morning, the motion for a grant of an annuity of 20,000*l.* to Sir William Nott, was confirmed without a dissenting voice.

Nearly 40,000 letters were received for delivery at the Brighton Post Office during the week ending Saturday last.

According to a Paris letter, a statue of Colbert is about to be erected at Rouen, his native city.

The German papers announce the accession of Bohemia to the German Customs Union for a period limited to five years, and attach considerable importance to the event, as completing the Zollverein on the East.

The Sixth Scientific Congress of Italy is now going on at Milan, and appears to be a very brilliant one. At the first general meeting of the society at the Palace of Brera, the statue of the celebrated Casati, the father of Milan, was inaugurated. The Viceroy of Italy was present, Count Bressana presided, and M. Pella pronounced the introductory discourse.

The Grand Council of the Valais, in its last sitting, adopted the new constitution by a majority of fifty-three votes; but the first vote is reserved for the declaration of the primary assemblies, which are convened for the 20th of next month.

The French Government is making great improvements in the post-office. Since the first of the present month letters of value or importance can be placed under the more immediate care of the post-office functionaries, with the privilege of paying the postage before hand or not, as may be convenient. The towns on the line of the Rouen and Orleans railway have two, and in some places three deliveries of letters a day.

A letter from Jassy, Sept. 4, says:—"Our country also is about to have a railroad. Prince Nicola, who has invested capital in almost all the great railroads of Germany, intends getting one constructed from Zarn, on the frontier of Austria Galicia, to Galatz, situated at the confluence of the Pruth and the Danube, so as to pass through the whole of Moldavia, and to form the prolongation of that which the States of Galicia are getting executed from Oswieczyn (where one of the branches of the northern line of the Emperor Ferdinand is to end) to the frontier of Moldavia."

The Cologne Gazette states that the grand deputation appointed by the Senate and Burgers of Hamburg to decide on the question of the treaties for the navigation of the Elbe has recommended their ratification.

FOOT-RACING FOR A SILVER CUP.—On Wednesday an interesting foot-race was contested at the Balloon Gardens, Battersea, and from the well-known celebrity of the men who had entered their names, a very large number of spectators were present. The distance contested was six hundred yards, and to keep the hands. The subjoined is a list of the competitors:—John Smith, Mason, Symon, Wilt, and E. Smith, of London; Balcock, of Birmingham; Hopwood, of Nottingham; and Moon, of Norwich. In looking, Balcock was favourite. The men appeared at the starting mark attired in a racing costume, and at the signal they went away at a sharp rate; Smith, Balcock, and Symon taking the lead, the others falling into the rear; Balcock cleared the hurdles in fine style, Smith pursuing him closely, and running hard for the winning goal. Byrom was, when within 200 yards of the last hurdle, thirty yards behind his opponents, when he made a very great exertion, and succeeded in coming up, and a spirited race ensued, which terminated by Smith coming in first, Byrom second, Balcock third. Very large sums of money changed hands; the ground was in excellent condition, and the affair well arranged.

THE PRINTER.—"I pity the printer," said my uncle Toby. "He's a poor creature," rejoined Trim. "How so?" said my uncle. "Because, in the first place," continued the Corporal, looking full upon my uncle, "he must endeavour to please everybody. In the negligence of a moment, perhaps, a small paragraph, pops upon him; he hastily throws it to the compositor; it is inserted; and he is ruined to all ends and purposes." "Too much the case, Trim," said my uncle, with a deep sigh; "too much—the case." "And, please your honour," continued Trim, elevating his voice and striking into an imploring attitude, "this is not the whole." "Go on, Trim," said my uncle, feebly. "The printer, sometimes," pursued the Corporal, "lets upon a piece that pleases him mightily; and he thinks it cannot but go down with his subscribers, but, alas! Sir, who can calculate the human mind?" He jerks it, and it is all over with him. They forgive others, but they cannot forgive a printer. He has a host to gratify, and every one sets up for a critic. The pretty Miss exclaims, 'Why don't he give us more poetry, marriage, and love-melodrama—away with these stilted pieces.' The politician claps his eyes on his nose, and reads it over in search of a violent invective; he finds none, takes his eyes off, folds them, and sticks them in his pocket, declaring the paper good for nothing but to burn. So it goes. Every one thinks it ought to be printed expressly for himself as he is a writer; and yet, after all this complaining, would you believe it, Sir? says the Corporal, clapping his hands together, "would you believe it, Sir, there are some subscribers who do not hesitate to cheat the printer out of his pay? Our army swore terribly in Flanders, but they never did anything so bad as that!" "Nerve!" said my uncle Toby, emphatically.—American paper.

tint on the rich foliage round the castle, it might be supposed that spring was going to return once more before the coming winter. Yesterday the Prince went out grouse shooting on the moors in front of the castle, and her Majesty having expressed a desire to witness the sport, the pony was ordered, and her Majesty set forth to ascend the neighbouring hill, which commands an extensive view of the moors. Her Majesty was accompanied by Lord Glenlyon, who walked by the side of the pony, and the gilly, Sandy Macara, who has had the honour of leading her Majesty's pony during her rambles.

The Prince shot six pair of grouse, which were immediately forwarded to the castle. His Royal Highness had intended to go deer-stalking yesterday in Glen Tilt, but as the wind was unfavourable the projected excursion was deemed impracticable. Lady Glenlyon and Lady Canning drove out in the afternoon to visit Mr. Butler, of Farsala.

Military law is adhered to most rigidly by her Majesty's guard of Athol Highlanders. Lord Glenlyon's brother, the Hon. Captain Murray, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, who has lately arrived here, was refused admittance by the guard, because he was not furnished with the necessary countersign, although he offered to write an order for his own admission. We need scarcely mention that the hon. gentleman has since succeeded in gaining access to his noble brother's domain; but whilst the circumstance has occasioned some amusement, it has also evinced the strictness with which these fine fellows perform their duty.

Orders have been received on board the royal steam-yacht, Victoria and Albert, to have everything ready for her Majesty's embarkation on Monday, the 30th inst., on which day her Majesty has signified her intention of leaving Scotland on her return voyage. The yacht is still lying in the river Tay, off Dundee, and it is understood that her Majesty will embark at the same place where she landed, and that the royal party will leave Blair Athol on Monday morning immediately after breakfast, and arrive in Dundee between three and four o'clock the same afternoon, whence they will proceed at once on board the yacht. By this arrangement her Majesty will arrive at Woolwich near mid-day on Wednesday. The voyage from the river to Dundee occupied upwards of forty-two hours, and, calculating that it will take the same to return, should her Majesty embark at Dundee at four o'clock on Monday, the 30th inst., the yacht will reach Woolwich on Wednesday, Oct. 2, about ten o'clock.

[So far we quote the statement of a contemporary, for whose opinions altogether we are not responsible.]

Another account says, "It is now arranged that the Queen will leave Blair Athol on Tuesday, the 1st of October, and not Monday, the 30th of September. The reason assigned for the change is, that there would be very extensive preparations to make on the day preceding the journey, and that day being the Sabbath, which in Scotland is observed with very great strictness, there would be some difficulty and inconvenience in making the necessary arrangements."

It is generally understood that her Majesty has been so much gratified with her visit to the Highlands, that she will return to Blair Athol next summer. Orders have been given for a full-dress of tartan, for shooting, for his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and this has given rise to the report that the Prince is about to don the kilt. Her Majesty will also, as soon as the period of Court mourning has expired, have several dresses of tartan made, and the Scottish fabrics bid fair to be very fashionable in Court circles during the approaching winter.

The large engraving at page 200 illustrates the picturesque locality of Glen Tilt, wherein are vast herds of wild deer, said to number from 15,000 to 16,000. They are driven down from the hill in herds, three of them being generally in advance of the others.

The banks of the Tilt, along the whole of the glen, are beautifully wooded for some distance up the sides, and there is a succession of fine romantic walks and drives. Further on, at the Fender, a small tributary stream which falls into the Tilt, there are some pretty falls, but at this season the volume of water is so much reduced that they lose much of their striking effect. A few miles higher up, the sides of the glen become more naked and barren, and the celebrated geologist, Dr. Hutton, here discovered some junctions of the primary and secondary strata, which so delighted him, that his guides thought he had discovered a mine of gold, and the story runs that several of the peasants spent many days after Dr. Hutton's departure in digging about the neighbourhood, in the hope of finding the golden treasure. On the right, near the rivulet of Torhainn, her Majesty was pointed out the remains of a sylvan palace of great extent, which had been built by a former Earl of Athol, in order to entertain King James V., the Pope's Legate, and other visitors of distinction. When the palace had served its purpose, it is said that it was ordered to be burnt, that strangers might be impressed with a high notion of the easy circumstances in which the Scottish nobility lived. The probability is that the sylvan mansion was destroyed by accident.

The original sketch of the above engraving has been submitted to her Majesty, who has been pleased to express approval of its spirit and fidelity.

The large engraving, upon the opposite page, shows the most picturesque view of Blair Castle and Glen Tilt, sketched from the Hill of Tulloch.

Above this illustration is a view of the Lower Falls of Bruar, one of the beautiful scenes which our artist has had the honour of sketching for her Majesty.

In the other scene, Prince Albert and Lord Glenlyon are stalking deer. "That it is a chase," says Mr. Scrope, "which throws all other field sports in the background, and, indeed, makes them appear wholly insignificant, no one, who has been initiated in it, will attempt to deny. The beautiful motions of the deer, his picturesque and noble appearance, his sagacity, and the skilful generalship which can alone insure success in the pursuit of him, keep the mind in a state of pleasurable excitement."

"Magnificent creature! to reach thee I strain
Through forest and glen, over mountain and plain;
Yet, now thou art fallen, thy fate I deplore,
And lament that the reign of thy greatness is o'er."

THE HON. T. LENNELL.

BUST OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—We are gratified to learn that the Duke of Wellington has intimated to the authorities of Eton College that it is his grace's intention to present to that institution a bust of himself.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—On Tuesday morning the marriage of Henry Tufnell, Esq., M.P., and the Hon. Frances Byng, second daughter of General Lord Strafford, O.C.B., and niece to G. Byng, Esq., M.P. for Middlesex, was solemnised in the parish church of St. Marybone. The Misses Hope Vere, and Miss Tufnell were bridesmaids. The same day the Rev. Edgell Wyatt Edgell, rector of North Cray, was married to the Hon. Henrietta Oisway Care, youngest daughter of the Baroness Bray and the late Henry Otway, Esq., of Stamford Hall, Leicestershire. The Rev. Lord William Somerset, cousin of Bristol, eldest surviving son of Henry, fifth Duke of Beaufort, and uncle of the present Duke, was married on Tuesday last, at Pilton Church, Gloucestershire, to Frances, widow of the late Mr. Cornelius O'Callaghan, of Ballymahon, county Clare. We understand the marriage of the Hon. Frederick Paul Methuen and Miss Horatia Sandford, only daughter and heiress of the Rev. John Sandford, of Connaught-place, will be solemnised early in the ensuing month.

THE INAUGURATION OF THE STATUE OF DUQUESNE AT DIEPPE.—The town of Dieppe on Sunday, from sunrise to long after nightfall, presented a scene of gaiety characteristic of the grand six-days of the French. The occasion was the inauguration of the statue of Duquesne, a French admiral, born in the town in 1619, which had been erected in the Place Royale, facing from St. Jacques to the Hotel de Ville. The vessels in the harbour and offing were decorated with the tricolour, as was likewise the Place Royale, the middle portion of which had been separated from the remainder of the square for the purpose of affording room for the military, the National Guard, and deputations from the various trades connected with ship building, to attend the inauguration. At sunrise the commencement of the fête was announced by salutes fired from the Government steamers in the roads, as well as from the Castle and batteries. Towards noon the military, marines, and National Guards, a portion of them habited in the costume of the time of Duquesne, went through three evolutions on the Place, in front of the Hotel des Bains, whence they marched round the town, assembling at the Place Royale. Precisely at three o'clock, the Place being crowded to excess, some speeches were made by the authorities, commemorative of the achievements of Duquesne, and at a given signal the statue, which is of bronze and of colossal dimensions, was uncovered amidst the plaudits of the multitude assembled to do honour to their deceased warrior and townsman, and salutes from the steamers and castlements. A splendid display of fireworks took place in the evening, at the Castle, where a representation of the bombardment of Algiers was given on a grand scale. General Gerard, one of Napoleon's generals, was present, and Dieppe appeared to have at least doubled its population on the occasion.

THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT ON TULLOCH HILL.

OPENING OF THE MAIDSTONE BRANCH RAILWAY.

OPENING OF THE BRANCH RAILWAY FROM THE DOVER LINE TO MAIDSTONE.

Newton, of Wingham, writing of the "King's town" of Maidstone, in 1741, says, "The country almost every where round the town is full of populous villages, and good pleasant seats of the nobility and gentry. The greatest blemish is the roads, which used to be rough, stony, and narrow; but are now much mended and improved on every side of the town, to its very great advantage, and to the honour of several worthy gentlemen, who cheerfully contributed to so good a work." Much, however, remained to be done; the famous city of Caer-Medway continued to our own day to be almost an isolated place. The roads, generally, were "soft," and the only good ones were rendered comparatively valueless by the steep hills in their course. The reproach of Maidstone is now wiped away. On Tuesday last a new branch railway, from the Paddock-wood station of the South-eastern line, put the town in close and easy communication with the metropolis, or the north, and with Folkestone and the continent. These great advantages—to say nothing of the greater moral ones likely to accrue to the benighted villagers of mid-Kent—seemed to have been fully appreciated by the mayor, jurats, and commonalty of Maidstone, for, on the occasion of opening the branch line, they gave the Directors and friends of the Dover Company an invitation to dine with them under circumstances of more than usual "jollification." Accordingly, at eleven o'clock on Tuesday morning last, a special train, richly dressed with flags and flowers, left the Bricklayers' Arms with the company, and, proceeding on its way, reached the Paddock-wood, a distance of forty-five miles, in little more than one hour and a half. Here the admirable signals recently adopted by the Company, were examined by the visitors, and their use, in connection with the new line, explained. Starting thence, the Maidstone branch, leaving the main line on the right, proceeds by a gentle inflection towards the beautiful wood crowned heights of Mereworth. Soon afterwards the river Medway appears, and then commences the picturesque scenery for which the course of the line is so justly celebrated. The valley of the "Med-Yaga," runs through the chalk, marl, ragstone, and gale strata, till it reaches the Shanklin sand, beyond Watlingtonbury. These formations are proverbial throughout Kent and Surrey, for the beauty of their landscapes, but, in this direction, owing to their sweet variety, and the presence of an ever-shifting stream, they seem to reach their greatest perfection. The hills are clothed throughout with hop gardens, cherry and filbert orchards (the natural produce of the soil), and, occasionally, with fine patches of Holm oak and other celebrated denizens of the Southern Wealds. The boldness of Salvo's grouping seems, in fact, to be united in this charming valley with the softened tints of Claude or Gainsborough. On reaching Watlingtonbury station, Alderman Lucas, surrounded by his family and a large party of friends, was observed standing beneath a flag, on which were inscribed the words, "Old England, our Church, and our Queen," and loudly hailing the approach of the train. The example of the stout old "water-fencible" was followed by the inhabitants and peasantry assembled, and a scene of "Merrie England" followed.

The worthy Alderman, having thus, in his own words, "bowed to the times and circumstances," mounted the innovating train, and, at eighty-seven years of age, went on a line to Maidstone! Before reaching the terminus, from an elevation near East Farleigh, a splendid view of the town is gained. In the centre is seen Courtney's church of All Saints, and the adjoining college; and, in the background, a noble sweep of the chain of hills, which constitute the northern downs.

The branch is a single line of rails; but provision has also been made for the laying down of another line, should the amount of traffic render the addition necessary. The inclination of the line varies little from a dead level, and its course embraces a succession of somewhat sudden curves, conjoined by what Hogarth would have called, lines of beauty. The length is about nine miles.

After the arrival of the long-expected "first train," the scene at Maidstone became, in the best sense of the term, a holiday one. Trains ran up and down the line gratis. The shops were closed. Social parties were made between the inhabitants and the visitors, to explore the wonders of Allington Castle, Leeds Castle, Boxley Abbey, and other celebrated places in the neighbourhood. The directors and friends of the Company sat down, at five o'clock, to a most sumptuous dinner in the Town-hall. The ruder merry-makers burned tar-barrels in the street; and, finally, huzzared the Londoners to their cozy seats in the return train to town at ten o'clock. Thus ended a memorable, and, to all parties, a happy day.

THE IRON STEAM SCREW COLLIER, "Q. E. D."

THE "Q. E. D." (SCREW STEAM COLLIER).

A perfect novelty in the coal trade arrived in the river Thames, at the close of last week, and took in her moorings at the tier off Princes Stairs, Rotherhithe, where she has attracted considerable attention and curiosity. This was an iron vessel of handsome appearance, barque rigged, with taunt masts and square yards, the masts raking aft in a manner that is seldom seen except in the waters of the United States. The hull was built by Mr. Cootes, who is the owner, at Walker's-quay, near Newcastle, and is of peculiar construction, with a 20 horse power engine, by Hawthorn, which turns a screw propeller (a compound of several inventions), having four flaps or flaps a right angles with each other, the bend of each flap at an angle of 45 degrees from the centre. Her length over all is 130 feet; breadth of beam, 27 feet 6 inches; tonnage by admeasurement, 273 tons, but capable of carrying 340 tons of coals, and with this weight her draught of water is 11 feet 9 inches abaft, and 10 feet 3 inches forward. Her hold is divided into separate chambers (so that injury to the bottom in one chamber will not affect the others), and each chamber has a false floor of sheet iron hermetically closed; and between the bottom and these floors are spaces to be filled with water by means of large taps, for the purpose of ballast—so that her only ballast is the liquid element which may, if required, be pumped out again in a very short time by the engine. Her bows are like the sharp end of a wedge rising to a lofty billet-head, and her overhanging stem projects much more than is customary; but, though low, the flatness of what is usually termed the counters must lift her to every swell, so as to render it next to impossible for a sea to break over the taffrail; but we fancy that when struck as she scuds aft, the concussion must be very great. On her stern is an armorial bearing, with the motto, "Spes mea Christus," and beneath these appears her name, the "Q. E. D., of Newcastle."

The cabin is commodious, with a raised roof surrounded with window-lights, enabling persons below to see what is passing upon deck. There are four sleeping apartments and a state-room for the Captain; a swinging compass is suspended, having a magnet on each side, and one before it, to counteract the attraction of the iron. Her shrouds are wire-rope served over, with a strong double screw to each shroud to set it up when slack without the smallest difficulty and with scarcely any labour. Her mainmast from the step to the cap is 65 feet in altitude, her mainyard 52 feet in squareness, and from the keel to the royal-truck the height is about 130 feet; the other masts and yards are in proportion, the mizemast being of iron, and hollow, so as to form a funnel for the engine-fire, and it is not the least curious part about her to see the smoke issuing from the mizemast head. This vessel was launched on St. Swithin's day (15th July), took in a cargo of coals at Newcastle (from 18 to 20 keels), but getting aground on the Hook of the Gunfleet Sand, in the Swin, was obliged to heave two or three keels of coals overboard. She laid ashore several hours, but sustained no damage. We are informed that she steers with ease, sails remarkably well, and when tried with the screw propeller, rather exceeded expectation. Much ingenuity has been displayed in putting her together, and we feel confident that the time is not far distant when our ships of the line will be fitted with engines and screw in a somewhat similar manner. Of the success of the constructor's experiment we trust that he may hereafter be enabled to say Q. E. D.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF AULD SCOTLAND.

CASSILLIS CASTLE.

Cassillis Castle stands on a beautiful "haugh" on the left bank of the Doon, about a mile from the parish village of Dalrymple. The first mention that is made of it is, that it was transferred in the reign of David II., King of Scotland, from a family named Montgomerie, to that of Sir John Kennedy, of Dunure direct male ancestor of the present Marquis of Ailes. Tradition, as is usually the case among the castles of the "olden time," has handed to posterity (in the shape of a beautiful ballad, sung to an air entitled "Lady Cassillis' Lilt.") the following tale connected with Cassillis castle:—While John VI., Earl of Cassillis, was attending the assembly of divines at Westminster, his consort is said to have been seduced away from this house by a party of gipsies, headed by a lover in disguise; the consequence of this imprudence was, her confinement for life in a tower, in the neighbouring town of Maybole. The "Countess' room," a small chamber in the upper floor (from which the tradition represents the unlucky lady before mentioned as compelled to behold her lover and mother than a dozen of his companions, as they hung on a tree below) is still shown, but is now a sleeping-room for servants.

The grounds, through which the "Bonnie Doon," made sacred by the muse of the poet Burns, "rins, wimplin, clear," are laid out in the modern style, and are eminently beautiful.

Behind the castle rise three or four small hills, called "the Cassillis Downs." On this enchanted ground it is, that the fays or fairies are supposed by the neighbouring inhabitants to hold their "midnight revels." Burns alludes to this in the opening of the poem of "Halloween," when he says:—

CASSILLIS CASTLE.

"Upon that right, when fairies light,
On Cassillis' Downs dance,
Or, o'er the lawn in splendid blouse,
On sprightly couriers prance."

On the top of one of these hills is a circular mound, probably the remains of a fort, as a farm on slope of the hill bears the name of Dunree, obviously Dunreigh, the King's castle.

COD LIVER OIL.—The following recent and well testified care of Court, Washington, D. C. 20001, or to the nearest Federal Bureau of Investigation office. Do not attempt to return the property to the care of Court, Rheumatism, Seizure, etc.

Gentlemen,--If my case is of any value to you, I beg you will make the best use of it, as I have referred to mark from friend and Relation not to have the strongest suspicion for all who may be secretly afraid. I purchased only one bottle of your Cod Liver Oil and after a few applications was completely cured. I could say much in praise of this medicinal remedy, and shall be happy to reply to all inquiries.

I am, Gentlemen, your thankful and obedient servant,

LUNAR RAINBOW.

LUNAR RAINBOW.

On the evening of the 19th inst. this rare phenomenon was witnessed by a correspondent at Highfield House, Lenton, Nottinghamshire, who has favoured us with the annexed sketch and details:—

The barometer was stationary during the day. Maximum thermometer, 62 deg.; and minimum thermometer, 52 deg. Wind, in the morning, west; and evening, east. Dull day, with slight showers.

At 7 h. 58 m. P.M. this rare and beautiful object was visible. It did not exhibit any of the prismatic colours, being of a silvery hue. The bow was stretched across a dense nimbus in N.E., the summit extending nearly to the zenith. Sky overcast, except a small portion in west, near to the zenith, over which thin cirrocumuli swiftly passed. The bow disappeared at 8 h. 5 m. P.M. It may be added—the clouds at sunset in the west were tinged with bright orange-purple. At 10 P.M. many glow-worms (Lampyrus noctilucæ).

CAPTAIN BULLOCK'S SAFETY BEACON ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.

The Safety, or Refuge Beacon, was first erected on the Goodwin Sands through the indomitable perseverance of Captain Bullock, to whom all the credit of the suggestion and invention is justly due, on the 14th of September, 1840; and it sustained, without injury, the violence of four most tempestuous winters. About two months ago, however, it was unfortunately run down, during a thick fog, by a Dutch galliot, rendering its entire re-construction, under the superintendence of Captain Bullock, essentially necessary. This has just been accomplished; and it now stands erect on those dangerous sands, as the successful result of a simple design, which has led to attempts of a similar humane and praiseworthy character, but of a more elaborate and costly description.

CAPT. BULLOCK'S SAFETY BEACON ON GOODWIN SANDS.

ELEVATION.—Total length of lower mast, 40 feet; mast head, 6 feet; in the sand, 6 feet; from sand to top, 12 feet; diameter of mast, 30 inches; diameter of octagon, top 6 inches, side 2 feet high; top-mast, 15 feet. The whole supported by four pair of chain strands, leading to eight iron stumps at (B) from 14 to 17 feet in the sand. (C) Iron base, 2 inches square, four of them to secure partners and iron ballast with bags of shingle, intended to be placed on the top of all. (D) Hoof of mast, sheathed with iron. (E) High water-mark.

It has been re-erected upon the same principle as at its first erection, with the exception that the base is composed of iron instead of wood; thus, consequently, penetrating considerably further into the sand than it did originally.

The Beacon has been already described in No. 36 of our journal.

We should observe that the Goodwin Sands are, to a great extent, quite dry at low water; and as vessels which strike on them seldom go to pieces in a single tide, the probability is, that some of the unfortunate crew would be enabled to reach the sand during that interval, and the Safety Beacon would then become their only refuge.

GROUND PLAN OF THE SAFETY BEACON.

GROUND PLAN.—(A) Partners 10 feet long, 1 foot wide, 6 inches thick. (B) Four iron bases to secure partners, with 34 pigs of ballast, equal to 3 tons 12 cwt. (C) Right iron base, 5 inches square, from 14 to 17 feet in sand. (D) Four iron bases, with spurs at each end, to fix in at B, and end of partners to prevent B from coming home. Distance across from B to B, 60 feet. (E) Hoof of mast. (F) High water-mark.

It is obvious that the essential principle of this Beacon is, that it rests upon a base not easily broken or displaced, and that the mast, with its gallery (the only superstructure), offers little or no resistance to the wind or waves; so that its strength absolutely lies in its extreme simplicity.

We may add to this account, that during the re-erection of the Beacon, the foundation of the former one was found to remain unmoved and unabsorbed. In consequence of this circumstance, Captain Bullock resorted to his former plan, by throwing upon the same foundation between 50 and 60 tons of concrete blocks, chalk and shingle, which there is very little doubt will remain unchanged. A gentleman, who was an eye-witness to the whole of the late operations on the Goodwin, thus writes on the subject of this addition to the old foundation:—"The tide, so strong as it passes the shallow, has had no visible effect upon the mass, around which the sand had accumulated nearly two feet in height, and it now remains as the result of a most interesting and successful experiment. The present gale (while I am writing) from the southward will prove whether it will eventually stand against the 'boiling surf' by which it will be continually surrounded and assailed. I have myself very little fear for the heavy concrete blocks which constitute the base of the cone; but I think it very likely that the upper portions of the undefended and loose shingle may be disarranged, and the cone somewhat flattened down. It is, however, but an experiment, and the problem will possibly be demonstrated that human skill and ingenuity cannot overcome the formidable Goodwin with small means, and that man cannot successfully wage 'a little war' with such a foe. However, I must say, from all I have heard, that the Lords of the Admiralty have behaved in the most kind and handsome manner to Captain Bullock, in rushing him to possess thus far every facility for carrying out his humane and highly praiseworthy undertaking."

THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE AND THE FRENCH NAVY.—The Prince de Joinville succeeds Admiral Lalonde in the list of vice admirals. The officers of the navy of France in actual service are two admirals, two vice admirals, twenty rear admirals, 160 capitaines de vaisseau, 200 capitaines de corvette, 600 lieutenants de vaisseau, 500 enseignes, 300 élèves (first class), 305 élèves (second class). The reserve list contains five vice admirals, and six rear admirals. The rank conferred on the Prince de Joinville is next in degree to that of Baron Duperre, promoted 19th August, 1830, and Baron Roussin, promoted 30th October, 1840. The Prince de Joinville, who has hitherto been able to command only a squadron, may now be appointed to that of a fleet.

DISCRETIONS TO LADIES FOR SHOPPING.—Shopping is the amusement of spending money at shops. It is to a lady what spending is to a gentleman; somewhat productive, and very chargeable. Sport, however, involves the payment of one's own shot; shopping may be managed by getting it paid for. Ride all the way till you come to the shopping-ground in a coach, if you can; in an omnibus, if you must; but you should be tired when you get there. If you are a lady of fashion, do not get out of your carriage; and when you stop before your milliner's, particularly if it is a cold, wet day, make one of the young women come out to you, and without a bonnet, in her thin shoes, stand on the curb-stone in the damp and mud. The best places for shopping are fashionable streets, bazaars, and the like. Street-shopping principally relates to bonnetry, drapery, and jewellery of the richer sort. Bazaar and Arcade-shopping, to fancy articles, nick-nacks, and perumery. In street-shopping walk leisurely along, keeping a sharp look-out on the windows. In bazaar-shopping, beat each stall separately. You had better finish your streets before you take your bazaar and arcade; for those the shopping, which one might otherwise call cover-shopping, though excellent sport, refers mostly to articles of no manner of use; and it may be as well to reserve toys and superfluities to the last. Married ladies, when they have laid in all they want for themselves, are recommended to show their thoughtfulness by purchasing some little trifle for their husbands, who, of course, will have to pay for it in the end.—Punch.

HEAVY CRIME AND SEVERE PUNISHMENT.—An unscrupulous butcher, who had enriched himself by selling "kebabs" (red meat), at Moscow, was determined to increase his gains by the more simple method of receipts without expenditure. With this view he nightly inveigled into his house a woman of exceptional character, who was immediately assassinated, cooked, and disposed of the following day as "kebabs." His wife, who witnessed these nightly murders, apprehending a similar fate, went to the Pacha and denounced her husband. He was soon judged and condemned; a boiler full of water was placed over a fierce fire, before his shop door, which soon reached boiling temperature. The executioner then dragged the criminal to his own block, still stained with the blood of his numerous victims, and chopping off his hands, threw them into the cauldron, which, when boiled, were given to the numerous bands of hungry dogs who had been assembled for that purpose. In the same way his feet and legs were disposed of, until loss of blood terminated his life, and with it this appalling and barbarous justice.

IRON CHURCH FOR JAMAICA.

In giving our readers, three weeks since, a description of a "Temporary Wooden Church," the work of Mr. Peter Thompson, Commercial-road, Limehouse, we were not aware of his being a worker in iron as well as wood, as the annexed sketch will show.

This Church has been sent out to Jamaica, as a specimen, as many of the kind are likely to be required. The pillars supports are of cast iron, on which are fixed the frame roof, of wrought iron, of an ingenious construction, combining great strength with simplicity of arrangement; the whole is covered with corrugated iron; and the ceiling formed in paneled compartments, covered with felt, to act as a non-conductor of heat.

The body of the church is 65 feet by 40; the chancel, 24 by 12; a robing-room and vestry are attached. The windows are glazed with plate-glass, one-eighth of an inch in thickness; the two chancel windows, and four others are of stained glass.

The cost of this Iron Church is £1000.

IRON CHURCH, FOR JAMAICA.

POISONING BY THE DEADLY NIGHTSHADE.

An extraordinary instance of the fatal consequences of eating the berries of this poisonous plant is recorded in the Lancaster Gazette. It appears that on the morning of Tuesday week, Mr. Adam Clark, of Heat Bank, and a man named John Teesdale, in returning along the shore from sea-fishing, had reached a spot where grows in considerable abundance the Deadly Nightshade (Atropa Belladonna), a perennial plant with herbaceous stem. The fruit has a berry as large as a small grape, and a dark purple colour. Two elderly women, both residing in Lancaster, were standing amongst the plants and eating the berries when Mr. Clark and Teesdale came up. Mr. Clark inquired what the berries were, and on being told by the females that they were blaberries or barberries, he began to gather and eat also, as did Teesdale.

The parties separated, Mr. Clark and Teesdale proceeding to the Heat Bank Hotel, and taking with them several of the berries, which were immediately pronounced to be poison. Finding this, Mr. Clark swallowed a dose of medicine which served as an emetic. Nevertheless, he was seized with an alarming illness, parched tongue, dizziness, difficulty of swallowing, swollen face and eyes, and delirium; and it was not until the following morning that he was brought round by medical aid.

Meanwhile, the two women made the best of their way home, but they had not proceeded far before the symptoms described above began to manifest themselves. Parched and thirsty, the great desire was for drink, but one of the two having heard that drinking ought to be avoided in such cases (for they had suspicion they were poisoned) had the fortitude to abstain. They succeeded in reaching their homes, and obtained medical aid: they were in a state of mania throughout the night, but eventually, after much suffering, the poor women both recovered. It should be mentioned that the one who abstained from drink, though she had eaten most, suffered the least. One ate about a pint of the berries, and the other only about a dozen. Mr. Clark thinks he could not have swallowed half-a-dozen, at most.

The tragic part of the story remains to be told. The poor fellow, Teesdale, had been missed very soon after his arrival at the Heat Bank Hotel, about Tuesday noon; and was not found until Wednesday morning, when he was stiff and insensible, with his body swollen to an extraordinary size, eyes closed, &c. He was immediately put to bed, medical aid was procured, and every means taken to neutralize the poison; for a time, the patient rallied, but throughout Thursday, he grew worse, and next morning, died in a state of utter exhaustion. He was about sixty years of age, and of robust constitution.

THE DEADLY NIGHTSHADE.—(Atropa Belladonna).

We annex a representation of the deleterious plant, with the view of aiding in the prevention of accidents similar to the above. The plant Atropa Belladonna, Deadly Nightshade, or dulse, is found not unfrequently in hedges and thickets in this country. The whole is of a lightish green colour, except the flowers, which are of a large and dingy-brownish purple; and the berries, which are of the rich deep black of black cherries. The odour of the whole plant is nauseous and oppressive, as if to warn us of its venomous nature; the berries, from their resemblance to cherries, have often been eaten by children, with fatal consequences. The active property of the leaves and roots is employed medicinally.

In the engraving: 1. A corolla, cut open, showing the position of the stamens. 2. The calyx, with the pistil. 3. A berry cut in half, to show its two cells, in each of which are several seeds.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE PENSIONERS.—It is stated that the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital are to be identified every six months, and "are to be considered on a nearly similar footing as when they were in the service." We shall be glad to know how this will affect those pensioners who have lost their legs, and who cannot be supposed to be on anything like the same footing as when they were in the service.—Punch.

A CHURCHWARDEN.—It is now two years since the horrors of fiscal war broke out in the once peaceful parish of Wholehog-cum-Appleton. For two years have the afflicted parishioners had their souls and pockets torn by thoughts of mammon—for two years have they nightly fallen to sleep to groan and writhe beneath a nightmare sitting on their breasts in the horrid shape of a Churchwarden, gnawing and hugging in his arms an iron-clasped account book! Neither sex nor age has escaped the evil influence of the time: old women wax older when they talk of Churchwardens; and the faces of little children become sharp and thin as aspenes when they stammer out his name. True it is, the parishioners have put him in the cage of Chaucery; nevertheless, with a magnanimous philosophy, he does nothing but make mouths at them through the bars.—Punch's Complete Letter-writer.

THE NAPOLEON OF PEACE.

LOUIS PHILIPPE has formally announced his intention of visiting the Queen of England. The intention was known, but its performance was uncertain; Tahiti and Morocco—wars and rumours of wars—disputes—bitter feelings—and their expression in angry articles, which flew like poisoned arrows between Paris and London, created a state of things that rendered such a visit doubtful; but the clouds, if they have not quite disappeared, are at least dispersed. We hope the two nations are welcoming home again their, for a while, discarded faith in each other's good intentions, and that they have almost expended their anger in type and paper—a more harmless combination of the two materials than balls and cartridges. In conjunction, too, with the announcement we have alluded to, appears an account of the reception given by Louis Philippe to addresses from the societies established in England and America for the dissemination of the principles of peace. The reply of the King to these addresses is a noble one; it is worthy a wise ruler, and the impression it will make here will be the best herald he could send before him to make his welcome among us a hearty one. He pledges himself to that pacific policy, from which it is now more than madness for nations to depart. He does so strongly, and without reserve. In the face of such an excitement as that kept up by the war party in France, the declaration is bold, as well as sagacious. While the conjunction of circumstances fixes public attention on this monarch, it may not be out of place to draw a brief estimate of his career, his position, and his policy. The first has been eventful; the second is anxious; the last, hitherto, successful.

Louis Philippe is an able man. He is one of the very few monarchs of Europe who govern for themselves, mark out their own policy, and, though securing good ministers to manage the details, contrive to retain them in their position as instruments, rather than powers. Without consummate tact, judgment, and courage, he never could have so long sat firmly on his throne, founded as it is on the ruins and wrecks of three systems, which, in the course of his own life, he has seen rise and fall: he looks back from his elevated position on the Republic, the Empire, and the Legitimate Monarchy. From the Republic he learned how short-lived is the wild, unhealthy licence which the French baptised in blood, and called Freedom—and, stranger still, mistook for the sacred thing whose name they had thus taken in vain. The Republic of France taught Louis Philippe much—and he has remembered the lesson. It beheaded his father, and compelled himself to eat—and, it is said, to earn—the bread of an exile. From the Empire, too, though no sharer in its triumphs, he might gather much also; it was a system more brilliant than solid; talent and energies almost superhuman directed its machinery, but the talent was without feeling for the mass of mankind, and the energy the greatest when engaged in the work of destruction. The good of all was sacrificed, without scruple, to the personal aggrandisement of one; the true end of Government and policy was reversed, and the system fell with the extraordinary man who had raised it, leaving little behind but the memory of the blood and treasure that had been wasted without profit, and spent without lasting result. Then came the Monarchy, with its revival of legitimacy, and etiquette, and right divine; but the world was no longer the same as when these things had a life, and power and command over men; everything had changed—except the Bourbons. They were not pliant enough to yield in time to the inevitable, nor dexterous enough to turn events to their advantage; for discontent they could imagine no remedy but force, yet when the unhappy hour came when force was resorted to, the sword broke in their hands; ruin again overtook the race of St. Louis, and Charles X. died in exile, neglected by other nations and forgotten by the bulk of his own. The reins that had fallen from the weak hands of the elder representative of his family were then seized by Louis Philippe, and he is now, after fourteen years of active government, firmly seated on the throne, ruling ably, as we said before, if not always on principles that Englishmen would be likely to approve, or endure if they were applied to themselves; profiting by the errors of his predecessors, and the calamities of the past, the better to direct his efforts for the security of the future. It may be that his long and intimate knowledge of the world and of men, and of much that is the worst in both, has something hardened his heart, and given him a low estimate of human motives. It is also possible that the political excesses of the people, ere Napoleon crushed every semblance of liberty beneath the weight of a military organisation, and a knowledge of the bad effects of the mingled feebleness and desperation of the policy of Charles X., have rendered him a little too jealous and distrustful of free principles, and too ready to repress their progress by the "strong hand." But it must be remembered that he knows his subjects well, and the use they made of liberty when they gained it, was not beneficial either to themselves or their neighbours. Before we censure Louis Philippe too severely for his cautious régime, let us be sure that his people are fit for freedom. It is the remark of an acute author, "That whether the French walk or run upon the path of liberty, they always contrive to stumble upon despotism."

But, there is one trait in Louis Philippe's character, that, for Englishmen, and indeed for the whole world, ought to be a subject of congratulation. Like all men of clear judgment, and calm sense, he is not dazzled by the brilliancy of that phantom called military glory: he has gazed on it, and seen its empty vanity; he has shared its toils, and knows well the suffering and mischiefs it inflicts. He is, therefore, a man of peace. Those who know best what war actually is, are never the most anxious to plunge into it. Wellington and Soult are the two greatest of living warriors, and the cabinets in which they have powerful interest are the most pacific in their policy, the respective countries have seen for many years. M. Thiers was, and is, hot for war, probably because all he knows of it is from books. He was a journalist, and is now a man of letters as well as a statesman; but the "bookish theoretic," we may take for granted, is all he knows of warfare:

*He never set a squadron in the field,
Nor the division of a battle knows
More than a spinster.*

From the same ignorance, stimulated by vanity, "Young France" is all warlike, ready to quarrel with any nation, for any cause—the slighter perhaps the better; and Tahiti being perfectly useless as a possession, is, on that principle, better worth fighting for than the old "frontier of the Rhine." We can form but a slight notion in England of the extent to which the war-madness prevails among the young men of France; they connect with the idea of war that of political progress, and are at least persuaded that it would break up the existing order of things. Whether it would lead to a better condition or a worse, does not occur to them to consider.

That all this is folly and madness Louis Philippe sees clearly enough; and, luckily for the world, is sufficiently strong and sufficiently bold to stem the current instead of going with it. He does it skilfully, too; taking advantage of the policy of the last years of his predecessor, he has contrived to turn much of the unquiet, restless spirit of a large portion of the army against barbarous tribes, who give it constant occupation, while there is not any imminent danger of such a collision with the European powers springing from it as would bring on a war with any of them. Louis Philippe found Algiers occupied; he could not have given it up in the early part of his reign without danger to the stability of his authority. The occupation is a continual drain on the resources of France, to which it returns not a penny; but it furnishes bulletins and despatches, the chance of magnifying skirmishes into battles, now and then a standard or two, and recently the splendid trophy of an umbrella. A collision with a neighbouring people, as savage as the Arabs themselves, is but an excitement the more; and altogether Algeria may almost be considered the safety-valve for getting rid of some of that high pressure of the war excitement, which, in spite of this outlet, still rages uncomfortably high.

But when there is any risk of a collision with the great civilized powers, we are bound to say that the anxiety of the French Government to prevent a resort to the last fatal extremities, is quite equal to that of our own Ministry; though in France none know better than those at the head of affairs the unpopularity they will, in so doing, ensure to themselves. In England, the bulk of the nation would back up and support any minister in his exertions to maintain a peace; in France, if they had the power, they would depose him, in favour of a less scrupulous man, who would adopt the madness of the hour. Were the suffrage enjoyed as widely in France as in England, and an election for the Chamber occurred to-morrow, Europe, in six months, would be in a blaze!

On this subject, the journalists of France exhibit less reasoning powers than children, while it might be a question which of the two is the worse—their logic or their morality. Thus, the Sicé actually says that it may be very well for the philosopher to dilate on the blessings of peace; it is quite right that the priest should lift up his hands in prayer for its continuance; but statesmen and kings must not act from the motives that prompt the sage and the divine! A cold barren assent may be given to a principle, but no human means are to be used to secure to mankind the blessings of that principle put in action! Nothing can be worse than all this; it is to rave, not reason. But knowing that such language can be addressed to a whole people, not only without fear of offending them, but even with a tolerable security of having their applause, we may better estimate what must have been the labour of Louis Philippe; certainly, he has to deal with a generation that do err in their hearts, and that he has been compelled to use a degree of coercion in governing them that to us appears somewhat harsh and not a little distrustful, is rather a matter of regret than surprise.

But, nevertheless, he has preserved peace hitherto, and he has given a distinct pledge that he will preserve it, still; to do so will require continual efforts, the more meritorious that they have not the brilliant and noisy triumphs which wait on success in war; but they have their reward in the blessings they ensure to the present, and the still greater blessings they will provide for the future. Industry, arts, and commerce flourish beneath the shade of the olive-branch, while they are blasted by that of the laurel; it is not by the lightning flash of battle that the onward path of mankind can be illuminated; nations must be guided by the calmer and steadier rays of the light that cheers and dazzles not—the light from whose bloody glare Religion need not veil her eyes, or turn in horror away. As one of those who, having in their hands great earthly power, use it, in this respect, for good rather than evil, we would direct the approval of men to much of the past policy and to the whole of the late declaration of Louis Philippe, who has acquired and promises still to deserve, his title of the NAPOLEON OF PEACE.

CALCUTTA.—ARRIVAL OF THE NEW GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

The city of Calcutta, of which we present an accurate view, very recently taken, is the capital of Bengal, and the seat of the Supreme Government of British India. Presenting, as it does, a beautiful array of private dwellings, and a magnificent residence expressly built for the Governor-General of India, during the administration of the Marquis of Wellesley, it is generally called "The City of Palaces;" and no one will venture to deny the appellation. The population consists of about 160,000 souls, chiefly Hindoos and Mahomedans; but there are a great number of other inhabitants of various European and Eastern nations. The English number about 3000, who are divided for the most part into merchants, tradespeople, civil and military staff officers, lawyers, persons employed in the shipping trade, and others. The Karasana, or East Indians, offspring of the English by Hindoo or Mahomedan mothers, are nearly 4000 in number; and there are, besides, 3000 or 4000 of the degenerate descendants of the early Portuguese conquerors and settlers of India.

As the seat of Government, and the chief commercial port in India, Calcutta is, of course, not wanting in any of the luxuries which make existence tolerable to the European. The style of life corresponds very much with that in use in England, with a difference in the article of clothing, rendered necessary by the intense heat of the climate; and the addition of some domestic appliances not ordinarily enjoyed by the middle classes in this country, such as carriages, horses, &c. The climate does not appear very materially to affect Europeans who are moderate in their habits; but there is no doubt that cholera, fever, the liver complaint, and dysentery, are as common in the metropolis as in other parts of British India.

The view here given of Calcutta is taken from the water gate of Fort William, and exhibits the face of the town, just as it strikes the visitor for the first time, on the vessel rounding a reach close to the fort. In our engraving, the steamer, with Sir H. Hardinge on board, on the 21st of July last, has just left the reach astern. The domed edifice in the centre of the town is the Government House, and the column to the spectator's extreme right, beyond the ramparts, is the Obelisk pillar—so called from its having been built to commemorate the public services of the late General Sir David Ochterlony. The rest of the edifices are the Supreme Court, the Town Hall, and a variety of private residences. Fort William, to the right, is garrisoned by one of the European regiments in Sir H. Hardinge's service. As it commands the adjacent country, Calcutta enjoys sufficient protection to render separate walls, barriers, or other appliances to a fortified town, unnecessary.

The town of Calcutta, in its municipal government, corresponds very much with other cities under English rule. The protection of British laws is enjoyed there in full force. There are besides, police magistrates, with a large police establishment, commissioners of courts of request and magistry; a coroner, and all the usual paraphernalia of a city government. Numerous associations exist for moral, charitable, or commercial purposes, and the natives enjoy as fully as the English all the protection and advantages derivable from a just and equitable system of rule.

In connection with the mortality of Calcutta, it may be interesting to add, that at York, last week, Colonel Sykes read to the British Association a paper on the above subject. Amongst other curious facts he showed that the rate of mortality was higher amongst Hindoos than either Mahomedans or Europeans; and that amongst the latter the average was greater amongst Catholics than Protestants—a circumstance probably attributable to the general superiority in station and comforts of the latter. In the Indian army the mortality of single men was 3.77 compared with that of married men, which was but 2.74.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers contain long accounts of the review of the troops in garrison in Paris on Sunday last, and of the ceremony of receiving the colours and other trophies captured at Ily and Mogadore. The review took place in the Cour des Tuileries. At twelve o'clock the troops had arrived on the ground assigned to them; the infantry in the Cour des Tuileries, and the cavalry and artillery in the Place de Carrousel. When they assembled the crop d'œil was very brilliant. The weather had been bad in the morning, but was comparatively fine during the review. The King arrived from St. Cloud at noon with the Queen, his Royal Highness the Duke de Nemours, who returned from Metz on Saturday, his Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier, and her Royal Highness Madame Adelaide. The King's carriage was followed by five others, in which were the ladies of honour of the Queen, and the King's aides-de-camp. The King alighted at the gate of the Tuileries, called the Pont-Fourmain, near the great axis, and was received by the Ministers. His Majesty immediately entered the tent of the son of the Emperor of Morocco, which had been put up over the great hall, and examined every part of it with much interest. The tent itself is not more than about forty feet in diameter, but it is surrounded by a circular enclosure, leaving a space between that and the tent. This enclosure reached nearly to the edge of the basin. At a little before one o'clock the King entered the court of the Tuileries on horseback, accompanied by the Duke de Nemours and de Montpensier, Duke Bernard of Saxe-Weimar, Marshal Soult, the Minister of Marine, Marshal Gerard, General Jacquemont, and a numerous staff. His Majesty's presence was hailed with loud acclamations. The Queen, Madame Adelaide, and the Count de Paris, were seated in the balcony of the Pavillon de Horloge. The windows of the palace were filled with ladies who had been admitted by tickets. The colours and the other trophies, including the famous parol, were placed under the eyes of the King, who contemplated them with an interest shared by all the spectators at this scene. They were carried by twenty-four non-commissioned officers who had been engaged in campaigns in Africa, and been decorated with the order of the Legion of Honour. After the presentation of the trophies his Majesty passed down the line of the troops, and was received with loud cries of "Vive le Roi!"

The colour-bearers and officers, and non-commissioned officers who, according to previous arrangements, were to receive the decoration of the Legion of Honour, then entered the Tuileries; the superior officers, officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the cavalry, were announced, as were also the colour-bearers. Those who were to be decorated were placed in a single line, in the order of the members of their respective regiments, with the colours and standards behind them, and the bands and drums of the 2nd Light Infantry and 2nd of the Line behind the colour-bearers. When the decorations had been conferred, the standards, and the musicians and drummers, remained in front of his Majesty. The colours taken in Morocco, presented by Marshal Soult and several general officers, were now carried between the ranks of the cavalry and infantry, the drums loudly beating and the trumpets playing. The non-commissioned officers who carried their colours then placed themselves at the right of the King, and Marshal Soult, advancing, said, "Sire, I present to your Majesty the colours taken at the battle of Ily by the French army, and at Mogadore by the Prince de Joinville. I entreat your Majesty to receive them, and to permit them to be placed in the name of the Chapels of the Invalides." The King replied, "I accept these colours in the name of France." The defiling of the various corps then commenced.

A procession was then formed, and the trophies were conveyed to the Invalides. At a quarter before four o'clock the procession arrived, and Lieutenant-General Petit received it at the head of his staff. At the command of General Sebastiani the detachment advanced towards General Petit and said:—

"General, I come in the name of the King, to place in your hands the trophies captured by our brave soldiers of the army of Africa, and by our intrepid seamen, at Tangier, Ily, and Mogadore." The General replied—"It is with a feeling of noble pride that I receive the flag which shall to us be a memorial of the most glorious events of our history; and I am proud to see that our young soldiers are worthy of their share of the great glory. Yes, France is the country of heroic legends, of great and sublime deeds. It is by a succession of glorious victories that it has acquired the first place in the history of nations, from Troy and Rome to Joppa, Wagwan, Constantine, Ily, and Mogadore; and she will ever preserve that position. Soldiers, those trophies which you carry with you shall be placed beside those of Austerlitz, of Jena, and of Friedland—that is, beside the most glorious trophies of the empire. Let these great recollections be ever present in your mind, and let them recall to your remembrance what France expects from your constancy and your valor—long live the King!"

This cry was unanimously repeated at several intervals. Thirty invalided non-commissioned officers then advanced towards the detachment which carried the colours, and received them from the latter. The religious ceremony of placing the colours then took place, and lasted half an hour. The general officers and their staffs were present the whole time.

The Prince de Joinville arrived in Paris on Tuesday. The Constitutionnel states that M. Guizot has been indisposed for some days with an affection of the larynx. We rejoice to learn, however, that his illness is not serious, and that it will not prevent him from accompanying the King of the French to England.

Count Charles Jacques Burebat, father of the Minister of the Interior, died on Monday, at his estate of Mirabeau, in the south of France, in the 93rd year of his age. Count Burebat had formed part of the Council of Five Hundred.

The Séance of the 27th ult. brings news from Algiers of the 24th. A grand review of the troops quartered in the city and its environs, and of the five battalions of the National Guard, took place on the 22d. Marshal Bugeaud had invited the principal chiefs of the neighbouring tribes, and of those who have lately made their submission, to be present at it, and all had accepted the invitation. But the review was scarcely over when the Marshal was informed that some of the tribes, availing themselves of the absence of their chiefs, had attacked Dillys, and massacred and plundered a number of persons belonging to a friendly tribe. The Marshal lost no time in adopting measures for the repression of this revolt, and on the same evening two steamers, laden with troops, sailed for Algiers. The next morning several companies of engineers and artillery, and everything necessary for an expedition, were embarked for the same point.

SPAIN.

We learn from Madrid, that official accounts have been published in that city of the re-establishment of peace between Spain and Morocco. The Madrid Gazette of the 25th ult. contains a royal decree, countersigned by the Minister of Finance, sanctioning the conversion of the Treasury Bonds, issued by virtue of the law of the 2nd of May, 1842, into shares of the consolidated debt, Three per Cent., at 12 per cent. It was supposed that Señor Mon intended to accept a project for a new contract which would supply him with funds to pay the interest of the Three per Cent. Stock during two years.

Some further arrests had taken place at Valencia, under the pretext of a connection with a conspiracy said to have been discovered in that province.

PORTUGAL.

Our letters from Lisbon of the 25th ult. intimate the approaching dissolution of the Cabinet Ministry, which was unable to stem the torrent of unpopularity excited by the late decrees. It is even stated that the Queen has been in treaty with Viscount da Silva Blandeira about the formation of a new administration, and that the result is a coalition cabinet, composed in equal proportions of Chartists and Moderate Septemberists.

The late storm has produced the most terrible effects at Saharal, in Beira. Rainstones, half a pound each in weight, fell in great quantities. Every roof in the town was destroyed, and every tree in the surrounding district, for a distance of two leagues, was shattered to pieces in a few minutes, and nothing but the bare trunks left. Every trace of garden and field vegetation was annihilated, the sheep, goats, and poultry killed, the windows, without exception, shattered, and the very window-frames broken. The inhabitants, driven from their roofless houses, have been obliged to construct huts in the adjacent fields. This in the midst of a burning summer, and in a climate which, although European, often presents tropical appearances. A storm of rain and wind accompanied the hail-stones, and fearful flashes of lightning added to the horror of the scene.

GERMANY.

King Otto opened the Legislative Session on the 26th ult., in a sensible and moderate speech, in which he spoke of the desire for a cordial union between the throne and the people. His Majesty also touched upon the necessity of economy, and stated that projects of law would be submitted, offering guarantees for the liberty of all. The King professed his love of his country, and said that to simplify the administration of the laws, and to modify them so as to put them in accordance with the state of the nation, would be one of the duties of the session.

The celebration of the anniversary of the revolution has passed off quietly.

THE UNITED STATES, CANADA, &c.

By the Hibernia, Captain Hyde, arrived at Liverpool, we have advice from New York to the 15th ult.; Boston, the 18th; and Halifax, to the 19th ult. The Great Western sailed from New York on the 14th ult. Though the dates brought by the Hibernia extend over a period of fourteen days, the papers do not possess an item of any interest. The papers are replete, to the exclusion of almost everything else, with long articles on the elections, which possess no interest for English readers.

Another very extraordinary railway achievement was effected on the outward arrival of the Hibernia. Her news was carried to Montreal, the capital of Canada, over the Pateburg Railway, at great speed, and the united result of sea and land performance is, that the distance from Liverpool to Montreal was accomplished in thirteen days three hours and a half.

In Canada, Sir Charles Metcalfe had fixed upon his new Cabinet, and had arrived in Montreal on the 2d ult. to swear the members in. The following are the names:—

President of the Council.—Mr. Viger. Solicitor General for L.C.—Mr. Chabot. Secretary.—Mr. Daly. Commissioner of Crown Lands.—Mr. D. B. Papineau. Attorney General for U. C.—Mr. Despar. Receiver General.—Mr. William Morris. Attorney General for L.C.—Mr. Smith. Inspector General.—Mr. Merritt. Solicitor General for U. C.—Mr. Sherwood.

Messrs. L. H. Lafontaine and A. N. Morin have resigned their commissions as Queen's counsel.

The weather in Lower Canada has, it appears, been most unfavourable for the crops, and a nigglardly harvest has been the consequence.

Further riots among the fire companies in Baltimore had taken place, and much damage done, though no lives, it is said, were lost. Slight disturbances had also taken place in Philadelphia.

Later dates had been received at New York from Hayti; hostilities had been resumed between the malcontents and the blacks, and another revolution seemed impending.

Accounts had been received from authentic sources in Galveston, Texas, giving a deplorable account of the ravages of fever in that city. It swept through some families, prostrating every member, the children and servants not excepting.

The Journal de Despatch states that letters from St. Juan Nicaragua give accounts of "an awful earthquake. The city of Nicaragua lies in ruins, only one house is to be seen. The churches and plantations in that quarter are also destroyed. No mention is made of any lives being lost." The visitation (says the Despatch) must have taken place some time in the end of June." The British blockade of the port of St. Juan is still continued.

The stock market in New York had a downward tendency. Good business was doing in cotton.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

By the Overland India Mail we have received letters and papers from Bombay to the 27th August, from Calcutta to the 15th August, and from China to the 31st of June. The chief point of interest in the news from Calcutta relating to the arrival of Sir Henry Hardinge, the new Governor-General, and the departure of Lord Ellenborough. Sir H. Hardinge reached Calcutta in the evening of the 23rd of July, and was immediately sworn into his high office. His first act was to constitute Mr. Bird as Governor of Bengal. On the next and subsequent days he held levees and durbars, and has thus far gained golden opinions from all parties, although there are some who appear to doubt his future proceedings, as being nearly connected with Lord Ellenborough. The latter noble lord embarked on the 1st of August on board the steamer Tennasserim, and immediately started for Suva.

The arrival in Bombay of Sir Henry Pottinger from China has been the signal of great rejoicings. He was welcomed with addresses, and with dinners, balls, &c. The Chamber of Commerce presented an address, to which his Excellency returned a most remarkable answer, in which the late proceedings and negotiations in China are reviewed.

Sir Henry Pottinger embarked at Bombay on the 27th of August, on his return to Europe.

The popularity of Sir Henry Hardinge with the military is likely to be increased, as it had been rumored in India, and it was said on good authority, that he was empowered to raise new regiments, to add one captain to each of the actual corps, and to re-introduce, the punishment of flogging into the native army. The last measure appears to be considered imperative by the generality of the officers, especially since the occurrence of the several mutinies which have lately disgraced the troops of Madras and Bengal.

The news from the Punjab represents that country as prey to anarchy and confusion, and the lowest intrigues of assassination and plunder by the chiefs. Hours brush does not appear to be fixed in his power, and expectation was about of the great commotions against the Sikhs, in the month of October, at the time of the great Handoo festival of the Dusserrah, when all the native states are in the practice of making war against their enemies.

Afghanistan has, of late, been considerably more tranquil than formerly; and the power of Dost Mahomed and his family begins to be established on a firm and substantial basis.

From Greater we learn that there has been a mutiny among the Jinnas troops against their chief, arising out of his tyrannical treatment of them. The uncle of the young Mahomed was expected to succeed to their command.

Our intelligence from Sindh extends from the 4th July to the 14th August. It is of a somewhat mixed complexion, but on the whole eminently satisfactory.

The succession to the throne of Holkar, at Indore, has been settled by the election to it of a son of Bhow Holkar, who had married a daughter of Hooroo Rao Holkar. The young Mahomed has assumed the name of Tookajee Holkar, and promises well. He is described as a manly boy, and has conciliated the good-will of the people.

A splendid farcical entertainment was given at Calcutta to Lord Ellenborough, at which that noble lord made a speech somewhat in contradiction with his address upon assuming the reins of government. Upon that occasion his lordship dwelt upon the delights of peace and the advantages of extending social and commercial intercourse. In his last speech, however, he complimented the army in strong terms, and intimates that the empire can alone be preserved by that force. Lord Ellenborough expressed his congratulations upon the appointment of Sir Henry Hardinge, and paid a high compliment to that gallant general.

There was no commercial news of interest. The Calcutta money market is said to be in an unusually quiet state, and capital is abundant, with considerable difficulty of employment in safe channels.

CHINA.

We have intelligence by her Majesty's steamer Driver, which came into port on the 29th July, from Victoria, the 21st June. Admiral Sir T. Cochrane had returned from the north on the 2nd June. The visit of the French frigate Albatros to Chusan and Shanghai had occasioned much excitement amongst the Chinese along the coast, so that it was considered eminently desirable that a strong naval force should be kept in the north for the protection of British life and property against the outbreaks of the mob. The American and French men-of-war Brandywine, St. Louis, Cleopatra, and Albatros, had arrived almost simultaneously in the Chinese waters.

The Friend of China gives a summary of China events up to the above date. The Imperial Commissioner Keying had taken a friendly leave of Sir Henry Pottinger, at the same time being introduced to Governor Davis, who being able to converse fluently in the commissioner's native language, at once gained his confidence.

ALEXANDRIA, Sept. 21.

The Geyser sailed hence early yesterday morning for Malta, having on board Lord Ellenborough. The Berenice, from Bombay, arrived at Sea on the 17th inst., with the mails and 25 passengers, amongst whom is Sir Henry Pottinger, who proceeds this day to England by the Great Liverpool.

Lieut.-Col. Powell, of the 1st Bombay European Regiment, Adjutant-General of the Bombay Army, died of dysentery, off Jeddah, on the 13th inst., on board of the Berenice. This officer, who was about 34 years of age, had just retired from service.

MALTA, Sept. 22.

The Great Liverpool, with mails from India, arrived this morning after one of the most rapid passages she has ever performed. She passed the Geyser steam-ship at eight a.m. on Monday, in lat. 34 35 N., long. 30 17 E. This vessel, with his Excellency Lord Ellenborough on board, has just moored in the great harbour.

THE AFFRAY AT TAHITI.

A letter from Tahiti, dated April 24, gives some interesting particulars of the affray between the French and the natives, of which but an imperfect account has hitherto appeared. The letter says:—

"The French war steamer Phaeton and the frigate Uranie, 64 guns, came to anchor in the harbour of Papeete, the former, having the greater part of the wounded on board, last night, and the latter this day, bringing intelligence of a desperate engagement between 800 marines, soldiers, and artillery, of the French forces in the Pacific, and about 1,000 Tahitians. Both parties suffered severely, but the Tahitians remained masters of the field of battle.

"About five o'clock on the morning of the 18th, the French commenced landing, protected by the guns of the steamer and the frigate; and as there was some difficulty in this, it was past ten o'clock before they were in motion for the attack, with a number of field-pieces, and led on by Governor Bruat in person. An individual of the name of Henry, a son of a missionary here, and who is indebted to the natives of the island entirely for his subsistence, pointed out to the French a path by which they could reach a hill which commanded part of the encampment; and although a strong party with muskets could do little damage by being in possession of this spot, yet when a few field-pieces were stationed there the havoc was great. When the main body of the French saw that this spot had been gained, and which the Tahitians neglected to defend, the attack commenced, and the slaughter. The struggle that ensued was dreadful, the Tahitians fighting man to man with their spears against the bayonets of the French soldiers (for not above one-half of the Tahitians had fire-arms). Their desperation and their mortal hatred of the French told volumes. Had they been armed with muskets, no Frenchman would have been left to tell the tale; however, as it is, their noble efforts to carry the day has earned for them a character for nobleness of purpose, and no want of resolution to carry it into effect. When the least opportunity offered, the thundering broadsides of the Uranie, and long guns of the steamer, never ceased to assist in the fierce conflict.

"The French have suffered severely, at the very lowest, 100 men; while on the other side it is almost impossible to ascertain their loss, but as they only acted on the defensive throughout, it may reasonably be presumed that the loss on both sides is about equal.

"Offers of peace have been prepared by Governor Bruat to the Tahitians. The answer sent back was characteristic of the Tahitians—"Before any propositions would be considered, the French governor must restore the life of their murdered countrymen." Numbers of natives who have been living here, and been quite passive heretofore, and those who have been bribed by the French, have gone up to the scene of the late action to search for their relatives who may have been killed, with the laudable intention of giving to their bodies at the least a decent interment. These, too, are now loud in their execrations of the French.

"Poor Pomare, the Queen of Tahiti, remains on board the Basilik English man-of-war. In her letter to Admiral Thomas she says, 'I and my people have sworn before God that no power but England shall govern Tahiti while we live.'

"If France clings to Tahiti, nothing less than ten thousand lives will be the price of it, as it may be supposed that all the inhabitants of the Leeward Islands have one feeling in common with those of Tahiti—detestation of the French; and now late events have increased it tenfold."

According to an account a day later, viz., April 25, the Tahitians only pretended to retreat. It was merely a manoeuvre on the part of the natives to draw their enemies further into their power; and with regard to the natives having suffered such severe loss, it turns out that they have not lost above 80 men; while the loss on the part of the French is allowed to be at the very least 100. In fact, from the nature of the ground, the strong defence of the encampment, and their determined opposition, it could not have turned out otherwise. When the Tahitians retired they expected the enemy to pursue, instead of which they threw a little sand over the bodies of their unfortunate companions, piled up the bodies of their enemies, and in great haste made the best of their way to their ships. Many who were mortally wounded they took with them, but before they had reached the vessel these were no more.

COUNTRY NEWS.

GOODRICH COURT, HAREFORDSHIRE, containing, perhaps, the most unique collection of armory in the kingdom, was lately honoured by a visit from their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Cambridge, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, their Graces the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, Lady Augusta Somerset and the Baron Nicolson. They were shown through the magnificent apartments by Sir Samuel Rush Meyrick, the proprietor of this superb collection, and they seemed to be highly pleased with the spectacle.

THE WALLINGTON STATUE.—We understand the statue in honour of the illustrious warrior, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, will be erected in front of the Royal Exchange, Glasgow, next week.

ANOTHER GREAT WILL CAUSE.—The Consolatory Court of Exeter has for some time been occupied with a will cause, Bellaw v. Bellaw, in which a great amount of property is involved. The Chancellor Master has now given his decision in the case. He stated that though there were grounds of suspicion attaching to the conduct of the promoter of the suit, sufficient evidence had not been adduced to prove that the testatrix was not in a condition to make a will, nor was there anything in the will to show that it did not express the probative intentions of the testatrix. He should, therefore, admit the will to probate, but, considering the near relationship of the parties, he should not pronounce for costs.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A CLERGYMAN.—Last Saturday night an inquest was held at the Bedford Hotel, Brighton, on the body of the Rev. Thomas Robinson Welch. Deceased was brother-in-law of the late Dr. Scantleworth, Bishop of Chichester, and was chancellor of the diocese of Chichester. He was likewise curate of Sturwath, Sussex, where he generally resided, but he had been staying with his wife at 4, Cavendish-place, Brighton. He left home at half-past nine o'clock on the previous evening, for the purpose of taking a walk. The first witness called was Mr. Frederick Power Phillips, M.A., of Christ Church, Oxford, who deposed that about half-past ten o'clock on Friday evening he was walking down the Parade, when he saw the deceased, who was an entire stranger, walking towards them. When within a few paces of meeting, deceased fell on the crossing. Witnesses raised him up, and judging that he was in a fit, carried him to the nearest chemist's, Mr. Pain, St. James's-street, and sent a policeman for a surgeon. Deceased died in a few minutes. Mr. Wilson, surgeon, deposed to finding deceased at Mr. Pain's shop, insensible. Witnesses attempted to administer a reviving draught, but deceased could not swallow it. Deceased died in half a minute, after two convulsive gasps, as witness judged, of spasmodic affection of the heart. The jury returned a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."

A MAN KILLED BY A BULL.—A man, named Daniel Jones, a tenant of Mr. William Thomas, draper, Chichester, was tossed by a two-year-old bull, on a farm in Lissadown parish, on Wednesday. The animal threw him high into the air, and, as he fell, caught him on his horns, and again threw him. His death almost immediately ensued. The verdict returned by the coroner's jury was that the effect that Daniel Jones had met with his death, but how did not appear in evidence.

BURNING OF A STEAM-BOILER AT SALFORD.—An alarming explosion took place at Islington-mill, Salford, on Wednesday morning, which resulted in blowing up a portion of the building, killing one man, and wounding two or three others. It was usual to slacken the fire under the boilers at night, and leave the fires in the care of the watchmen, whose duty it was, at about half-past four clock each morning to "beat the dew," and raise the steam, so that the machinery might be set in motion at six o'clock when the workpeople arrived. The party whose duty it was to do this work was James Atkins, the watchman, and it is supposed that at the time the explosion took place he was raising up the fire under the boiler in question. The people in the mill were completely unalarmed. Bricks, mortar, and broken pieces of beams were flying about in all directions. One large piece of timber was blown upon the top of the factory, which is seven stories high; the distance being upwards of forty yards from the seat of the explosion, while stone and bricks were blown into the streets at a distance of two hundred yards. The watchman, Atkins, was found amidst some rubbish, with his left leg broken, and his face frightfully disfigured. He was alive, but insensible, and was taken to the Manchester Infirmary, but died on his way there. Michael Tynan, the fireman, and a man named Tipping, who were also near the spot at the time, were found slightly injured.

FIVE PERSONS DROWNED AT PLYMOUTH.—On Monday evening, as a party of five persons, consisting of Mr. Fowler, cabinet-maker, Plymouth, his wife, Mr. Knowles, Mrs. Morgan, and Miss Ryder, were returning from Cawsand in a small boat, they kept in too close on the land, off Mount Edgemoor, when the boat got on a rock, was capsized, and all who were on board drowned. It was a dead calm, and the accident was seen from the Huntsman Cottage at Mount Edgemoor, but no assistance could be rendered in time. Three of the bodies were picked up the next night, and the other two on the following morning. They left Plymouth with the intention of going on board the Queen to visit a friend, but there being no admission on board that ship the unfortunate party proceeded to Cawsand. They had no waterman with them, and must have been inexperienced in the track which boats ought to take.

POLICE.

A MELANCHOLY STORY.—Amongst the charges brought before Mr. Henry, at Lambeth-street on Monday, was one against a middle-aged female named Margaret Bealey, for stealing a piece of linen of the value of 14s., from the shop window of Mr. James Jenkins, a chemist, in the Mile End-road. The complainant, Mr. Jenkins, stated that about half-past ten o'clock on Saturday night, the prisoner came up to his shop window and took a piece of linen which was exhibited for sale, and walked leisurely away with it. Witness followed, and upon coming up with her asked her for the piece of linen she had taken, but she refused to give it up, and requested she might, in fact invited, that she should be given into custody, and a policeman coming up at the time, he gave her in charge. At the station-house she persisted in keeping the linen and being detained on the charge. The accused, from whose address and manner it was evident she had been better days, declared she had committed the act in order to secure a shelter for the night. She said, she said, been turned out of the workhouse of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, about one o'clock on the Saturday, without a single farthing in her possession, and after wandering about, she scarcely knew where, and being without the means of procuring a morsel of bread or a shelter for the night, she had, in a moment of despair, determined to commit some act for which she might be taken into custody.—Mr. Jenkins here said he was perfectly convinced the article had not been taken with a felonious intention; and it was not, as he had before stated, his intention to give the accused into custody, but he had requested him to do so and kept the linen. He begged at once to withdraw the charge, and requested that the piece of linen might be given to the poor woman for her use.—Mr. Henry was of opinion that the taking was not felonious, and desired the accused to come out of the felon's bar. She did so, and, in reply to the questions of the magistrates stated, that when a girl she had been taken to Rome by a lady named Foster, who sent her to school there, and also apprenticed her to the dress-making. While there, besides learning her trade, she had acquired a knowledge of the French and Italian languages, and also perfected herself in all matters to qualify her for the situation of lady's maid. She subsequently returned to England, and by advertisements procured the appointment of companion to families going abroad. Amongst these whom she had lived with and attended, were Mrs. Hume and Mrs. Chalmers (Irish ladies), closely connected with the Fitzwilliam family. She subsequently lived in the family of Lady Palmerston, in Piccadilly, for five years, and also in the service of Miss Baker, in Park-lane, for two years, both these places being in the parish of St. George's, Hanover-square. Nearly three weeks ago she actually went four days and four nights without a morsel of food of any kind, and during the time had frequently entreated the police to take her up, but all refused, saying that she was neither drunk nor mad, and told her she must make application to the workhouse. She at length actually dropped in the street from exhaustion, and was carried from the place where she lay, in Mount-street, Grosvenor-square, to the workhouse of St. George's. There she was confined for a fortnight in the sick ward. On Friday last the parish doctor pronounced her to be sufficiently recovered to leave the sick ward, and on the same day a young lady, who she understood to be the daughter of the matron, came to her, and said she might go to the needle-room or leave the house altogether; and she replied that she would go to the needle-room, as she certainly had not sufficient strength to leave the house, and that she was without the slightest means of supporting herself. She accordingly went to the needle-room, as it was called, and on the following day was sent for to appear before the matron, and, on entering her apartment, she (the matron) asked if she was the person who had been brought into the house in such a distressed state? She replied she was the same; upon which the matron observed that she had been discharged by the doctor, and therefore she must go out of the house. She replied that she was really not in a fit state to be discharged, for that she was still very weak; and another thing, she had not a place to go to, or the means of procuring food or lodging, and hoped, therefore, she might be allowed to remain in the house a few days longer. The matron replied that she must not, and the wardens at the time moved her on to the porter's hall. She complied to the porter of the state she was in, and he took her to the office of the matron, next door. An informed that officer of the circumstances of her case, and begged he would either permit her to remain in the workhouse, or pass her to the settlement of her late husband in Rutlandshire. His reply was, that he thought the parish and done very well for her, in keeping her for a fortnight. "I cried bitterly," said the poor woman, "and begged he would take my distressing case into his kind consideration, upon which he told me to sit down, and on my doing so, he sent for the porter, and reprimanded him for bringing such a case before him. The porter then took me out, and I left the house about one o'clock. I was then recommended to go before a magistrate, and made my way to Marlborough-street Police-court, but was told there that the magistrate was investigating a case which was likely to last for some time, and that I had better go to the parish officers. I left the place, and returned about in a state of bewilderment, I scarcely knew where, until about half-past ten at night, when I formed the resolution of getting out of the street, and to the shelter of the station-house, and with that object in view, I took the piece of linen, as has been described." The magistrate, after some sensible remarks upon the anomalies and hardships of the Poor Law Bill, said he should make inquiry into the case, and in the meantime directed that a comfortable lodging should be procured for the poor woman.—(After all the boasted purity of our laws, and the alleged independence of all classes in England, it seems "passing strange" that the street passport to shelter and protection should be the commission of crime. It is really disgraceful that workhouses should be closed to the distressed, and that the plea of poverty should being down a reprimand from the very menials of such establishments. One may almost wonder that offenders are not more numerous, when it is proved that it is absolutely necessary to commit a crime before misery can be relieved.)

CAUTION TO WINDOW SMASHERS.—A woman, named Maria King, who frequently has amused herself by breaking windows, was brought up on a charge of a similar kind. She flitted into the bar and smiled upon Sir Peter Laurie, and it was quite evident that she expected merely a few days exemption from the trouble of supporting herself. Sir Peter Laurie: Pray, why did you do this mischief?—Prisoner (smiling): I'm sure I can't say.—Sir Peter Laurie: Well, you must go to prison for fourteen days.—Prisoner: Very well sir, I shall go (tossing her head).—Sir Peter Laurie: I wish it to be known, that in all cases of this description I consider it necessary to order that the smallest amount of diet, consistent with the preservation of life, should be administered. (Great laughter).—Prisoner: What do you mean by that, eh?—Sir Peter Laurie: I mean that you shan't get fat by breaking windows, that's all. (Laughter). The prisoner, who was thunderstruck at the idea of the abridgment of the comforts of her usual place of retirement, moved off in the custody of the policeman, sorrowful if not repentant.

THE POISONING CASE.—Alfred Edwards, the young man charged with having administered poison to a young woman named Jane Gregory, which caused her death, and against whom a verdict of "Wilful Murder" had been returned at the coroner's inquest, was placed at the bar at Worship-street, before Mr. Brogden, on Wednesday, for final examination on the charge, and fully committed.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON WESTMINSTER-BRIDGE.—On Monday afternoon the following shocking accident, attended with loss of life, occurred on Westminster-bridge:—A young woman named Sarah Brett, the wife of a sawyer, residing near the old church, Woolwich, was crossing the bridge on the right hand side from the Westminster side, when she slipped or was pushed from off the foot-way into the carriage road by a crowd of persons passing at the instant, and reeling against the side of a loaded hay-cart coming in an opposite direction, fell underneath the off wheel, which passed over her head. So large a quantity of blood instantly gushed from her mouth that the front part of her dress was completely saturated with it. She was directly carried to Westminster Hospital, where Mr. Paine, the house-surgeon, attempted to bleed her in the neck, but life was extinct. She had only left Westminster Hospital about half an hour before the accident occurred, having come up to town with a female acquaintance to see a relative, a patient. She was slightly in Squire at the time. The driver was taken into custody.

A CHILD KILLED BY FLY POISON.—Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest on Wednesday, at the Spanish Bazaar, White Conduit-street, Clerkenwell, on the body of Joseph Coleman, aged three years and nine months, the child of Mr. Coleman, baker, Mount-row. Last Saturday Mrs. Coleman laid upon a table in the parlour, while she went to serve a customer, a small quantity of fly poison, which she had just purchased. During the mother's temporary absence the deceased returned from school, and drank two table-spoons-full of the poison, which had a scabious flavour. As soon as the mother perceived it she called in medical help, but all was in vain, and the child died in great agony at half-past 12 o'clock the following day. Mr. James Pitt Dow, surgeon, attended the deceased, and was of opinion that the poison was coracina fideles, which was of a very deadly character. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

LOSS OF LIFE BY FIRE.—On Tuesday morning, about half-past eight o'clock, Ann Morris, between ten and eleven years of age, the daughter of respectable parents living at No. 3, York-terrace, Westminster-road, expired at Westminster Hospital, having on the previous evening been shorteningly burnt and scorched by her clothes accidentally catching in flames while she was lighting a fire, at her parents' residence.

MYSTERIOUS CASE OF DROWNING IN THE RIVER LEA.—An inquest was held by Mr. Baker, on Tuesday at the Jelly Anglers, Lea Bridge, touching the death of Miss Ann Beyer, aged 20 years, who was drowned in the river Lea on the previous Thursday. The deceased, it appeared, had been thrown from a boat, rowed by a Mr. Newman. The facts will be gathered from the evidence given by that gentleman himself. He deposed that the evening in question, on his return from Tottenham-mills, he was coming down by the right bank, when three men in a boat came along, two of whom were rowing and one steering, and when nearly abreast of him he called out to them to starboard their helm, but instead of doing so it was put about, by which they pulled right into the bow of his boat; he turned round towards them, and at that moment his boat gave a heavy lurch, and the deceased fell out of the boat. He (Mr. Newman) directly jumped in after her, and caught hold of her with his left hand while he swam with his right. Deceased then caught hold of his right arm, which supported him, and he was compelled to let her go and take hold of her with his right arm, and in so doing the water beneath the surface of the water. He fired after her, and again caught her by her left arm, and swimming towards the boat, which was then nearly half filled with water, he got hold of her arm, and held on by his right, but with the whole of deceased's weight and his own the boat turned right over, bottom upwards. Deceased again slipped from his grasp, and he again dived down several feet and caught her a third time, and in rising struck against the boat, when he again lost his hold of her, but how it was he could not tell. He clung to the boat, and just recollected that some persons came and picked him up, but what was said or done afterwards he did not recollect. The inquiry was adjourned.

LOSS OF A VESSEL, WITH ALL HANDS, OFF YARMOUTH.—A melancholy shipwreck occurred on Sunday afternoon off Yarmouth, about six miles distant from the land. A large foreign schooner, with a white hull painted on her bows, was suddenly seen to capsize in a gale of wind and disappear, about a mile outside of the Cross Sands. She had signals of distress flying, and was apparently running for the land when the catastrophe happened, and it is feared that every soul on board met with a watery grave. There were several colliers passing through the roads at the time, and the masters bore down to the spot where the vessel had gone down, in the hopes of picking up some of the unfortunate crew, but none were to be seen.

GRAT NUMBER OF SUDDEN DEATHS.—On Wednesday, Mr. Wakley held four inquests on persons who had died suddenly. The first was at the Calthorpe Arms, Gray's Inn-road, on the body of Mrs. Martha Smith, of Gough-street, who was found dead in her bed on Saturday morning. The second was held at the Windsor Castle, Windsor-street, Islington, on the body of Henry Williams, a child, also found dead in bed. The third and fourth inquests were at the Green Man, Ball's-pond; the first of them being on the body of Mr. J. J. Davis, aged 31, a manufacturing chemist, of Mott's-lane. He was out and well, in a gig with a friend, on Friday, and intended to take a second drive in the afternoon. The friend called on him for that purpose, and found him applying leeches for pain in the chest. The leeches were taken off, he complained of faintness, and was laid on a couch, when suddenly exclaiming to his wife, "Oh, my God," he turned on his face and died instantaneously. The other inquest was on the body of Mr. W. P. Colleson, aged 41, paper-stainer, of 178, Goswell-street. On Sunday afternoon, after walking along the Newriver, in the above vicinity, with his wife, he left her at a friend's, and entered the parlour in which the jury were assembled. He called for some brandy and water, sipped it, and after joking a little got up to light a cigar. Whilst doing so he fell back in his chair, and in five minutes was a corpse. Verdict in each case, "Natural death."

—On Wednesday morning about two o'clock, the wife of an elderly person, named Richard, residing in Queen-street, Edgeware-road, was awake by a noise as if her husband were struggling for breath. She gave an alarm, and Dr. R. E. Haseman, of Crawford-street, Bryanston-square, was promptly in attendance, but before his arrival Mr. Richard had expired.

ENGLISH REPORTERS AT FAULT.—Among the many ridiculous blunders committed by the reporters for the London Press at Blair, with reference to the names and localities of that historic town "terra incognita," none is more absurd than the anecdote which represents her Majesty looking on as a "sheep-shearer in September." The black-faced breed are unquestionably a hardy race, but we question their ability to lose their flocks so near the end of autumn. We presume their informant had spoken simply of sheeps, which is the Scotch term for sheep; but the former being exclusively used in the south country as applied to sheep, the mistake had thus arisen. To complete the absurdity, and also to expose the system, a paper of last week actually contains an engraving representing her Majesty and Prince Albert overlooking a body of sheep-shearsmen, and the latter patting a terrier—all agreeable to the newspaper paragraph.—Perth Courier, Sept. 26.—[We quote the above as it exposes attempts to impose on the public, made by certain imitators of our Journal. We have uniformly set our faces against this system, and have never spared expense in sending the best artists to sketch the events on the spot of their occurrence.]

THE FINE ARTS DISTRIBUTIONS.—The list of prizes drawn at the distributions at Covent Garden Theatre, and at the Freemasons' Tavern, has just been issued. At Mr. Boy's distribution the number of tickets drawn, as per prospectus, was 3,750; in addition there were 3,603 added, making a total of 7,353. The amount of prizes drawn, as per prospectus (328 in number), was £24,316. In addition Mr. Boy's added 203, value £4,296; making a total of £28,612. Amongst the works drawn were the "Trial of Charles the First," value 100 guineas, and several at the value of 100 guineas. In the other lists were several of the "Duke of Wellington," "Sir Robert Peel," the "Cannery Pilgrims," "Bolton Abbey," and various folios of engravings. At the Boyer distribution several valuable prizes were also drawn, but the particular ones have not been detailed in the list.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The works at the Royal Exchange are being prosecuted with increased activity, and generally to a much later hour of the evening than previously, in order to be ready for her Majesty's reception. Some of the citizens have been indulging the hope that Louis Philippe may be present at the ceremony of the opening.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Reporter.)

On Tuesday, the 26th of September, the hundred and fifty-first annual meeting of the three churches of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester, for the benefit of the Widows and Orphans' Fund of the clergy connected with the three dioceses was commenced in the antique Cathedral of Gloucester, and continued daily until Friday evening.

Considerable opposition was raised to the continuance of the practice of holding these annual festivals, by the Rev. F. A. Close, of Cheltenham, who used every possible effort, both in and out of the pulpit, to cry down the ancient practice. Dr. Evans, however, the head master of the College School, one of the stewards to the Festival, published a reply to the objections of Mr. Close, and the result of his powerful arguments in favour of the performance of sacred music in ecclesiastical edifices was, that the practice is justifiable and praiseworthy. The proceedings were throughout, if we may judge from the numbers present, and the amount collected in behalf of the charity, superior to any which have preceded them in this city upon any former occasion.

The performance opened with full cathedral service. The whole of the spacious nave of the western part of this noble edifice was filled up with great care and order. Immediately in front of the organ were fixed the seats for the orchestral performers, three hundred in number, amongst whom were Madame Caroline Allan, Miss A. A. Howe, the Misses Williams, with Messrs. Hobbs, Machin, Mayers, Novello, and Weiss. A new desideratum for public fame was introduced upon this occasion, a young lady of the name of Barrett, native of Gloucester, who is the daughter of a gentleman of the city, once celebrated for his fine voice and extensive musical attainments. The youthful aspirant is of the most prepossessing appearance; she possesses a voice of first-rate character, its quality and compass being equally fine, and she sang with great taste and feeling. Our great recommendation of this festival, which we must not omit before we proceed to detail the four days' performance, was its truly English character.

On the morning of the first day, "Euthra" was performed; this was followed by the "Te Deum," composed, as our readers are aware, in celebration of the victory achieved at Bttingen; both by Handel, the giant of musical song. Boyer's anthem, "Blessed is He," and the inimitable duet, "Here shall soft Charity repair," were also most effectively sung. The sermon was then preached by the Rev. F. T. J. Bayly, from the 13th verse of the 5th chapter of Second Book of Chronicles. It was an able exposition of the divine origin of sacred music; of the recognition of it by the Church, both in the Prophetic, Jewish, and subsequent ages of the Church; and of its value in the present day, in exciting devotional feelings, and aiding the devotion of the true Christian. This was followed by a most eloquent appeal in behalf of the institution. The service was closed by the performance of Handel's Grand Coronation Anthem, given in the best style of the well-trained orchestra, listened to in profound silence by upwards of 1500 persons congregated upon the occasion. The amount collected at the doors, exclusively for the benefit of the charity, amounted to £169 18s. 4d.—upwards of £200 more than upon the first morning's meeting at Gloucester.

At the concert in the evening, held at the Shire Hall, and but thinly attended, "Ada and Galaba" formed the principal attraction. Mrs. Barrett made her first appearance in "Where the old oaks stand," written by Dr. Arne. She was most favourably received; and her correct intonation, sweet voice, and engaging style, gained her great applause. A select ball concluded the entertainment of the day.

On Wednesday, Handel's magnificent oratorio, "Samson," was introduced. The works selected are chiefly from the "Sacred Agony" of Milton, arranged by Professor Taylor, and selected as at the late Norwich Festival.

The following was the order of the parts and performers:—

Soprano . . . . .	Mr. Hobbs	Messa . . . . .	Miss M. H. Howe
Alto . . . . .	Mr. Weiss	Israelitish Women . . . . .	Madame C. Allan
Tenor . . . . .	Mr. Machin	Pharisee Women . . . . .	Miss A. Williams
Bass . . . . .	Mr. A. Novello		Miss E. Williams

Novello, in the opening recitative, was rather flat. Miss A. Williams sang the song "Ye men of Gaza" with much power of expression, and dignity of style. Hobbs poured forth the moving tones of Samson (blind and imprisoned as he is then represented to have been) with much natural feeling. His soliloquy "Without the walls of Gaza" was beautifully true. Miss Howe's song, "In God your father trust," was strikingly charming, and the chorus which followed was magnificent. In the hymn "Jehovah reigns," by voices only, the whole fell full half a note, and the manner in which it "dragged its slow length along," was truly miserable. Weiss sang nobly, and Machin and Hobbs decidedly maintained the reputation they have enjoyed for years. With reference to the band, the names of Cramer, Lindley, Harper, Card, and other leaders, aided by a well-drilled corps of musicians, guaranteed that all would be right in the instrumental department. In the middle of the third act the "Dead March in Saul" was splendidly given; and the song "Let the bright Seraphim," by Madame C. Allan, followed by the chorus it opens, left us nothing to desire. The whole lasted nearly two hours, and at the door £131 9s. 3d. was collected.

In the evening, at the miscellaneous concert at the Shire-hall, the Sinfonia ("Jupiter") by Mozart, was well performed. A variety of pieces, admirably chosen, by Mozart, Calcott, Bishop, Benedict, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Donizetti, and other eminent composers, were sung. The whole went off admirably.

On Thursday the attendance was more numerous than on either of the preceding days, nearly every seat being occupied. Haydn's "Creation," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Handel's "Israel in Egypt," were severally given, in an equal style to that of the former day. In the evening the concert room was well filled, and several favourite songs were sung and received.

FRIDAY.

This morning Handel's oratorio of the "Messiah" was performed. The extreme beauty of the day, combined with the great attraction of this sublime oratorio, the chief source of all Handel's magnificent compositions, everywhere commands, invited to the Cathedral a multitude of auditors. Gariages, filled with the youth and beauty of this interesting locality, and with veteran souls deep in love with rich English harmony, drew up to the Cathedral doors, without intermission, from ten o'clock until past eleven—the hour of commencement. Thousands of anxious spectators crowded the green of the College, and the bells of the lofty tower pealed joyously upon the occasion.

The whole space allotted to the listeners was crowded. From the massive Norman pillars which support the roof of the nave to the magnificent western window, where a most commodious gallery, capable of holding upwards of 500 persons, was erected, the seats were filled, the majority of the audience being ladies. Never before, in our recollection, did the splendid composition go off so well. Caroline Allan, Miss Howe, Machin, Mayers, and Weiss, did their utmost; and Miss Barrett, in "That thou dost not leave," proved her capability of tone, compass, and expression, equal to the most sublime expectations of her friends. The "Hallelujah Chorus," justly styled the masterpiece of Handel, was given by the "full-voiced choir" with judgment and power seldom equalled; and the concluding double chorus left us nothing to desire. The whole performance was well executed, and it is a pleasure to state that the proceeds of the collection at the doors this day exceeded any amount hitherto realized in this city. The sum collected amounted to £174 16s. 10d.

The arrangements made by the stewards were admirable throughout; every facility being afforded to parties visiting the Cathedral by an early opening of the doors, and so pains being spared towards the success of the festival.

Our engraving represents the Cathedral, as it appeared on Friday morning, during the performance of Handel's "Messiah," and a more impressive scene can hardly be imagined. The subject, and the manner of the performance, the profound silence of the audience when listening to the solo songs, and the reverential rising of the whole mass as one person when the choral band sent forth its strength in praise of their God, created impressions which to be felt must have been witnessed.

In the foreground, to the right and left, are seen the massive Anglo-Norman pillars of the original Cathedral, constructed in the beginning of the twelfth century; while the roof, originally of wood, is an insertion of the early English style. In the distance, beyond the organ, is seen the tracery of the most gorgeous show in England, terminated towards the east by the largest window in Europe. The contrast of the uniform flood of light thrown through the clerestories into this part of the Cathedral, with the alternations of light and shade caused by the narrow slits of the nave lights, added greatly to the singularity and beauty of the sacred spectacle.

The celebration of the present festival is the 121st meeting of the choral Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford; and although, in magnitude, these ancient music meetings cannot rival the great musical gatherings of Birmingham, Manchester, &c., yet the place of their celebration, and the long associations connected with them, give them in interest and an effort to be looked far in vain in festivals of more recent growth. At first, about 160 years ago, the performances were confined to the instrumental and vocal efforts of the "three choirs," situated by amateurs in the divine art; until, in the years 1723 or 1724, the attendance of the auditory became so great, in consequence of the growing excellence of the music, that measures were taken for an increase of the band by the hire of eminent professional performers; and, at the same time, on the recommendation of the celebrated Dr. Beane, author of the "Beauty of Holiness," collections were made at the Cathedral doors for the benefit of the widows and orphans of clergymen. This has continued to the present day; in fact, the original intention of the meetings, which was the encouragement and improvement of sacred music, is quite forgotten in the charitable purpose to which these festivals have applied. It is impossible in our space to give a detailed history of the origin and progressive increase of these interesting meetings, but we can hardly be said to exaggerate the benefits they have rendered on sacred musical science, when we state that indirectly we owe to them the "Messiah" of Handel, and the "Creation" of Haydn, allowed to be each in its style a masterpiece of sacred harmony. Perhaps the Cathedral never presented a more glorious spectacle than when it was fitted up for this last splendid and holy occasion.

Oh! it was good to see and hear
(For eyes were charm'd as well as ear)
The young—the fair—the minstrel throng,
The old, the reverend combin'd;
In one great festival of song,
Devoted to th' Eternal mind,
Which teaches us through sweet harmony,
That best of virtues CHARITY.

In the Gloucestershire Chronicle, we find the following summary of the proceedings:—

The following is a comparative statement of the collections for the charity during the present week, and in 1841:—

ANTI-RENT INSURRECTION IN ALHANY.—OUTRAGE ON THE SHERIFF.

The Heidelberg Mountains have lately been the scene of an anti-rent insurrection against the Van Rensselaer family and the legal authorities. The most outrageous portion of these proceedings is, however, a most brutal attack on the Sheriff of the county, on the 31st of August last.

It appears that on the previous day the Sheriff, Mr. Batterman, with three assistants, proceeded to the disaffected district, in a double waggon, for the purpose of advertising some sales of property under execution in the town of Hern. They proceeded without molestation till they reached the house of a Mr. Van Deusen, on the top of the Heidelberg, where the Sheriff stopped to scree a declaration, but was ordered off the premises by Van Deusen's three sons, two of whom mounted horses in their working dresses, which were only shirts and pantaloons, and with horns in their hands followed the Sheriff's waggon. The excitement now spread; horns were heard blowing in every direction, while at almost every house the women and girls enlisted the road by singing the postil-cottan effusion generally known as the "Adventures of Big Bill Snyder." At length the Sheriff and his assistants, followed by a vast crowd, reached Rensselaerville, where they resolved to stop all night, when a committee waited on them and requested them to leave the village, as threats had been made that if the party were allowed to stop or harboured in the village, it would be burnt to the ground. The Sheriff, however, remained there for the night, but got very little sleep, as horses were kept running on the road, there was loud howling and horns were blown and stones were thrown during the entire night. In the morning, when the party woke, they found the yard and shed full of horses, and one of the barns full of men, who had stopped to watch if the Sheriff did not go off during the night.

Nevertheless, the Sheriff and his party proceeded on his road next morning, until they reached a point where the Indians were drawn up in double ranks across the road to the number of sixty-three, each armed with either a rifle or a musket, and two horse pistols with brass barrels about fourteen inches long, and all apparently of the same pattern; some of them had knives. The waggon was then stopped, and the Sheriff having got out, touched the ground, sprang for the horses' heads, putting his hand in his pocket to pull out his pistol, but about fifteen of these desperadoes laid hold of him, and after a short struggle flung him to the ground, and horses and waggons being backed to the fence, and nearly upset, the harness taken to pieces, and the horses set loose, and guns fired at them.

The waggons, the assistants were seized, and put under strict guard; and the Sheriff himself was held down in a ditch, and pistols were pointed at his head, and he was threatened with a shot, unless he took up his pistols, to which he replied, "I have no more; I have given up my arms." The Indians then proceeded to fire and further the Sheriff, but without making any impression on the invulnerable temper of the Sheriff, who, on being asked by an Indian, who was holding a pistol at his head, what he would do to him if he was in his place, replied, "Shoot you, as quick as I would a black snake."

At length, the three waggons, having submitted to the orders of the Indians, by jumping up three times, and hallooing "Down with the Rent," lifted the Sheriff into the waggon, harnessed the horses, and conveyed him to Albany.

The Deputy-Sheriff has also been similarly assaulted: a body of men in disguise, and armed with knives, tomahawks, and fire-arms, came to his dwelling-house in the night—demanded his official papers, compelled him to surrender them, and then publicly burnt them in the village of Nessau. On another occasion, about eighty men in disguise, and armed, violently entered the Deputy-Sheriff's house, assaulted him, forced him from his house in the presence of his family, and tarred and feathered him.

The Sheriff was, however, still determined to maintain his authority, and for that purpose had summoned a civil posse of 1000 men to attend him in a second expedition to the Heilderberg. On the other hand the farmers in that region are regularly drilled at stated times, to the number of many hundreds. The whole district is organized against the payment of rent, and are determined to fight to the last. Patrols of men, disguised as Indians, scour the mountains and valleys, and every road and pass are guarded. It is believed that the Governor's proclamation will have no effect. The insurrectionary spirit of these mountaineers is stimulated by the journals which circulate among them, and encourage them in resistance to the payment of rent and the execution of the laws.

Two new weekly papers have been recently established which support their views. What the end of this insurrection may be no one can tell. Most likely blood will flow before all is over.

We have just received the sketch for the annexed illustration, with the accompanying details, from our artist at New York, who adds that "the circumstance of a magistrate daring to do his duty in defiance of danger, and even of death, is, in this country, a startling novelty."

DEATH OF THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

The life of George Henry Fitzroy, fourth Duke of Grafton, terminated on Saturday evening last at Euston-hall, in Suffolk. For some years past he had lived in comparative retirement, and for a great many years had ceased to take any active part in public affairs. He was the eldest son of Augustus Henry, the third Duke of Grafton, the nobleman on whom Junius poured the vials of his wrath. The late Duke was born on the 14th of January, 1766, the last year of the reign of George III.: his Grace, therefore, may just be said to have lived to be the subject of five successive monarchs, and quitted this world in the 83rd year of his age. The father of the Duke was in his day Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; and his heir, the young Earl of Euston, whose life and character now engage our attention, entered Trinity College at the above celebrated seat of learning. Here his lordship was the friend of the celebrated William Pitt at college; for a long time his warm partisan in the House of Commons; and for many years his colleague as the representative in parliament of their common alma mater. The year 1784 is, in the biography of Lord Euston, rendered remarkable by two important events—namely, his entrance upon the career of married life, and the commencement of his career in the duties of a legislator and the business of a politician. He engaged in the latter at a time when party struggles were marked by circumstances of no ordinary interest. Lord John Townshend and Mr. Mansfield—afterwards Chief Justice—had represented the University for many years; but Mr. Fox's memorable India Bill proved fatal to their interests at Cambridge, for several of their constituents greatly disapproved of the measure. Mr. Pitt and Lord Euston were not the men to let such an opportunity escape them. At the general election in 1784, they offered themselves to the University. Against such opponents, the Mansfield and Townshend interest could not bear up, and the result of the contest was as follows:—The Right Hon. William Pitt, 361; the Earl of Euston, 299; Lord John Townshend, 279; James Mansfield, Esq., 181. It is, therefore, 60 years since the deceased duke took his seat for the first time as a member of the House of Commons. Men born to dual dignity and princely revenues are found, at least, as frequently as others, to be deficient in the intellectual aptitude, no less than in the requisite industry, for practical life. To this rule the subject of the present notice cannot be said to have formed any very striking or brilliant exception. He was a man of respectable talents, but of no very great attainments; the records of Parliament, therefore, contain fewer evidences of his ability as a legislator than of his zeal as a partisan, and his activity as a politician.

On the 16th of November, 1784, being then in the twenty-fifth year of his age, Lord Euston married the Lady Maria Charlotte Waldegrave, the second daughter of James, second Earl of Waldegrave, whose widow (mother of the Countess of Euston) married the Duke of Gloucester—an event which is considered to have had much influence in producing the Royal Marriage Act. By the union of her mother with the Duke of Gloucester, Lady Euston acquired a royal stepfather; but her husband, the subject of this notice, could boast of a royal lineage, at least an illegitimate descent, not only from a royal but a kingly ancestor; the first Duke of Grafton being one of the sons of Barbara Villiers, Duchess of Cleveland, one of the mistresses of Charles II.

To return to the political life of the noble Duke. For many years he adopted the views and supported the government of Mr. Pitt, but possibly he felt little inclination, and less necessity, to stand forth in Parliament as a very prominent advocate of either the one or the other. Mr. Pitt, while he had Lord Euston for a supporter, took more pleasure in obtaining his vote than in listening to his speeches; and for the steady devotion with which that vote was always forthcoming, Lord Euston received an amount of patronage that was generally considered a fair equivalent for all his political services. He was chosen a Knight of the Garter, appointed Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Suffolk, and Vice-Admiral of the coast of Suffolk, Receiver-General of the profits of the assize in the County of King's Bench and Common Pleas, and King's Gamekeeper at Newmarket. For some years he was Ranger of Hyde-park and St. James's-park. Besides these offices, conferred on himself by the Minister of the day, he was Hereditary Ranger of Whittlebury Forest, Recorder of Thetford, a trustee of the Hunterian Museum, President of the Ecclectic Society of London, &c.

THE LATE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

While he held a seat in the House of Commons, it does not appear that he ever represented any other place than that which first returned him to Parliament. Yet, in 1790, Mr. Laurence Dundas stoutly contested the seat with him, but from that time till 1807, being a period of seventeen years, he remained in undisturbed possession of that much-envied distinction, "member for the University of Cambridge; and of course Mr. Pitt continued to be his colleague. When the death of that great man caused a vacancy, Lord Henry Petty (now the Marquis of Lansdowne), Lord Althorp (Earl Spencer), and Lord Palmerston, became candidates. Of these three, the first-named was returned by a large majority. At the general election in 1807, Lord Euston again encountered a formidable opposition presented by Lord Palmerston and Lord Henry Petty. On that occasion the numbers were—Earl of Euston, 334; Sir Vicary Gibbs, 312; Lord Palmerston, 310; and Lord Henry Petty, 295. Thus, during seven-and-twenty years, he sat for Cambridge, nor did his Parliamentary connexion with that University cease until he succeeded to the peerage, on the death of his father, the third Duke in 1811. It must not, however, be taken for granted, that during the whole of this time he gave himself up to the support of Mr. Pitt. On the contrary, in proportion as the conduct of the war against revolutionary France became more difficult, and the embarrassments of his quondam friend thickened around his head, Lord Euston appeared the more disposed to withdraw from him; and, long before the death of Mr. Pitt, Lord Euston became a Whig.

In 1820 he became a widower, and so continued to the end of his days. Lady Euston, therefore, never lived to be Duchess of Grafton, but her ladyship lived long enough to be the mother of eleven children, of whom six survive; one of these is Lord Charles Fitzroy, who has been many years in Parliament; and who, ever since the passing of the Reform Act, has sat for Bury St. Edmund's.

Generally speaking, the deceased peer was not more active in public life since his elevation to the peerage than he had previously been; to this, however, one exception arose, where the Bill of Pains and Penalties against the Queen of George IV. was presented to the House of Lords. On that occasion the Duke of Grafton stepped forth with unwearied energy and zeal; but this was pretty nearly the last occasion on which he took any prominent part in the business of Parliament. After a lengthened retirement of nearly twenty years, he has quietly sunk to rest, leaving behind him numerous descendants to perpetuate his honours and enjoy his wealth.—Abridged from the Times.

The dignities of the house of Grafton have devolved upon the Duke's eldest son, Henry, who has been up to this time styled by courtesy Earl of Euston, and who is now in the 34th year of his age. His lordship is Colonel of the West Suffolk Militia, and a Deputy-Lieutenant of that county. His lady, who is now become Duchess of Grafton, is daughter of the late Admiral Sir George Cranfield Berkeley, and was married to his lordship 32 years ago. The present Duke and Duchess of Grafton have several children.

The celebrity and good fortune of the late Duke of Grafton as one of the leading sportsmen of the turf, remain to be noticed. His Grace inherited this taste and success from his father, who, according to Nimrod, was a keen sportsman, and an excellent judge of racing; and his horses having been well and honestly ridden by South, he was among the few great winners amongst great men. The late Duke, upon the same authority, was a great winner, having inherited, with his domains, the virtues of old Prunella; but owed some of his success to his brother, Lord Henry Fitzroy, whose judgment in racing was equal to any man's. The late Duke won the Derby Stakes four times, and the Oaks eight; and "most of the good things at Newmarket," for a few years in succession: in the year 1825, his Grace won £13,000 from public stakes alone! "But," adds Nimrod, "we must do the Duke of Grafton the justice to say, that in his stable he has marched with the times, his horses having been always forward in their work, the grand desideratum in a training stable." His Grace also deserved success, for he was a nobleman of high character upon the turf.

THE QUEEN'S SECOND VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

We this week complete our narrative of the incidents connected with Her Majesty's visit to Scotland. The subjoined account, taken from the most authentic sources, comprises a connected detail of every circumstance worth

BLAIR ATHOL, Friday, Sept. 27.
Yesterday morning after breakfast Her Majesty rode in the grounds. The Princess Royal was taken her usual ride.

PORTRAIT OF A HIGHLAND GUARDSMAN, AT BLAIR ATHOL.

In the afternoon, at about half-past 3 o'clock, Her Majesty left the castle to visit the pass of Killiecrankie and the grounds of Mr. Butler of Faskally. The Prince drove Her Majesty, and Lord Charles Wellesley and Lord Glenlyon accompanied them on horseback. They drove straight on to the entrance of Mr. Butler's grounds. Mr. Butler received Her Majesty, and presented her with a easy faith in the soundness of foreign money speculations. At one period there was scarcely any scheme too absurd to ensure the creation of a company, directors, and shareholders. But foreign loans have been the great instruments by which Englishmen were divested of their spare capital. Loans to any state, and to almost any form of government, Imperial, Republican, Monarchical. Loans on all securities, and on no securities at all, and for any purpose the contractors might choose to allege—every representation found ready credence, and a yet more ready supply of the one thing needful. The result need not be told; it was read in a thousand forms of embarrassment and ruin, which were felt throughout the middle and commercial classes of England; and worse than the loss of what was perhaps only the superfluity of a large capital, was in many cases that of the careful savings of many years. All amounts, large and small, being alike swallowed up in the gurgling waste of foreign speculation. It would be well, then, if the people of England—at least those who have anything to lose by such schemes—would pause a little before they let their property be thus absorbed in doubtful undertakings, or staked on the good faith of yet more doubtful states and governments. At the best there is always danger to the security of capital invested in a foreign country. The scarcely escaped risk of a war with France may perhaps lead many to ask what, in case of hostilities, would have become of English money embarked in the numerous French railways? Under another Napoleon—or what is more within the bounds of probability—a ruler having all his unscrupulous rapacity, without perhaps his commanding talents, we fear the result to the English shareholder would not even be doubtful.

But the readiness with which men can be deceived, furnishes no excuse for the want of principle that prompts the deceiver, and we are glad to see our Government marking its sense of financial knavery, by refusing political recognition to those states which have practised it. It is like the ban society places on the man convicted of dishonour; and a state possesses a power of self-restoration which is too often denied to an individual; a little effort will enable the state to pay its debts, and purchase its redemption, as honest and solvent, to the mart of national credit; of an exclusion, therefore, so easily removable, they have little cause to complain.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

I beg to observe with regard to your description of a method of raising heavy weights, in your paper of Saturday last, designated as Mr. Fenig's plan, and further alluded to as his discovery, that the method has been in constant possession here during the last five and twenty years, which fact was known to Mr. Fenig previous to the meeting of the Association at York. I request the favour of your insertion of this communication in your next publication.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

C. G. DANIEL,

Lieutenant-Colonel Royal Artillery.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE QUEEN'S RETURN FROM SCOTLAND.

Great preparations were made at Woolwich Dockyard on Thursday, for the reception of her Majesty and Prince Albert, on their return from Scotland. The Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse, and General Wemyss and Colonel Bouverie, Esquires to her Majesty, were in attendance at the Dockyard at an early hour.

The Royal squadron arrived at Woolwich about half-past two o'clock, when her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Princess Royal landed, under a royal salute, after rather a rough passage. Her Majesty was received on her landing by Sir George Cockburn and the officers of the Dockyard. After a short delay, the royal party proceeded to Windsor.

HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL AT WINDSOR.

(From our own Correspondent.)

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at the Castle this afternoon, at four o'clock, in a travelling carriage and four, from Stough, having travelled from Paddington to that station in the state carriage of the Great Western Railway Company. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal rode in the carriage with her illustrious parents.

Her Majesty was escorted to the castle by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards (Blues).

The Viscountess Cowling (Lady in Waiting), Lady Caroline Somerset Cooke (Maid of Honour in Waiting), Mademoiselle Charron (in attendance on the Princess Royal), Lord Charles Willsiear, Major-General Sir Edward Somerset, and the remainder of the royal suite followed her Majesty in two carriages and four.

Considering the extremely boisterous nature of the voyage from Dundee to Woolwich, her Majesty looked remarkably well. Prince Albert appeared pale and much fatigued. We understand his Royal Highness, as is usual whenever the Prince is at sea, suffered greatly from sickness during the voyage.

The Princess Royal, it is stated, has proved herself a much better sailor than her illustrious father.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice, have been taken out twice in the House Park, during the day, for their usual airing.

The infant Prince Alfred, who is looking remarkably well, and thriving amazingly, was also taken out for an airing in the middle of the day, in the immediate vicinity of the castle.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Duchess of Kent, will dine in private this evening.

RETURN OF THE ROYAL CHILDREN TO WINDSOR.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and the Princess Alice, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, and attended by Lieutenant-Colonel the Honorable Charles Grey, Esquire to her Majesty, arrived at Windsor Castle at half-past five o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, from the Pavilion at Brighton. The royal party travelled from Brighton by a special train, to the New-cross station, and from the station proceeded to the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway.

ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AT EDINBURGH.—The Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by his son-in-law, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strölin, and Baron Kneisebeck, arrived on Monday at Edinburgh, direct from Scene Peace, Porthar, where his Royal Highness had been visiting the Earl of Mansfield.

THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at Progress House on Wednesday evening, from Wilton-cour.

The Duke of Wellington, accompanied by the Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot, arrived at Aspley House, on Wednesday, from Windsor Castle. His grace is not expected to return to the castle until after his Majesty the King of the French shall have closed his approaching visit to the Queen.

The Duke and Duchess of St. Albans have arrived at Brighton from a visit to the Earl and Countess of Morny, in Devonshire.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—Last Saturday was solemnized the marriage of Count François Calosci de Rouillon, eldest son of Count de Rouillon, Chambellan to his Majesty the King of Sardania, and Caroline Sophia Elisabeth, eldest daughter of Mr. Charles Baillie Hamilton, M.P., and the Lady Caroline Hamilton. The ceremony took place first at the Catholic Chapel in Warwick-street.

Lady Graham and family have arrived in Hill-street, from the Isle of Wight. Sir James Graham remains at Netley.

SERIOUS ILLNESS OF LADY HENRYSHURST.—We are sorry to hear that Lady Henryshurst, the lady of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is seriously indisposed. Low fever and a tendency to heart disease are each stated as her ladyship's malady. The latest answer to inquiries at Dublin Castle was of a very unfavorable character. Prayers have been offered up at the Castle Chapel for the recovery of her ladyship.

Mr. G. Hyatt, M.P., it is asserted, has given the magnificent sum of £10,000 to his niece, Miss Hyatt, on the occasion of her marriage with Mr. Telford, M.P.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ELECTION OF MR. ALDERMAN GIBBS AS LORD MAYOR.—On Saturday last a Common Hall was held at Guildhall to nominate two duly qualified Aldermen for the office of Lord Mayor. The two Aldermen next in rotation were Alderman Thomas Wood and Alderman Gibbs. The names of Alderman John Johnson and Sir G. Curdell were also submitted. The Common Sergeant declared that the choice of the Livery had fallen on Thomas Wood, Esq., and Michael Gibbs, Esq. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen subsequently selected Mr. Alderman Gibbs, who was therefore declared to be duly elected Lord Mayor for the year ensuing.

FORGOTTEN WARD.—OFFICIAL DECLARATION OF THE POLL.—On Monday afternoon, a ward of the ward of Portoken, adjourned from Friday last, was resumed at the late workhouse, in the board room, Houndsditch, to receive the official declaration of the poll, upon the election of an Alderman, in the room of Alderman T. Johnson. Mr. D. Salomons arrived a few minutes before the Lord Mayor, accompanied by his friends. Mr. Sheriff Moon was not present.

The Lord Mayor, preceded by the mace bearer and the sword of state, having taken the chair, announced the result of the poll to have been for Mr. D. Salomons, 106, for Mr. Sheriff Moon, 135, and declared Mr. David Salomons to have been duly elected Alderman of the ward. (Loud cheers.) Mr. D. Salomons then addressed the electors, and moved a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor. Mr. Hill seconded the motion, which was agreed to unanimously, with loud cheers. His lordship thanked the electors.

PAROCIAL MEETINGS.—On Monday, according to annual custom, meetings took place in the various parishes in the metropolis for the purpose of nominating persons to fill the office of overseers for the year, passing the churchwardens' accounts, and on other parochial business. In St. George the Martyr, Southwark, a long discussion took place with respect to the payment of the rector's stipend, and for other purposes of the church. The churchwarden proposed a 24. rate, which was met with an amendment for a 2d. one. On a show of hands, there appeared for the 2d. rate 24, against it 25—majority, 25. A poll was demanded, which was appointed to take place on Monday next.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—This splendid edifice, after having been closed for two months to Divine service, for the purpose, as was stated by the dean and chapter, of "cleaning and restoring the interior," was reopened last Sunday morning for public worship. Both the morning and afternoon services were very numerously attended by a most respectable congregation. The interior certainly looks all the better for the scrubbing or whitewashing it has undergone, and the stained and mossy monuments erected to those heroes who have distinguished themselves in their country's cause by land and sea are seen to more advantage now that they are divested of the thick coat of dust that had been allowed to accumulate. The service will now be continued daily, as usual, at ten o'clock a.m., and three p.m.

WOOD PAVING.—The Marylebone vestry have determined that the bottom of Oxford-street, which was first paved with wood, shall be repaved with granite. In this part the wood pavement has been completely worn out. It was laid down by contract at 2s. 2d. per yard for three years.

IRRLAND.

O'CONNELL'S TRIUMPHAL PROGRESS TO HIS NATIVE MOUNTAINS.

The Irish papers abound with inflated accounts of O'Connell's progress from Dublin to Barrymore. One of these journals reports his journey in these terms:—"In Nass, Kildare, Monaghan, Maryborough, Manxtrath, and Boreenowry, the people decorated their houses with boughs and flowers, and threw triumphal arches across the road, whilst the abundant blessings they poured forth for their friend, advocate, and champion, testified the strength, and depth, and sincerity of their hearty zeal in the cause of fatherland, and the ardent readiness of their co-operation with him in all his undertakings for the national good."

At Limerick immense crowds assembled, many of the individuals carrying green boughs and garlands, while the air resounded with shouts and congratulations. Arrived at his hotel, he made a speech, in which, after bidding the mob to take his horses from his carriage and drawing him, because he did not want them to make beasts of themselves, he said:—

"I am rejoiced to see you from Gal. (Loud cheering.) With all their jay-picking they could not keep me there. (Loud cheering.) We have triumphed over them by the justice of our cause, and by the good conduct of the people, who, during my imprisonment, kept the peace and observed the law. Nothing could equal your conduct. I do not flatter you when I say that there is not such a people on the face of the earth. For your sake I have endured a dungeon, and for you I will go to the scaffold. (Cheers.) There is another source of consolation which you have. It is the addition of Smith O'Brien to our cause. Three cheers for Smith O'Brien. (This call was responded to by a deafening peal.) I'll tell you what is his advice and mine to you. There are schemes in operation among the lower ranks of the police, who want to betray you and to get your blood for money. (Hear, hear.) They are endeavoring to promote the worst and most heinous system that ever disgraced itself in this country—I mean slavery. (Hear, hear.) There is only one way of meeting it, and that is the resistance. (Hear, hear.) Nothing else will do. Impede any course but something of this kind. Whatever project they may have, their object cannot be good, for if it were it would not need such secrecy. (Hear, hear.) You may take my word for it, and I believe I never deceived you in any of my 'Never's', that whatever fears the light cannot serve the cause of Ireland. We, your true friends, meet in the open day, and seek no concealment, and you will follow our advice, as you have ever done. (Loud cheering.) Our advice, then, is, when any reptile attempts to seduce you, bring him by the collar to the police, and I will engage you they will be very sorry to see their friend. (Hear and laughter.) I have more to tell you. Repeat a chorus. (Loud and long-continued cheering.) Many of the Protestant gentry have adopted the federal system, and are coming over to our ranks. (Hear, hear.) We hail them as Irishmen and brothers. (Cheers.) This united and powerful in our peaceful and constitutional struggle, the day is not distant when we shall see a parliament in College Green, and Ireland what God and nature intended her—prosperous and contented, happy and free." (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

At Roscrea and Nenagh O'Connell had previously addressed the Repealers in an excited strain.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The weekly meeting on Monday was such a stir that it hardly deserves any notice. Some small contributions were handed in from various places, which were acknowledged by Mr. Maurice O'Connell. A letter was read from Mr. W. S. O'Brien, urging discretion, firmness, and perseverance, and suggesting several means likely to forward the Repeal cause. Mr. M. O'Connell read a financial statement, from which it appeared that Dublin, from its trades and wares, contributed since the 1st of January the sum of £4,375 12s. 10d. to the Repeal rent. He argued from this that Dublin was "nobly doing its duty."—Mr. William John O'Connell, the London Repeal Warden, announced the weekly contribution from the great metropolis, and informed the meeting that London had subscribed no less than £1,330 3s. 3d. since the commencement of the present year.—Mr. W. O'Connell then talked in a very valiant style about the Repealers. If an invading army from Russia, he said, were to land in England, all her Majesty would have to do would be to send for him, and in an instant he would raise in London one hundred thousand fighting Repealers—all Irishmen—who would first take the weapons of the invaders from them, and then beat them with them. (Cheers.) His maxim was Repeal—honestly if possible—but, at all events, Repeal. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Maurice O'Connell rejected the notion of seeking for Repeal by any but honest and honourable means. It was directly contrary to the Liberator's principles, and to every maxim acted upon by the Repeal Association.—Mr. H. Gratias made a speech, and the meeting then adjourned till the following Monday. There was a sad falling off in the rent for the week, the amount being only £249 15s. 10d.

THE ALLEGED PLATE ROBBERY BY AN OFFICER.—We have already stated the circumstances connected with a charge against Lieutenant Padricombe, of the Royal Marines, for stealing a silver spoon and some silver forks, at a ball recently given by Mr. Augustus Warner, Lieutenant Padricombe has been tried for the alleged offence before the assistant-barrister, at the Cork Quarter Sessions. The Count-house was densely filled, and the trial occupied the entire day. Mr. Padricombe called no witnesses, but was ably defended by counsel. One of the witnesses for the prosecution, on cross-examination, admitted that others might have gone into the supper-room. There were two doors to the room. Another person might have gone up with Lieut. Padricombe, but the witness did not see him. The evidence did not at all substantiate the charge, and the jury returned a verdict of acquittal, which was received with prolonged cheering.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Nuremberg Correspondent says there is no truth in the report that Bohemia is about to become part of the German Customs Union.

Letters from Stockholm announce the death of Charles John de Becho, the long attached friend of the late King of Sweden.

The Universal German Gazette states that the prosecution against some of the officers of the Austrian navy, in relation to the affair of the vote of Admiral Bandiera, is proceeding actively, and that a merchant who procured a passport for the two brothers has been tried and sentenced to a long imprisonment.

Yesterday week was the nineteenth anniversary of the opening of the Stockton and Darlington Railway, which is the oldest of the existing railways and the first on which locomotive engines were employed.

A notice has just been issued by the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, the head master of Eton College, that after Easter next he will not admit any boy to the school who shall have completed his fourteenth year.

Professor Liebig, the distinguished chemist, will be entertained at a public dinner in Glasgow, about the 11th instant. The Earl of Eglintoun has agreed to preside.

The accounts from France respecting the vintage continue good, and in most of the districts the gathering had commenced with great success. From Nantes, St. Denis, and Lunel, the advices are most encouraging. The letters from Rheims do not speak in high terms of the quality of champagne which will be produced in that district this year.

The King of Hanover returned to that city on the 25th ult. from Halle, where his Majesty had repaired to witness the Prussian military reviews. The King has just commanded that 1000 thalers are to be forwarded from his private purse to Clausthal, in aid of the unfortunate sufferers by the calamitous fire which recently broke out in that place, the damage of which has been estimated at 300,000 thalers, and 3000 inhabitants rendered homeless.

The subscription for the Manchester Parks has now reached £21,000. By recent arrivals from Senegal we learn that M. Ruart, who, accompanied by M. It is now officially stated that the marriage contract between Duke d'Anjou and the Princess de Saxe-Coburg, has been signed. The Princess will receive 200,000 francs a year from the Court of Austria, as a member of an Imperial family, her mother being the sister of the Emperor of Austria.

Letters from Rome announce the demise of Cardinal Silestro Bello, who died at Rome on the 11th ult. He was born on the 20th of December, 1792, in Aversa, where he received his education, and after filling various offices for many years, he was raised to the rank of Cardinal by the reigning Pontiff on the 25th of the 14th of December, 1840. On the 25th of January, 1842, he was appointed Bishop of Joki.

The Berlin journals of the 25th ult., give a long account of the public entry on that day of the King and Queen of Prussia. They were escorted to the Palace by the civil and military authorities, and the population as they passed uttered enthusiastic shouts of welcome.

The Paris Academy of Fine Arts awarded, on Sunday, the grand prize of painting of 1844. The first prize was obtained by M. Félix Haras, of Paris, aged twenty-two; the second by M. Jules Lefevre, of Angers, aged twenty-five. M. Haras was a convert, and was obliged to join his regiment, but received leave of absence, in order to become a candidate for the grand prize. As this gives the right of exemption from the army, he will now be free.

The interesting ceremony of blessing a Jewish tomb took place on Friday week, at St. Mark's Church, Copenhagen. The convert was M. Waldberg. She was named Adela Sol Waldberg, and the sponsors were the Rev. J. R. and Mrs. Watson, C. T. Cooke, Esq., and Mr. and Mrs. Clifford. After the service had been performed, an elegant copy of the "Church Service" was presented to her by a lady—a friend of Israel.

POSTSCRIPT.

NOTTINGHAM RACES.

The races of the spirited town of Nottingham commenced on Thursday. Among the company on the stand were the Earl of Chesterfield, Lord Curzon, Sir Jackson Clinton, Sir William Massey Stanley, Captain Devereux, the officers of the 15th Lancers, and a great number of the county gentry. The following is the result of sport up to the time our account left the course:—

A Handicap Sweepstakes of 2500 each, p.p., was won by Mr. Whistall's b g The Hero.

A Plate of 250, given by the noblemen and gentlemen of the county, was won by Mr. J. Giff's ch g Hawk.

March for 5000, 1000 each.—Mr. Maunsell's b g Cock Robin beat Mr. Munro's ch g Carbuncle.

March for 1000, 1000 each.—Mr. T. Walker's b g Impetus beat Mr. J. Taylor's b g Cock Robin.

The Two Year Old Stakes of 2500 each, was won by Sir J. Gerard's h b Photo, beating Sweetheart, Rosalind, and Billy by Horses.

The Chesterfield Handicap of 2000 each with the added fee of the Earl of Chesterfield, was won by Mr. Robinson's Marechal, beating Anarchy, Utra, and Advice.

VEGET OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH.—It is now definitely known that his Majesty Louis Philippe intends to land at Portsmouth early on Wednesday next, and immediately afterwards to proceed by the South Western Railway to the Farnborough station, and from thence to Windsor Castle. The Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse, has given directions for six of the royal carriages and four to be in attendance at the station to await his Majesty's arrival, and convey him to Windsor. Prince Albert, attended by most of the great officers of the household, will also be in waiting at the station, so we may expect his Majesty on his arrival. The Duke of Wellington leaves town on Tuesday for Portsmouth, to take personal notice of his Majesty's arrival in the country. The Lord Chamberlain, Earl Deveraux, at the request of his Majesty, has issued invitations to the French Ambassador and Countess de St. Anstade, the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Jersey, the Earl of Liverpool, &c., to participate in the royal parties at the Castle during the visit of Louis Philippe. According to the cards, the party is to assemble on Wednesday next, and remain till Monday. There is to be a grand banquet in St. George's Hall on the 10th.

MARRIAGE OF PRINCE GEORGE OF CAMBRIDGE.—The Augsburg Gazette of the 20th September states that the report of a matrimonial union between the Grand Duchess Olga and Prince George of Cambridge daily gains more confirmation. This is regarded as the result of the journey of the Emperor of Russia to England, and as the commencement of a more intimate alliance between Russia and England.

Prince Ernest of Hesse Philipsthal and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar arrived in town on Thursday, from the Continent.

Sir Robert Peel has arrived in town from Brighton. The right hon. baronet, shortly after his arrival, gave audience to Count Neederloot at his private residence in Whitehall-terrace. The count remained closeted for more than an hour with the Premier. Miss Peel, who has recently recovered from her recent alarming illness, has come to town from Drayton Manor, and is going to Brighton to-day.

THE LATE DUKE OF GRAFTON.—The remains of this lamented nobleman will be interred on Tuesday next, at Eton Hall, Suffolk, the place of sepulture of all the ducal ancestors of his grace. The late Countess of Euston was interred at Grafton, Northamptonshire; but, by the express desire of his grace, the late duke's remains will repose among those of his noble ancestry.

WRECK OF THE WINDSOR CASTLE STEAMER.—On Tuesday, the Windsor Castle, an iron steamer, plying between Edinburgh and Dundee, left the latter town at the same hour with her Majesty's yacht, having on board about 200 passengers, the greater part of whom had come from Edinburgh with the steamer that morning, in order to witness the embarkation of the Queen. The vessel proceeded safely to St. Andrew's Bay, and the sea was remarkably calm. Suddenly, however, she struck upon the Can Rock Heaen, a dangerous ledge of rocks, about a mile from shore. Immense confusion ensued. There were many ladies aboard, some of whom behaved with great courage. Happily the whole of the crew and passengers were saved by means of the ship's boat and some fishing vessels. The steamer went to pieces the next morning.

ANOTHER CURIOUS CASE OF POISONING AT STRENET.—On Thursday Mr. W. Baker held an inquest at the Aldford Hall, Strenet, adjourned from Monday last, where the identity of deceased only was proved, relative to the death of Mr. S. Cornish, aged fifty-six, late steward of the Rev. Royal West-Linton, Mail steam-packet. The inquiry taking place in the immediate vicinity of the Helmsy catastrophe, and bearing a strong similarity to it, excited unusual interest.

In order to give at once a clue to the proceeding, it may be necessary to state that deceased was a man much respected, and had been for many years in the mail-boat service. He died on board the Dee, on the 27th ult. after a short illness, and was interred in the Beaumont-square cemetery, Strenet. Rumour of suspicions of the cause of death, and at present involving the conduct of a female, a well-known street, having been circulated, the Coroner ordered the body to be exhumed on Saturday last, and examined by Mr. Harley, of the London Hospital, the chemist and physician employed in the Helmsy case. That gentleman deposed to the fact of detecting arsenic in the stomach. He deposed that deceased had had general inflammation of the intestines, caused, produced by arsenic, and that general inflammation was the cause of death. It was not the result of quantity or diarrhoea. The arsenic was not discovered by him in large quantities. Mr. Tatham, a surgeon, belonging to the Dee, stated that he had attended the deceased on the 17th ult. on board that vessel. He was suffering from dysentery, and was in a dangerous state. Witness at a second visit to deceased saw a female about twenty-six years of age with him. She represented herself as a widow, and the niece of the deceased. She said she had come to see her uncle about noon that day; that he had made a will, which she handed to witness, and which is preserved. Deceased heard all this conversation. The will had been written and witnessed by two persons belonging to the vessel. Witness told the female he doubted whether the will was legal or not, and suggested the sending for a solicitor. Witness questioned deceased in the woman's presence in the following manner:—"Mr. Cornish, do you wish to make a will?" "I have made one." "Whom do you wish to leave your property to?" "I wish to leave all my property to my niece." "Who is your niece?" Deceased then put his hand on the female's shoulder, and said, "This is my niece, and I wish her to have all my property." Deceased then put his arms around her, drew her towards him, and embraced and kissed her as if she were his wife. A solicitor came, and the will was properly attested. Witness remained a few minutes longer, and did not leave deceased alive. He died the next night. He registered the death at Streney, Strenet, on the 28th ult. of a Jenkins's count, and she had known deceased for many years, and that about two years ago he came one morning to her house in a very excited state, requesting her husband to get his effects away from the person. A question, who, he said, that morning had given him a cup of coffee in which had been detected arsenic. Deceased then came to bed with witness, and frequently told her that the female had repeatedly given him "that stuff (arsenicum)" to sleep him, which he added he supposed was done to get his money and papers, as he had lent her fifty pounds to go into business. The woman used to call deceased "Juncle," but he told witness she was no relative of his. Whilst deceased lodged with witness he used often to visit the female, and return home in a stupefied state, saying, in answer to questions, "That woman has been drugging my spirits." The inquiry was adjourned to Monday morning next.

FOOTNOTES.

The Brussels papers of Tuesday deny the truth of the report that the King of the Belgians is about to visit England. The British Queen steamer, belonging to the Belgian Government, has been sold at Antwerp by public auction, to Mr. Van de Leemput for 170,000 francs, and the expenses for the vessel and its inventory.

THE EVACUATION OF MUGADORE.—Official information has been received that the French troops evacuated the island of Mugadore on the 15th ult.; and that on the 17th the French vessels of that port went to sea, with all the troops and stores.

RUSSO-KOREAN TREATY.—A treaty of commerce has been concluded between the Russian Empire and the United States, in substance the same as that with England.

ARRIVAL FROM THE UNITED STATES.—The packet ship, Yorkville, Capt. Bailey, has arrived at Liverpool with passengers from New York. The steamer does not, however, contain an item of news, as the Haverhill and Boston, which sailed on the same day from Boston, and arrived at Liverpool on the 2nd inst., New York, leaves only an interval of one day, and that Sunday.

ANCIENT CEREMONY OF CHOPPING STICKS, AND COUNTING HORSE-SHOES AND HOE-NAIIS, IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER, ON MONDAY LAST.

PRESENTATION OF THE NEW SHERIFFS OF LONDON, AT WESTMINSTER, &c.

On Monday afternoon, this important ceremony took place in the Court of Exchequer, at Westminster, before the Curator Baron, Mr. Banks. The Corporation procession was formed at Guildhall, and having reached Blackfriars-bridge, the civic party, in their state barges, there took water, and arrived shortly before two o'clock at Westminster-bridge, whence they proceeded to the Court of Exchequer. Here they were received by the Curator Baron, and, having arranged themselves upon the tiers and benches, the ceremony proceeded. The procession included the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Thomas Wood, John Johnson, Musgrove, Chellis; the newly-elected Sheriffs (Mr. Alderman Hunter and Mr. Alderman Sidney); and the late Sheriffs; the newly-elected Chamberlain; the Town-clerk, and other City officers. The Recorder then presented the new Sheriffs to the court, and complimented them in the usual terms, as well as Mr. Alderman Musgrove, and Mr. Moon, the gentlemen who had just filled the offices of Sheriffs of London and of Middlesex.

The Curator Baron said he fully agreed with the learned Recorder, that this was no idle pageant, but that it was a solemn recognition on the part of the Sovereign to the authorities of the first city in the empire of their full rights and privileges, and on behalf of her Majesty that Court fully recognised the rights and privileges which were claimed at their hands. The Curator Baron then paid the Sheriffs elect and the late Sheriffs a high compliment for the manner in which they had been chosen by their fellow-citizens. On behalf of her Majesty, he begged again fully to recognise the rights and liberties of the citizens of London, and the Baron desired the officer to record the names of the Sheriffs elect.

The various writs and appearances were then read by the Recorder and Clerk, and ordered by the Court to be recorded and filed; and the Sheriffs and senior Under-Sheriff took the usual oaths.

The Crier of the Court then stepped forward, and made the proclamation for the one who did homage for the Sheriffs of London, to "stand forth and do his duty;" when the senior Alderman below the chair (Wood) rose, and an officer of the Court handed to him a bill-hook; the officer then took a small bundle of sticks, which he held in both hands, whilst the Alderman struck it and cut it asunder. The bill-hook was then exchanged for a small hatchet, and a similar bundle of sticks cut in like manner. Similar proclamation was then made for the Sheriff of Middlesex; and the Alderman, having first counted certain horse-shoes placed upon a table, and declared their number, a tray was handed to him containing a number of hoe-nails, which he also counted; and having been asked twice, and declared the number, the ceremony ended by the Recorder inviting to an entertainment, to be given by the new Sheriffs: the civic procession then returned by water.

This ceremony is, altogether, a very interesting one, characteristic as it is of the tenures of olden times; and it was witnessed on Monday by several spectators. The sticks provided for the occasion are about twice the length of an ordinary black lead pencil, and half the thickness. The bundle consists of about eight or ten sticks, tied together, at each end, with red tape; and so thin are the peeled twigs that a very slight blow suffices for their separation. The Usher of the Court, who presents the sticks, holds them at the time about a foot and a half above the table.

Possibly, many of the spectators on Monday were not aware of the importance of this ceremony; since the annual appearance of the paragraph on chopping sticks and counting horse-shoes and hoe-nails at Westminster, has raised many a laugh at the expense of the good citizens. The ceremony, however, relates to certain "tenures," and these not "jocular;" and that which vulgar error supposed to be an unmeaning farce, is solemn and impressive; nor have the Sheriffs the least connexion either with chopping of sticks or counting of hoe-nails. The senior Alderman, in fact, does suit and service for the tenants of a manor in Shropshire, by chopping the sticks in token of its having been customary for the tenants of that manor to supply their lord with fuel. The counting of the horse-shoes and nails is another suit and service of the owners of a forge in the parish of St. Clement, which formerly belonged to the City, and stood in the high road from the Temple to Westminster, but now no longer exists.

On Monday evening, the Sheriffs gave a grand banquet in honour of their investiture, at the London Tavern. Alderman William Hunter, the senior Sheriff, presided, supported by his colleague, Mr. Alderman Sidney, the Lord Mayor, the Lord Mayor Elect (Alderman Gibbs), the Chairman and Deputy-Chairman of the East India Company, Lord J. Russell and W. Masterman, Esq., Members of Parliament for the city of London, several of the Aldermen, including Alderman Salomons, besides the Recorder, and Chamberlain.

MADLE. DUMILATRE, IN THE NEW BALLET OF "THE CORSAIR."

The production of this ballet, founded upon Lord Byron's poem of the same name, will be found noticed elsewhere, in the present sheet. The accompanying illustration represents the Cabinet of Seide, the opening scene of Act III., where the Turkish Pasha throws himself upon a couch, and Guinevere approaches him; confiding in the influence of her charms to obtain the pardon of her liberator, Conrad. He turns suddenly towards her, and is about to repulse her, but cannot resist her caresses. While at his feet, playing with the royal signet, she unperceptibly draws off the ring, and places it upon her own finger, as her eyes, meeting those of the Pasha by their fascination, render him unconscious of her design. The Pasha's thought of vengeance, however, returns, but Guinevere implores mitigation of the fate of his victim, and, with a resentful look, quits the apartment. But the signet ring, which the spell-bound Pasha has left in her hand, will open the doors of Conrad's dungeon:—

Never on a sleeper's dream
Did a brighter vision beam
Than the fairy form that flies
Before th' enchanted Corsair's eyes!
'Tis Music's motion—Poetry.
Ne'er combin'd the Graces Three
In one sweet form so well before—
We look—we listen and adore
Its silent magic; e'en dispute
If mortal sounds should not be mute
And leave it to itself the while
It fills all senses with its smile!

MADLE. DUMILATRE, IN THE NEW BALLET OF "THE CORSAIR," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

"FOIGH-A-BALLAGH," THE WINNER OF THE GREAT ST. LEGER AND GRAND DUKE MICHAEL STAKES. DRAWN BY HERRING.

THE WINNER OF THE GREAT ST. LEGER.

Since our announcement of this characteristic portrait of Foigh-a-Ballagh, "the Champion of Ireland," and winner of the great St. Leger, at Doncaster, on the 17th ult., he has added to his reputation by winning the Grand Duke Michael Stakes, at Newmarket, on Tuesday last.

Foigh-a-Ballagh is the property of Mr. Irwin, who, in July 1842, purchased him of Mr. G. Knox, of Brownstown House, Kildare, by whom he was bred. He is a brown horse of fine temper, and good courage; when in action he goes rather wide behind. He stands fifteen hands three and a half inches high; he has a good head, well set on to a light neck; his shoulders lie well back; his back is straight, with arched loins and long quarters, the tail high set on; deep in the brisket; capital ribs, fore and hind; good arms, thighs, and hocks; full in the gaskins, smallish flat legs, and good open feet. His near hock is a good deal blemished from the dressing for a curb. With the exception of his fore legs, he is a horse of much power, and is very blood-looking.

The late William Arnall has been frequently heard to say, that winning or losing a race by half the length of his walking stick, made all the difference between a good and a bad jockey,—the one who lost, could not ride a bit, whilst the winner generally rode most beautifully. This remark is certainly applicable to the two last St. Leger.

When Marson won a very fine race on Nutwith, beating Frank Butler on Cotherstone (who, to speak impartially, must be classed amongst the best horsemen of his day), it was remarked that had William Scott been on Cotherstone, he could have won ten or twenty lengths. Marson was then spoken of as likely to be the best horseman in the north. He now has the misfortune to be put on one of the rankest curs that has shown for some time; and the present cry of the multitude is—had Templeman been on him, he could not have lost. What will the disappointed party say now? Templeman did ride the Cure, at Richmond, and got beaten in a similar way, but by an inferior horse to Foigh-a-Ballagh, it being, while running, 100 to 1 on him. Surely this is a satisfactory proof that Marson was not fairly used in the observations made on his riding for the Doncaster St. Leger.

By the way, the Great St. Leger Dinner at Leeds, on Wednesday week, went off with great spirit. Nearly 100 enthusiastic sporting gentlemen sat down to a splendid entertainment at the Leeds Arms Inn, West-street, which was served up in admirable style by Mr. and Mrs. Denton. After the cloth was withdrawn some excellent songs and toasts were given.

PETERBOROUGH BRIDGE FAIR.

This is a scene of genuine old English interest, associated with the manners and customs of many centuries since. Fairs, are, indeed, but greater kinds of markets, granted before flourishing towns were established, and the necessities of life, from the convenience of communication and the increase of provincial civility, could be procured in various places; to those, as to one universal mart, the people resorted periodically for goods and commodities of every kind, and supplied most of their wants for the ensuing year. The display of merchandise, and the conflux of customers, at these principal and almost only depots of domestic commerce, were prodigious; and they were, therefore, often held in open and extensive plains.

Peterborough has two yearly fairs: one of these, called "Briggs Fair," or "Briggs Fair," is kept on the bridge, on the Huntingdon side of the river Nene, on October 2, and following day. One engraving represents the very animated scene, sketched from Mr. Lawrence's sketch.

The fair is for horses and farming stock of all kinds; this portion occupying the foreground of the view; and the upper ground, on the other side of the road to Northampton, being appropriated to the pleasure fair, extending to the line of the river bridge, commencing at the bridge of entrance, which is built on wooden piles presented obliquely to the water. Here is a vast assemblage of booths, shows, and countless amusements for children of all growth, recalling Gay's pleasure lines—

How pedlar stalls with glittering toys are laid,
The various wares of the country maid,
Long ribbons hang upon the trees,
And rows of peas and amber bracelets shine.
Here the tight lace, bonnet, collar, and tassets spurs,
And looking-glasses with dancing eyes,
The toothbrush now trends the stage, and sells
His pills, his balsams, and his age spots;
Now o'er and o'er he rubs his face with springs,
And on the tape the watchman nodding swings;
Jack pudding, in his parti-coloured jacket,
Turns the globe, and takes at every gait;
Here rattle shows are seen, and Punch's feats,
And pockets pick'd in crowds, and various treats.

The meadow immediately before the town, on the Northamptonshire side of the river, is occupied by "the wood fair."

High above the misty scene, and cresting the city, is seen the massive cathedral of enriched Norman, or early English architecture. The sight of the vast pile carries us back to the origin of the fair, for the city itself possesses little historical interest, independent of the abbey or cathedral. This was originally a portion of the monastery, founded by Paula, son of Paula, King of Merca, rebuilt about the year 970, for monks of the Benedictine order; and it continued to flourish till the dissolution by Henry VIII. Now, the hospitable monks of former times derived great profit from fairs: officers were placed at bridges and other avenues of access to fairs, to exact toll on all merchandise passing that way. Thus, the Conventual institution and gave, as a kind of revenue, St. Giles's Hall Fair to the Bishop of Winchester, with many and extraordinary privileges for enriching the see. Numerous foreign merchants frequented this fair; and several streets were formed in it, assigned to the sale of different commodities. The surrounding monasteries had shops or houses in the streets, used only at the fair, which they held under the bishop, and often let, by lease, for a term of years.

Hence, the fairs of Peterborough may be said to have contributed to the splendour of the abbey; for, at the dissolution, it was one of the most magnificent in the kingdom. Times have strangely changed, and monasteries changed with the times; but, despite the increased accumulation of the city, the fairs are annually held. The site of that, which we here allude to, will, however, soon be traversed by a railway; but, we trust, the old English festival will lose none of its attractions by being held in another place.

THE THEATRICAL SEASON.

The opening of all the winter theatres, with the exception of the Princess's and the unfortunate Covent Garden, during the past week, calls for a few remarks upon their prospects during the ensuing campaign: for, seldom has a season commenced with such energy in all quarters. We see, by the announcements, that opera and ballet will be the staple fare at Drury-lane; and the drama will be altogether excluded from its walls. This we regret; but, at the same time, cannot find fault with Mr. Bunn for the arrangement, provided he carries out the plans he has formed, in a manner, at least, deserving of success. He has entered upon the lessening of Drury-lane as a mere commercial speculation, and if he finds the public flock in greater numbers to music and spectacle than to the legitimate drama, he acts wisely in studying their taste; although we are willing to admit that it is not one of a high order. And indeed, after all, we question whether a fine play, or great actor, can be witnessed anywhere to less advantage than in the wide area of our leading "national" theatre.

THE HAYMARKET is in every respect better suited to the representation of the drama; and there is not the slightest doubt that by following the same plans so successfully carried out last season, Mr. Webster will have equal reason to be satisfied with his arrangements, and the general working of his excellent company at the termination of the present one. His corps has, however, suffered a great loss in the secession of Mrs. Nisbett from public life; and it will be long before that lady's place is filled—a circumstance which we know materially affects the perfect representation of a new comedy now in the theatre.

THE LYCEUM at present promises nothing, which we may take as a sign that there is no necessity for change. But the management must not remain idle; it has now far more to contend against than it has had at any time since it so singularly turned the fortunes of the hitherto ill-fated English Opera-house into a run of continuous success; and if Mrs. Keeley would keep up the good name which her theatre has acquired, it is quite time that some novelties should be at least underlined in the bills, which have now remained nine weeks unaltered.

THE ADELPHI, up to the present, has produced no very remarkable effect, the opening piece having been quietly withdrawn after two nights; but with the powerful company collected under the direction of Madame Celeste, much ought to be done, and is expected. The public have been accustomed to regard the Adelphi as the peculiar house for startling novelty and effects not to be witnessed elsewhere; and this has so long been the prevalent notion, that it would be dangerous, if not fatal, to alter it. The Adelphi audience is the most peculiar one in London, and great tact is required to study its taste; the secret of which no one understood better than poor Yates.

THE PRINCESS'S opens this evening with an entire change in its company, both in the operatic and dramatic department. The house is avowedly a favourite one with the public, and a good property; but the lessee will find it to his interest to go to a somewhat greater outlay than he has hitherto done, more especially with regard to his authors. Literary men can always accommodate their productions to the price they receive for them; and spangles and the point brush will produce little in the long run, if they are looked upon otherwise than as mere accessories in working out the author's intentions.

The little STRAND Theatre seems determined not to go to the wall in the general concourse. Its manager deserves well of the public, both from his enterprise, and the honourable manner in which he provided a home for his brother and sister performers when all appeared hopeless.

SADLER'S WELLS has been going on prosperously with Shakespeare, and a fresh shade is about to be offered to the legitimate drama at the City of London theatre, which opens on Monday under the direction of Mrs. Walter Lacy. We conclude by wishing every success to all.

DRURY-LANE.

The season of this magnificent establishment commenced on Monday evening, with a house crowded to the very ceiling. "The Bohemian Girl," performed on this occasion for the eighty-first time, was the first piece, and calls for little remark beyond the circumstance of the old favourites being cordially greeted as they appeared, and the popular airs of Miss Relforth and Harrison being warmly encored as ever. The new ballet of "The Corsair" was, however, the great attraction—founded on Byron's poem of the same name. It was produced in a slightly different form, some six or seven years back, at the Italian Opera, but did not at that time achieve any extraordinary success. A musical drama on the same subject, by Mr. Frank Romer, termed "The Pacha's Bride," was also brought out, about the same time, at the Lyceum. The ballet, which is in three acts, served to introduce Mlle. Adèle Dumilâtre to the Drury-lane audience, in the character of Gubare. This charming danseuse first appeared in England at the Italian Opera, in 1843, on the evening that Perrot met with his accident in the ballet "L'Aurore." She belongs to the ideal school; and her countenance is beautifully expressive of every emotion wished to be depicted. Her figure is somewhat attenuated—very far, however, from being unpleasantly so—and there is a combined grace and lightness in every movement which we have rarely seen equalled. She was supported by MM. Montessu and Desplaces, with Clara Webster, and a débütante, Mlle. Delbis, who created a strong impression in her favour amongst the audience by her excellent dancing, more particularly in a new and effective Polka. The ballet itself, although splendidly got up, was a dull affair; and those portions of it not enlivened by the pas of the chief dancers were very heavy. The best "effects" were a vision scene, in which the body of Medora is seen on its bier, surrounded by girls strewn flowers (which, by the way, was somewhat equivocally received); and a brilliant tableau at the conclusion, representing the attack on the palace by the pirates, and its conflagration; in the midst of which Calisto is seen on a burning raft, supporting Gubare. The remaining incidents were not of a very interesting character; and there was a great deal of unmeaning bustle throughout the acts. The applause was, however, general at the conclusion; and the call for Mlle. Dumilâtre unanimous.

On Tuesday evening, Miss Delcy—a young lady who came out on these boards three or four years ago, and has since been pursuing her musical studies in Italy—re-appeared in the part of Cinderella, and, we regret to add, with but undecided success. She has yet much to learn and overcome, before she can aspire to the position of prima donna. In spite of the cheers from the audience, invariably indulgent to a débütante, the inefficiency of her voice, in several portions of the music, was too plainly apparent; and this was more particularly observable in the concluding "Non più mesta." Miss Delcy was, however, called before the curtain, to acknowledge the applause of the house. The Prince was performed by Mr. D. King, a gentleman who has been singing during the "opera season" at the Surrey; and he evidently made an agreeable impression on the audience by his voice, which is a low tone of good quality. Mr. S. Jones played the Baron with care, although the part was evidently above his capabilities; and Mr. Stratton was somewhat ponderous, both in his acting and singing, as Dosobai; in fact, nothing in the opera was enthusiastically received, except a very pretty pas de caractère, by Miss Clara Webster and Madame Giubeli, in the ball-room scene—in a dull assembly, by the way,—which was rapturously received.

After the opera, a re-enactment, called the "serious pantomime" of "Obi, or Three Fingered Jack," took place, which fully bore out its claim to be looked upon as a very serious affair indeed. At first, the audience were lost in deep thought as to the intent of what they saw being enacted; then, they began to hiss; and lastly, got fatter, which is the most dangerous state an audience can arrive at. Upon the fall of the curtain, the disapprobation was pretty generally expressed, so as to leave no doubt, but that the exhausted pantomime would again retire to a very long home indeed.

HAYMARKET.

This agreeable theatre commenced its winter campaign on Monday, with Mrs. Centlivre's comedy of the "Busy Body," revived towards the end of the past season; the comic drama of "Used Up," and Mr. J. M. Morton's farce of "The Milliner's Holiday." It will be seen that there was here no novelty, but the house was, nevertheless, well filled. The favourites of the company were received with hearty applause; and the manner in which the pieces were played, proved that this excellent company has lost none of its spirit or power of co-operating towards one perfect end, during the recess.

On Wednesday evening the first novelty was produced, in a corrected revision of Sir J. Vanbrugh's comedy of "The Confederacy." This work has for many years been considered an unactable drama, chiefly on account of the indecency of its language, and the imperfect construction of its fifth act. It has, however, been carefully revised in passing through the hands of its present adapter, Mr. Honcricault. Its impurities of dialogue have been expunged or so enveloped as to avoid intrusion on delicacy. In a former adaptation, the two city wives were transformed into wards, which was considered to injure the integrity of the plot; in the present adaptation, Vanbrugh's original forms have been retained—the modification chiefly existing in the method of expression; and the two money-benders are kept on the scene until the end of the play, which is reconstructed to suit our modern feelings for stage effect. It was throughout admirably performed. Mrs. Glover's Mrs. Julet was the most delicious piece of acting we have for some time witnessed; and Madame Vestris's Flapdoodle perfect. Farren and Strickland as the two usurers, Gripe and Moneytrap, also played excellently, and contrasted, by their very superior acting, to throw a palpable contrast between the two characters, so nearly assimilated. Hall scarcely realised our notion of Dick: there was too much of the light comedy in his acting of the unmitigated scamp; but Charles Mathews, as his wily accomplice, was most effective. The other principal characters, the two wives, and Cornelia, were cleverly sustained by Miss P. Horton, Mrs. Edwin Arnold, and Miss Julia Bennett, whose hoydenish, laughing girl of sixteen was delightful.

The comedy was received throughout with extreme applause, especially the scenes between Flapdoodle and Cornelia, and Moneytrap's false restitution; and at the fall of the curtain the performance was announced for repetition, amidst loud and continued cheering. It may be considered a great success.

On Thursday evening a new farce was produced from the pen of Mr. Buckstone, termed "The Thimble Rig." Why it was so called we are at a loss to determine, for, with the exception of a very slight allusion to the exploded game, there was nothing particularly pertaining to it. A farce, containing a breakfast scene, might as well have been christened "The French Roll." The fun chiefly turned on the desperate efforts of Ginger (Mr. Buckstone) to keep the knowledge of a certain debt with which he is encumbered, from his wife (Mrs. W. Clifford), through the bottle companionship of a man put in possession of his house (Mr. Strickland). It was a mere stretch; but Mr. Buckstone's peculiarities of intonation sufficed to keep the audience on the grin; although, to our thinking, these peculiarities are carried too far. Strickland played the sheriff's man with characteristic drollery; and Mrs. Clifford looked unutterable things at Buckstone, as only Mrs. Clifford can look. The piece was announced for repetition amidst moderate applause.

LYCEUM.

In consequence of the secession of Misses Woolgar and Ellen Chaplin from this theatre to join the Adelphi corps, two new members of this company were introduced to the audience on Saturday—Miss Walcott (from the Theatre Royal, Manchester) and Miss Arden. The former lady appeared in a farce called "Out-generalled," which we had known in former days under the name of "Personation." She will, if we mistake not, prove a great acquisition to the theatre. Her figure and deportment are very elegant, her features highly attractive, and her voice pleasing and well-modulated. She assumed the part of an old housekeeper with great effect, and at the end of the piece was loudly called for, and literally pelted with bouquets. Miss Arden we recollect two years ago at the Olympic as a very pleasing singer and actress. Since then she has greatly improved in her style, and gives promise of becoming yet more finished. Another change also took place in the part of Princess Badonbadon, in "Aladdin," hitherto performed by Miss Woolgar, but now represented by Miss Farebrother, who looked it admirably, and gave the lines allotted to her with great point and accuracy. The house has continued to be excellently attended, and Keeley's Suitor and his clever little wife's Aladdin continue to draw down shouts of laughter and applause.

ADELPHI.

The Adelphi has so long been one of the most popular of our winter theatres, that we were not surprised to see it filled with such a large audience as crowded within its walls on Saturday evening. There was also an additional curiosity to behold the improvements which had taken place in the interior of the house during the recess, as well as the débüt of several performers new to the theatre, and the re-appearance of one or two old members of the bygone celebrated "Adelphi Company" once more collected together; added to which, the circumstance of an entirely new management, and that a lady one, gave a fresh interest to the commencement of the season.

With respect to the improvements in the auditorium, much good has been effected. The private boxes have all been altered, so as to command a perfect view of the stage from every part of the interior, as well as from the extremities of the dress circle—the line of view being taken from the portion of the stage technically known as the "grave trap" (from being used generally for the grave scene in "Hamlet"), instead of from the lamps. The slips have also been enlarged, and the front row of pit seats thrown considerably back from the rail of the orchestra; but the same inconvenience of the people standing in the passage between the two sets of boxes still continues, and this we believe is irremediable. The new curtain, painted by Mr. C. Marshall, struck us as rather too elaborate in its treatment to be effective. The drop-scene was much prettier, being a circular view of a castle combining various styles of architecture, with a cavalier saluting his "lady-love" from the terrace, and a ruined bridge, &c.

The opening address—a very lively one, running over with the same kind of fun that sparkles in "Punch;" as well it might do being from the pen of Mr. Gilbert A. Beckett—was delivered by Mrs. Yates, who met with a long and enthusiastic reception. The curtain then rose for "God save the Queen," by the entire of the company, Mr. Webster, the lessee, occupying the centre of the group with Madame Celeste; and then, after an overture, the new piece of "Mother and Son" commenced. To call it new is, however, scarcely correct, since another version, differing slightly from the original French drama, "L'Eclat de Rire," was produced two seasons back under the name of "The Merchant and his Clerks." As the piece has been since withdrawn, it is scarcely worth while to relate the plot. The gem was O. Smith's Suave—a rakish billiard-playing clerk. There was the artist in every tone and gesture; and his devil-may-care idea of his own scampish recklessness was perfect. It was in every respect equal to his personation of Newswoman Nigger.

"The Belle of the Hotel" followed, in which Mrs. Fitzwilliam played with her usual vivacity and singular versatility. Then came the burlesque of "Norma," supported by the old favourites, Paul Bedford, Wright, and pretty Miss Woodcock; and the evening's programme concluded with the farce of "How to pay the Rent," which allowed Mr. Hudson the opportunity of appearing to great advantage in one of four Power's characters. The orchestra was led by Mr. Mellon, from the Theatre Royal, Birmingham.

On Wednesday evening, after the revived drama, by Mr. Bernard, of "St. Mary's Eve," a very pleasant comic operetta was produced, under the name of "The Fox and the Goose"—a translation, if we mistake not, of a French vaudeville, "Le Panier Fleuri." The plot is this:—Angélique (Mrs. Fitzwilliam) is the coquettish landlady of a cabaret, "The Fox and the Goose"—upon the Boulevards, it we are to judge from the view of the Chateau d'Eu in the background. She passes for a widow; and, amongst many others, has two great admirers, Robichon, a commissary of police (Mr. Paul Bedford); and Michel, an antiquated beau (Mr. S. Cowell); with both of whom it is to her interest to keep upon good terms, in order to obtain certain extensions of the hour for closing the tavern. In the interim of their visits, her husband, Edouard (Mr. Hudson), a French-Hibernian Hissar, returns home, whence he had departed in a fit of pique, which had driven away all the old customers. Tired, however, of idling, he wishes to raise £50 to procure a substitute, and this he ultimately accomplishes, by setting his wife's admirers to fight, and then getting a handsome bribe from each to kill the other. In a short time Michel, thinking his rival is disposed of, returns to sup with Angélique, but is alarmed by the signal of Robichon, who is labouring under the same delusion. Michel is accordingly shut up in a closet, but Robichon has scarcely taken his seat at the table when the husband comes back, upon which the commissary is also hidden in another lurking-place. A very ludicrous situation then takes place; somewhat similar, however, to one in "My Neighbour's Wife," which ends in a reconciliation of all parties, Angélique contriving, by her tact, to make her lovers pay pretty dearly for their pretensions. All the performers acquitted themselves admirably, especially Mr. S. Cowell, who has joined the company of this house from the Surrey. His personification of the old beau was excellent, and full of a quaint pleasant humour. The piece was interspersed by some music composed by M. Ambrose Thomas, and arranged by Mr. Reed, of the Haymarket Theatre. This was the least effective part of the piece, being a weak imitation of Adolphe Adam; but the audience applauded, and so we presume the end was answered, as the opera was announced by Mr. Paul Bedford for repetition every evening, until further notice, amidst unqualified approbation.

STRAND.

Despite the powerful attractions set forth by its more important neighbours, this excellently-conducted little theatre came gallantly up to the mark on Monday evening, with two new pieces, performed after the still-attractive "Martin Chuzzlewit," which is, by the way, an excellent adaptation of the novel. The first of these—a transatlantic sketch, called "The Vermont Wool-dealer," served to introduce Mr. Marble, an American comedian, for the first time to a British audience, and with most undeniable success. Mr. Marble is not one of those ebony-faced, hump-playing, carpet-trowered niggers, with whom we have been lately brought into such frequent contact—but of the Sam Slick genus, or rather in the style of Mr. Hill, who played here a few years back in the "Yankee Pedlar," to whom he is fully equal in his delineation of American character. Rows of laughter followed every speech and remark he made, especially that respecting an old horse, which was "so broken up and weak, he was obliged to send for another animal to help him draw his last breath." He was vehemently called before the curtain at the conclusion of the sketch, and briefly expressed his acknowledgments to the audience for their hearty welcome. The second novelty was a burlesque upon Bellini's opera of "La Sonnambula," here converted into "La Sonnambula-bula," and allowing Mr. H. Hall to appear as the fair Amoretti. Its only fault was that it was rather long—the music being too elaborately carried out for a mere extraneousness. A sly allusion to the length of time taken to make up certain accounts produced a hearty burst of applause.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Marreedy, according to the last accounts from him, had decided to sail from New York, on his route to England, on the 1st of October. He was playing his principal characters in the Arch-street Theatre, Philadelphia. It is calculated that Mr. Marreedy has cleared about fifty or sixty thousand dollars in America.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS IN PARIS.—Mr. Mitchell has formed an English company, who will appear at the Italian Opera, Paris, upon the termination of Louis Philippe's visit to her Majesty. The troop comprises Miss Helen Faucit, Mr. Marreedy, and Mr. Bartley. It is also reported that Rachel is studying the character of Lady Macbeth, so as to play it in English.

THE LYCEUM OF PLAYS under the Chamberlain, Mr. J. M. Kemble, has suspended the production of a translation, by Mr. Stirling, of "Les Sept Châteaux du Diable," in preparation at the Lyceum. As nearly all the other houses were at work upon a similar piece, and as they will probably meet with the same judgment, this intelligence has caused much uneasiness amongst the members of the Dramatic Authors' Society.

VACUUM GARDENS.—These gardens have been exceedingly well attended during the week. The short season is to close on Wednesday with a masquerade, and this will be the last opportunity for attending this once splendid place of resort, as the gardens are to be built upon.

LINES WRITTEN ON THE OCCASION OF HER MAJESTY'S RETURN FROM SCOTLAND.

Welcome, fair mistress of our loyal loves,
Welcome once more to Windsor's lovely groves;
With health refresh'd by the mountain breeze,
Inhal'd each morning from the purple heath.*
No lazy luxury of palace halls,
Was thine amidst the lonely waterfalls;
High on the dewy hills, or deep below,
In woody glens, where gentler waters flow,
Wert thou at dawning of the day's sweet prime,
Listening the heath-cock's crow—the lark's first chime,
Marking the red deer bounding o'er the hill—
But ne'er forgetting as the Sovereign still,
To watch the interests of the State, and see
Thy absence hurt not its propriety;
This is the way to keep thy people's love,
About their hills and valleys free to rove;
Not to immerse thy pomp in haughty gloom,
As some have done, whose pride is in the tomb!

A DELICATE PRESENT.—Prince Joachim, on the conclusion of the Morocco treaty, presented to the Moorish general a very elegant pair of pistols, as a souvenir! This is very like sending a man, and then giving him the stick.—Punch.

"WANTED A GOVERNOR."—Oh, these governors! I am told there is some clever gentleman who has invented an arithmetical machine that will calculate any sum to a fraction. What a blessing would that man bestow upon really good society who should invent an instrument for teaching! I am sure, in three days, the thing might be done, and would pay admirably for how much annoyance would be spared us—how much impertinence that we are daily exposed to from a class of individuals who can have no standing in society, and are, nevertheless, continually at one's elbow! The cook, the housemaid, the lady's-maid, all know their place, and behave themselves accordingly; but there is no teaching a governor that she is nothing more than a servant; a person hired for wages to polish the minds of your children just in the same manner as Mally polishes your rosewood and mahogany—and to be as careful of their morals as if, like the housekeeper, she was entrusted with so much precious china. Your maid dresses your hair with due humility, and takes your little lock of hair with proper resignation; she knows these things are considered in her wages, and thus she has no objection to the sphere to which it has placed Heaven to call her, that governors! they are continually flying in the face of Providence! There is, too, an impertinence in their very meekness; at times, an insult in their silence. They move about you with the air of injured brutes—an air that says to your very face—"We, too, are ladies, though you can't believe it." Ladies! as if the person who takes a salary is not, to all intents and purposes, a servant—at best, a better sort of menial servant.—Punch's Complete Letter-writer.

* Her Majesty had a bouquet of fresh-picked heather placed in her bed-room every morning at seven o'clock, together with a bottle of pure water from a spring, in Glen Tilt, famed for its crystal purity.

* Her Majesty did not allow her domestic pleasure to interfere with her habits of business. She wrote almost every day to the Duchess of Kent and the Dowager Countess of Lyttelton, and was extremely punctual in attending to and signing each paper as were laid before her.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

OCTOBER.

This is the time for mirth and merriment,
Heart-contraction in a lonely wood,
Whose path by many a fallen leaf is strewn,
Lead you away, as to Eternity.
From all the noise and trouble of this life,
Nothing the soul with dreams of future bliss
Although where'er you turn each sense is rife
With Nature's quick decay—But still from this,
We can inhale by sympathy refined
A respiration to our own defeat,
By that archangel, old Time, and find
A thrilling pleasure—a religious sweet
That when his spirit is done—himself at rest—
Immortals we may be amongst the best!

THE PARADE OF THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO.

The parade captured by Marshal Bugeaud from the son of the Emperor of Morocco, has arrived in Paris, and has been placed in the care of the Minister of War. It is of an extraordinary purple colour, not exceeding in circumference an ordinary full-sized umbrella. It is covered with embroidery in silver, and edged with silver fringe and tassels. It is surrounded by a silver knob, similar to those on the canes of drum-majors. The stick is of hard wood, plated with silver, and the entire height is little, if anything, more than five feet. It is believed to be of Spanish manufacture.

A DISCOVERY ABOUT WILLIAM TELL.

A letter from a private acquaintance of a literary discovery connected with William Tell, the existence of this personage, which has hitherto appeared somewhat doubtful, has from this discovery become an historical fact. A copy of Latin verses, written immediately after the battle of Morgarten, has just been found, in which his name is mentioned in precise terms. It is there stated that Tell was one of the three warriors who took the oath of fidelity in the commencement of the fourteenth century. His name replaces that of Walter Forst, erroneously mentioned by the chroniclers of the time. As to the famous story of the apple and the arrow, nothing is said of it in the poem.

ON THE NEW HALF-PASTINGS.

Too small for any marketable shift,
What purpose can there be for coins like these?
Hush, hush, good sir! thus chaunteth the shift
Mar goes a wife to him who wants a rhinoceros.—Hood's Magazine.

IRON BRIDGE FOR THE NEVA.

Messrs. Barry, Curtis, and Kennedy, engineers of Liverpool, are constructing an iron bridge, by order of the Emperor of Russia, which is to cross the Neva at St. Petersburg. The extreme length of the bridge, will be no less than 1070 feet. The weight of iron alone will be nearly nine thousand tons; independent of the lamps and super-luminous with which it is the Emperor's intention to adorn it, and which together will probably weigh from 1000 to 2000 tons more. The weight of iron will thus exceed by nearly fivefold that consumed in the erection of the Menai Bridge. The cost of the iron alone will be upwards of £100,000.

AUTUMN LEAVES.

And must ye fade,
Ye autumn leaves, an idle play?
From rifled glade
And forest, must ye steal away,
To wither in unseen decay?
Sally forth, sally forth,
The very breeze, with warbling song,
That ye should die;
While gently, with reluctant wing,
It waives ye to your watery sleep.
In Nature's bright hours,
How bold and joyous have ye been;
What time for bowers
And solitary groves were seen,
Bathed in your own joyous green!

ANECDOTE OF "THE DUKE."

We have heard that on a recent visit of a section of the Archaeological Association to Dover, the Duke of Wellington, as constable of Dover Castle, returned to allow the learned members admission to that ancient and interesting fortress, to make sketches or memoranda. The duke has no sympathy with antiquarian or historical pursuits; witness his reply on being remonstrated with on the dangerous position of the National Records, placed over the ammunition in the Tower: "He would take care that the gunpowder received no injury!"—Kent Herald.

ANOTHER "ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER."

A somewhat interesting native of India, "Mohen Lal," arrived in London by the last overland mail. He is the same who travelled in Central Asia in disguise, with the late Sir Alexander Burnes, and subsequently published the journal in Calcutta. Since that period he has been devoted to British interests, and was greatly instrumental in effecting the deliverance of our prisoners in Afghanistan.

LITERAL CURIOSITY.

The 31st verse of the 7th chapter of Revelation contains all the letters of the alphabet:—"And I, even I, announce the King, do make a decree to all the treasures which are beyond the river, that whatsoever Revelation the prince, the series of the law of God of heaven, shall require of you, it be done speedily."

LIVING ON THE BEACH.

After Capt. Parry returned from his voyage of discovery, he was asked, at a dinner party where Lord Erskine was present, what he had his crew had lived upon when they were frozen up in the polar sea. Parry said they lived upon the seals. "And very good living too," said Erskine, "if you keep them long enough."

THE LAND OF LIBERTY.

The following is a copy of the "business-card" of some negro dealers at Mobile (Alabama). "J. H. Bondurant and Co. will constantly keep on hand a large and well selected lot of young negroes, of all descriptions, which they will sell for cash. They will also receive and sell negroes in commission. They will occupy the house formerly occupied by J. K. Zantz, No. 60, St. Michael's street, Mobile. J. H. Bondurant and J. K. Whitley, July, 1844."

SHAKESPEARE'S JUG AND CANE.

During the week of the Gloucester musical festival, there were exhibited the jug and cane of the immortal bard of Avon. The jug is of cream-coloured earthenware, and in shape it resembles a modern coffee pot. The height of it is nine inches and a half, and in the widest part it measures sixteen inches. Longitudinally it is divided into eight compartments, in each of which is represented the principal scenes of the Grecian mythology, beautifully executed, and quite perfect. The case is of the Malacca species, in beautiful preservation, the enamel being untouched. In length it is four feet seven and a half inches, four inches in circumference at the thickest part, and at the set-off for the head, of ten inches; it is three and one-eighth inches round. There is no doubt of the genuineness of both these articles.

CHEAP BEER FROM POTATOES.

The Prague Kreisblatt, a Bohemian journal, gives circumstantial information how to prepare a wholesome and palatable potato beer, by which every family can supply itself therewith at very trifling expense. Twenty-five gallons of such beer are made from half a bushel of potatoes, 20 pounds of malt, half a pound of hops, and two quarts of yeast. The cost of one ton of such beer does not exceed two shillings and sixpence, consequently the cost of a quart does not amount to a farthing.

AN INGENUOUS PLAN FOR PRE-PAYING LETTERS.

At the Waltham-Cross Post-office a clever expedient has been adopted for pre-paying letters. In the window of the office, in the place of a square of glass, a sheet of zinc is inserted, in which two longitudinal holes are cut—one for the receipt of letters and the other for postage. In the centre of the plate is a revolving handle, which sets upon some single machinery within side. Above the handle are these words—"Put your letter in and turn the handle up; put your penny in, then turn the handle over."

RECUPERATION.

Used by dentists, is simply silver refined to a very fine powder. This may be effected by the use of a fine file, and a simple process may answer the desired purpose. A sufficient quantity of this powder to be placed in the palm of the hand, with a small drop of quicksilver, and worked together till it unites to a soft paste. In this soft state, the tooth being properly washed dry it must be immediately pressed into the cavity, which must be carefully filled, but the paste must not project beyond the edges of the tooth. The most tender tooth may be filled by degrees without hurting the nerve, if the process be repeated every day, until the cavity be filled. In the course of two or three hours, the paste becomes as hard as the tooth. If the decay is not entirely removed previous to filling the tooth, the superfluous has the effect of discoloring the tooth, but where the decay is previously entirely removed, it not only arrests its further progress, but excluding the air, but it does not affect the colour of the tooth, and may preserve it for years.—From a Correspondent.

EXTRAORDINARY NOVELTY IN MANUFACTURES.

The French have recently made some very remarkable discoveries, by which they are enabled to make ornaments from "pearl." The pearl is reduced by heating to a fine pulp, and is then placed under a press, to force out the liquidity. In this state it may be converted into ornaments of every kind, such as are made in engraved leather. It is rendered firm by a solution of alum, or other adhesive material, it forms likewise a cheap and durable kind. Of brilliant tables, too, there are various specimens; a one ring and beautiful one has been produced in France, valued at 10,000.

HINT TO RACHTLONS.

When you "pop the question" to a lady, as it is with a hand of laugh, as if you were joking. If she accepts you, very well; if she does not, you can say, "you were only in fun."

A ROYAL LETTER.

The letter A is a fair way to be dined and dined. Her Majesty's first christening was Alexandra, her husband's, Albert, and their four children are called Adelaide, Albert, Alice, and Alfred.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

With the exception of a walking match—or a pedestrian feat, as the paragraph perpetuates—a little chicken, and a few partridges in the "farm yard" and the sports and amusements, both professional and amateur, the public has had a dull week of it. We need the million; the more we have the better the world was made for it. We have been drinking, and (perhaps) smoking at home, or gambling on the Continent, according to their several tastes. Now, then, the turn, our public have been ill-provided for, in the matter of the recreation. In racing, a little of the practical, and a good deal of the theoretical, has been current, to the which we proceed to address our consideration. Towards the finale of last week, rumours were rife about the defection of one of the principal literary speculators in the West-end. This was the landlord of the Grand Hotel in Covent-garden. On Monday, however, he attended at Tattersall's, when he stated his readiness to pay the holders of all his prizes, "provided they undertook to hold him harmless from all actions that might be brought against him, by the process of payment, for the space of a year." Whether anything has come of the proposal or not, we cannot tell, but if the winners have executed any such indemnity for the sake of some present cash, we do not envy them their supplies. Neither can we conceive the landlady's very modest speculation who made the requisition. Suppose a person asked permission to light a cigar by his gas, and the answer was—"With pleasure, if you will execute a policy of insurance to protect my house and furniture against fire for the next twelvemonth," would that have been an ordinary request? Yet he was bound to pay his debts without any reservation, while the cigar illuminating would be a matter of course.

Of the racing at the First October Meeting at Newmarket, very much does not occur to us as worthy special record. It was a very largely affair as regarded the "horses"—and being the best amount contributed—£200,000, as approved by the Club and the Town, and acted by her most gracious Majesty. Surely the Jockey Club must be a most flourishing society, for its gains are great, and its expenditure small, which is the way to grow rich. It commenced on Tuesday, and ended on Thursday—the three days producing less profit, and infinitely less profit, than our last Goodwood. The best of the two-year-old stakes was the Hopful—for which we must wait—the Maid of Orleans winning very cleverly. This smart little lady was bought for an odd song last year, and has put a pretty dollop of stakes into Mr. Gully's pocket, to say nothing of bets. Young John Day and her, and in the course of his achievement met with the oldest accident possible in reference to his position with La Pucelle d'Orléans. Foibles, Hallagh was the Grand Duke Michael—a set at £1000—in a canter. This horse, had he been sound, would have been a fearful runner for the Derby, but during Epsom races he was troubled with a cough about the size of General Tom Thumb. Red Deer was second—a case of deer-stalking—for a truth Frank Butler gave him the stick in earnest. The rich Burkesham Produce Stakes Lord George Bentinck's Coal was a very promising prospect for some of his famous sons, Bay Middleton. It seems not to tell how Pascal won the St. Leger by a distance; All-around my-Rat his Sweepstakes; and some other up another; the meeting was a sweltered as regarded the horse-race; and miserable enough to some of the visitors in the perspective of their own prospects. On Tuesday, in the second October, will come off the Italian inquiry, in the which certain rising divergences will undoubtedly come off—indifferently. That Italian was done for the Derby is admitted—generally they believe he had a double portion. One Mr. House—called Beaham "for short"—got up the "nubbin," it is said, assisted by some Samuel Rogers, a jester, who is now not in the picture. Brent, on being found out, "wrote to my Lord George Bentinck, and said (having previously sworn to the contrary in the House of Lords) that he was employed to make Ratan safe by Mr. Sackville of the city and Messrs. Sackville and of the West-end. No doubt it was a robbery, though its real character may never be separated from 'the chaff.' Rogers got at 1860—that's certain; and House "a good stake," but the contractors had second best of it, the murder coming out before they could get in their money. The fact is, the professional of the turf, as a body, have ever been a gang of thieves—and yet the professional of the earth have resented, and disapproved them. Well over a specie be discovered for this great scandal! The betting during the week was to the following effect, in reference to the two great issues now in the market.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The principal betting this afternoon was on the Cesarewitch, which, unlike the strong numerical display made below, is not likely to answer the purpose of the book-maker; the only horses at present in any real favour being the Duke of Portland's Staircase filly, Lord Althorpe's The Brewer, Sir C. Moore's Gleaser, and Mr. Dixon's Jenny; these four, and Stua, William le Gros, Campanero, and Albion, were backed even against the field. We submit the closing averages:—

THE GREAT MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE AT YORK.

The meetings of the British Association have continued through the week with increasing interest and popularity. "Thirteen years since," said the Earl of Rose, at the opening general meeting, "the Society, at its first meeting in York, was but an infant assembly, but it had now returned to its native place, full of health and vigour, having achieved great works in the intellectual and moral improvement of mankind, and having still higher prospects in view." In this estimate of their highly responsible but most gratifying position, the members and visitors seem generally to respond; and, as the pecuniary affairs of the institution are in a satisfactory condition, the good fellowship, the philanthropy, the patriotism of the sections has literally known no bounds. Even the statisticians, and their "dry-as-dust," but all-important papers have entered on a new life of smiles and welcome. In this propitious state of affairs it is not to be wondered at that the social instincts have been largely drawn upon to grace the "feast of reason," and give it "flow of soul." Dinners have abounded. His Grace the Archbishop of York has thrown open the hospitable doors of Bishopthorpe to hungry but enlightened multitudes. The same glorious example has been followed by the Earl Fitzwilliam, at the Earl de Grey House; and, as far as the unassuming hands of good old Yorkshire would permit, the very humblest visitor of the meeting has been made to feel that wisdom's ways are "ways of pleasure."

sanctness," and that in "Eboracum," at least, "her paths are peace." We congratulate the Association and the city of York on these happy circumstances, and should have been glad to have hailed their auspicious union at greater length; but the overwhelming claims of other departments of our paper forbid enlargement.

The papers read being mostly of local or abstract interest, we shall, notwithstanding their vast intrinsic value, adhere to our usual mode of illustration, and give only the principal points of such papers as touched upon subjects interesting to all readers.

The sub-section of ETHNOLOGY presents us with the first point of consideration. The members and friends of this division of the Association consist chiefly of the members of a society recently formed in London, called the Ethnological Society, whose object it is to enforce and enlarge the "proper study of mankind—MAN"—in all his races, varieties, and circumstances. In the metropolis, they succeeded in calling much attention to the great subject of their study; and we rejoice to learn that in their conjunction with the Association at York, they have also commanded a very large share of public consideration and esteem. At one of their meetings Mr. Schomburgk read an interesting paper on the aborigines of Guiana, accompanied with a living illustration, in the person of a Macusi Indian, dressed in the costume of his tribe.—Professor Latham communicated his researches on the southern limits of the Esquimaux language.—The Rev. W. Richards read a paper on his conjectured Asiatic origin of the Poly-nesian tribes, founded on certain correspondences between the Malayan and Polynesian languages.—But the paper which attracted most notice was one by Dr. Hodgkin, entitled, "The Dog as a Companion to Man;" or, in other words, an attempt to establish, by the analogy furnished in the variation of species in the dog tribe, the fact that the varieties of the human races are, in like manner, accidental, and not specific; and, consequently, that, whether black or white, red or olive, "God has made of one blood all that dwell upon earth." The paper, as might be expected, occasioned much discussion; and it has also been the subject, out of doors, of great consideration. The statements of the doctor may be summed up in the words of Currier, who says—"The domestic dog is the most complete, the most singular, and the most useful conquest that man has gained in the animal world. The whole species has become our property; each individual belongs entirely to his master, acquires his disposition, knows and defends his property, and remains attached to him until death; and all this, not through constraint or necessity, but purely by the influence of gratitude and real attachment. The swift nose, the strength, the sharp scent of the dog, have rendered him a powerful ally to man against the lower tribes; and were, perhaps, necessary for the establishment of the dominion of mankind over the whole earth." The dog is the only animal which has followed man over the whole earth." The position of the Ethnologist is another and wholly distinct matter. In the pursuit of their "theory of variation," some of them suppose the dog to be identical in species with the wolf; others, that old Reynard claims him as a cousin, at least; and others again, that dogs, both of high and low degrees, are simply so many translated jackals! Now, without going into the merits of the numberless arguments used by the partisans of this theory, we would simply direct attention to the circumstance that the Newfoundland, the water spaniel, and other water dogs, have their feet webbed, and are, in other respects, manifestly created for the special exigencies of an aquatic life; which is in no degree the case with the wolf, the much less a fox into a bull-dog. But this, although true, is perhaps, an extreme way of putting the case; let us then, come to the actual modus operandi of the affair. The shepherd's dog is taken to be the parent whence all varieties of dogs have descended; and this shepherd's dog is supposed to have had a wolf for his father, or a fox for his mother, or vice versa, or exclusively, from one of them. This is peculiarly unfortunate; for we find that offspring, be they direct or mules in their affinity, invariably inherit the instincts of their progenitors.

gallery of canine portraits—the heads given by Mr. Pritchard, the great partisan of the theory, and relied on by the dispartans of York—and tell us if this be not the true view of the case. The common origin of the human family—the descent of man from one pair—is a great truth, resting on wholly different foundations.

Another paper, which was received with great attention and deserved respect, was Professor Forbes' on Glaciers. His object was to establish the flexibility of on, or the jackal. It follows, therefore, that as a webbed foot is an organisation contrived for an especial purpose, the advocates of the "variation theory" must necessarily involve themselves in the absurdity of maintaining the truth of the exploded notions once so prevalent on the subject of spontaneous generation, accidental creation, creations of habit, and the like. We are quite ready to allow that domestication produces great changes in animals; but such changes

Wombwell's lion-tigers possess the noble bearing and sly malignity of their several parents. But the variationists tell us that the son of a wolf and a fox, both of them thieves, the staunch and incessant enemies of sheep, suddenly, fortuitously, oddly, and in total opposition to all the laws and analogies of nature, became, "lang syne," the friend of its parent's prey, and the honest, docile, faithful friend of man! At what period, let us ask, did this strange conversion take glacier ice by direct experiments. This doctrine is considered, we believe, to be necessary to account for the motion of the glacier; but the general nature of the subject will be best understood from the following extract from the Professor's account of the phenomena of glaciers, and by a reference to our cut, which exhibits very clearly this general form and character.

Professor Forbes says:—"The common form of glacier is a river of ice fill-

Fowls have been bred into thousands of varieties; but they have always continued fowls. place? "Lang syne" is not an adequate answer. The shepherd's dog is mentioned in the book of Job, the oldest book in the world; and the bones of species are found in recent strata. When then, and how, we ask, did the change take place? The real truth is, that the varieties of the dog are created species; that different kinds of the same genus were originally made by God to suit different climates and circumstances, and to serve the various wants of man. ing a valley, and pouring down its masses into other valleys yet lower. It is not a frozen ocean, but a frozen torrent. Its origin or fountain is in the ramifications of the higher valleys and gorges, which descend amongst the mountains, perpetually snow-clad. But what gives to a glacier its most peculiar and characteristic feature is, that it does not belong exclusively or necessarily to the snowy region already mentioned. The snow disappears from its surface in summer, and

There. They appeared to be burns, but I cannot say whether they died from the burns or after-drops. There were no indications in any other part the same job. This is in the same place where Williamson was taking down the mud and at the very same place where he had been working. When he left it place the ventilation was good. The air was usually good, and there was no deficiency. The pit, he thought, was one of the best-ventilated pits he ever knew, and he is upwards of fifty-three years old, and has been a pitman about forty-four years. Has not been at the place since the explosion. When he left there was no appearance of gas. In his opinion, the late explosion was purely accidental, and not caused by negligence. As far as he can judge, nothing could have prevented it.

By Mr. Marshall: Has worked in his life for nine collieries, and never saw one better ventilated. Lost a son by the explosion.

By the Coroner: Does not believe the explosion took place for want of ventilation.

By Mr. Marshall: When they were at work on Saturday morning, they heard a noise like thunder, in the goaf, and had never before heard such a noise; we thought it was above where we were working, and we left the place, and when it ceased we returned. The goaf is the place where all the coal has been removed. At that time the Davy lamps did not indicate the presence of gas. The same noise was heard shortly after again when they went in; it was not so loud as the first noise. They told one of the charges of the occurrence, and he said it was caused by the falling of one of the old boards, and that they saw themselves. The person to whom they told this was John Williamson, the deputy, who was killed.

Ralph Errington: Has been employed nearly eight years in Haswell Colliery, and worked with last witness, and left at ten o'clock on Saturday morning, when the ventilation was as good as possible. Can form no opinion as to the cause of the explosion, and cannot tell whether it was the result of accident or negligence. Nothing could have been done, in his opinion, by anticipation, to have prevented the accident. Where they were working the current of the air was so strong that they could scarcely keep their lamps burning.

By Mr. Roberts: If there had been a current of air going through the place where the accident occurred it would not have happened. Where he was working is the place where the accident is generally supposed to have commenced. The evidence of this witness was generally a corroborative of that previously given.

Thomas Scott: Lives at Haswell, and has been a pitman twenty-three years, eighteen of which he has been a haulier. He has been seven years and a half at Haswell pit, and has worked in the waste six years and a half. Was at work in the waste on Friday night, and left at two a.m. on Saturday. Was not at work at that time in the little pit. For a month previously had been working in the waste of the little pit—a month previously to Monday before the accident. Was HASWELL COLLIERY—THE SCENE OF THE LATE AWFUL EXPLOSION. through the whole of the waste during that time. The ventilation was always very good. No men have been working in that waste since he was in. Has been a little way into the waste since the explosion took place, and it was in a good state to-day at two o'clock. Could see no indications where the explosion took place. The Haswell pit was considered the best ventilated pit on the river Wear.

HASWELL COLLIERY EXPLOSION—BURIAL OF THE DEAD

Has worked in all parts of the pit, and never found any want of ventilation. Has frequently heard the men complain that there was too great a current of air in all parts of the pit. The three strange workmen in the waste are under the charge of three experienced pitmen, to whom they are only assistants, and in no way responsible for the work done; the experienced pitmen are also responsible, and if anything happens, they are accountable. The men that are with them have to take charge of both them and their Davy lamps. It was possible enough for the explosion to have taken place if there had been a current of air into every part of the pit. If a heavier body of gas came off than there was air to overpower, an explosion might be the result, and it is his opinion that was the case in this accident. It was possible for a sufficient quantity of gas to have come off from the removal of the jod as would cause the explosion. He has never seen any gas in the course of six years and a half in Haswell waste. He has known in the Charlie pit, at Lambton, the air as clear as in a bell, and in half an hour the Davy lamps were rolling full of gas. Considers the Davy lamp very secure—as secure, or more so, than any other that he knows anything about. Is very certain every care is taken that is possible in the air courses in the waste.

Mr. E. Fenwick Boyd: I am check viewer for the owner of the royalty of Haswell Colliery. Since the explosion I have been very frequently down the pit, and carefully examined the Meadows' flat. I found a very good air travelling, and marks on the whole side of the timber, the effects of the explosion, all in one direction. The stoppings and crossings were blown down in a contrary direction from the working places. There had been large falls of stone from the roof. I consider the explosion had taken place near the highest headways course of that flat, and near to the face of the working places. I also examined a few of the boards in the Brookley Whin's flat, and found the blast had gone in that direction, but the fire had not been so strong. I am in the habit of visiting 25 collieries, and I only know of one so well ventilated as Haswell—in the quantity of air, and general attention to direction of that air. On examining the temperature, I found it at the surface 46, and at the bottom of the pit (which is 160 fathoms deep), 58: at the face of the workings, close by where the bodies were found, 54. In one instance I recollect the temperature being reduced; the air was returned upon the furnace cooler than when it went in. I can only state that the explosion must have been occasioned by a lighted candle or lamp coming in contact with an explosive mixture.

After some other immaterial evidence, the inquest was adjourned till the next day (Wednesday).

THIRD DAY—WEDNESDAY.

The inquest was resumed this morning. The whole day was consumed in taking the evidence of Robert Thompson, master waterman of the pit, which went to corroborate that given on the previous day. His testimony went to show that nothing more could have been done to prevent the accident. After some discussion it was agreed to adjourn the inquest till Wednesday next week; and in the meantime the jury begged the coroner to request Mr. Nicholas Wood and Mr. George Hunter to examine the mine and report their opinion to the jury.

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS.

Haswell colliery is one of the most extensive in the county of Durham. It employs upwards of three hundred men and boys, and it is celebrated for the very superior quality of its coal.

The pit, though essentially one, is divided into separate workings, called respectively the Big-pit and the Little-pit. The explosion took place in the latter. The number of men and boys usually employed in this part is about one hundred, and when the explosion took place there were ninety-nine down—ninety-five of whom have perished. The other four would also, without doubt, have suffered, had not the course of the explosive current been intercepted by some waggon laden with coals, in what is called a "rolley" way—a railway used for the purpose of conveying the coals to the bottom of the shaft to be drawn to the bank. The four men who escaped were at the end of these waggons nearer to the shaft. They saw the flame approaching, having the appearance of forked lightning, when it fortunately struck the waggons referred to. The horse attached to them was killed, and thrown completely over in the form of a somersault, falling on his back.

About fifty of the unfortunate sufferers were interred on Monday, and the remainder on Tuesday afternoon. The funerals were very decently conducted, and the spectacle was a most touching and melancholy scene. The neighbourhood may truly be said to be the scene of lamentation and mourning, and woe; as the calamity has entered the shades of almost every inhabitant in the district, and some families have been bereaved of their only earthly support and protectors.

GREAT MASS MEETING AT PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.

The people of Rhode Island, it will be remembered, being discontented with the limited suffrage under the charter of Charles II., from time to time, petitioned for its extension: this was granted, but with so slow and niggard a hand, that they, at length, met in mass, remodelled the constitution on the universal suffrage principle, declared the existing government null, elected their own officers, and, with one Dorr at their head, marched to enforce the will of the people. But they were too late: the government was prepared for them; Dorr was taken, tried, and sentenced to hard labour for life, in the prison of the State. Hence the sympathising movement of delegates from various States, termed "the Great Mass Meeting for Democracy and Dorr."

This extraordinary and exciting assemblage took place on Wednesday, the 4th ult., at Providence. It was, indeed, a vast gathering: a steam-boat, chartered from New York, conveyed, at least 600 citizens to Providence: a band of music was on board, and the steamer was decorated with banners inscribed with democratic mottoes, and an excellent portrait of Governor Dorr; and loud and frequent were the salutes of the steam-boat bells at the wharves, &c., as the vessel of "troubled spirits" progressed.

The "Tenth Ward Hozer" which was placed on the bow of the boat saluted the crowds that were assembled on the wharves and piers, which were returned with the hearty cheers of the assemblages. The boat was crowded to overflowing, and such a scramble for berths, mattresses and sofas was never seen, except on board a North River steam-boat, when the fare was "fifty cents and found." The night on the sound was beautiful and clear, the moon shone silvery bright, and as the boat struggled through the waters with her hundred souls, she seemed a thing of life breathing and snorting through the ocean brine. After a pleasant run with a light breeze from the north east, she approached Providence at about nine o'clock in the morning, and arrived at the wharf at ten, under the salute of artillery, martial music, and the cheers of the dense assemblage.

A procession was then formed, headed by the Chief Marshal, and a cavalcade of 30 horsemen, and numbering "1956 ladies" in a body; "Revolutionary soldiers in carriages, 24; delegations and bands of music, &c. They proceeded through the principal streets of the city, accompanied by banners and devices, and numbering in procession 5731. The portrait of Governor Dorr, in an elegant frame, was carried at the head of the New York delegation; and this picture, the ladies, and the revolutionary soldiers, were the great points of interest in the procession.

Among the banners we noticed the following, carried by the ladies, which fully evince their spirited feeling on this occasion:—"We are Rhode Island women—friends of Liberty, Freedom, and equal and just laws;" "If this be treason, make the most of it;" &c. In the male part of the procession were the following, among others: "T. W. Dorr—I will not compromise the people's rights;" "Oh, Rhode Island woe—Whiggery has done this."

The procession passed in full view of the state prison, where Dorr is confined. From thence they proceeded to the Pickney Farm, the place selected for the vast assemblage to convene, which is about a mile northwest of the city, on the hill at the rear of the prison. The spot selected for the speakers was in a valley, forming an amphitheatrical view from each side, covering a space of about ten acres, which was filled with spectators, including several hundred ladies, who occupied the centre of the vast assemblage, with Mike Walsh in their midst, directly in front of the speaker's stand. A platform was erected at the foot of the valley, on which a band of music was stationed to enliven the scene. The utmost order prevailed—not a drop of intoxicating liquor was sold on the ground, nor was a person present who appeared to be labouring under its effects.

The meeting was organized by the selection of General Thomas F. Carpenter, as President, and thirty-one Vice Presidents, being one from each town in the State, and five Secretaries. The President called upon the Rev. Elder Wake-man, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Cumberland, to address the throng of Grace, which he did in language which is a curious specimen of electioneering piety.

A voice in the crowd here cried out, "I move we now proceed, forthwith, to liberate Thomas W. Dorr from the State Prison," which was followed by cries of "no, no!"—"order, order." The band of music then struck up the national air of "Hail Columbia," concluding with "Yankee Doodle."

The meeting was then addressed by the President, after which the assemblage became so extensive that other speakers took the stand occupied by the music at the foot of the valley, and the report says, "addressed the lower five acres of the audience."

The resolutions were next read, embodying the views of the suffrage party, and the sovereignty of the people, a protest against Governor Dorr's imprisonment; against the election of Henry Clay. Another resolution sympathized with O'Connell; and another in favour of Polk and Dallas, and their principles. Indeed, the object of the meeting was a little for Dorr, but a great deal for the Democratic Presidential candidates, Polk and Dallas.

We have not space to enumerate the speakers. Letters were read, approving of its objects, from Gen. Jackson, James Buchanan, Martin Van Buren, Colonel Johnson, Silas Wright, &c.

In the yard of the prison where Dorr was confined, several companies of soldiers were stationed, as well as in the armories at the upper part of the city. Several pieces of artillery were stationed in front of the prison; and one of the soldiers who had the charge of them, replied to a question of a New Yorker by the presentation of a six-carrel pistol to his breast, with directions to make himself scarce or risk the consequences. Crowds of persons were scattered about the prison during the day, and from one of the cells, supposed to be that of Governor Dorr, a white handkerchief, marked with stripes and stars with a piece of charcoal, was every now and then thrust forth, as if to satisfy the spectators that the inmate was rejoicing in spirit, although his body was entombed in a dungeon.

Perhaps, after all, the greatest attractions of the day were the ladies' white banner, on which they had worked—"If this be treason, make the most of it;" and the speakers at the various hustings ringing the changes during the day.

THE KING OF THE FRENCH AT WINDSOR.

WINDSOR has been the place, and Louis Philippe the person, which have been combined, for the past week, in all conversations. There is generally some one topic or occurrence which absorbs all the attention a busy people can give to the events of the hour; other subjects are alluded to, but it is the great one only that is discussed; and thus, though the everlasting tide of events, which "knows no retiring ebb, but flows right on," throws to the surface its usual number of casualties, public and private, we pass them by with slight notice and slighter comment; they may be quite as great in themselves, in their future consequences perhaps more important; but some of them are removed from us by distance, and consequences are things evoked only by time. Although, then, the news from Tahiti is not such as to remove all uneasiness, and though the materials for some stormy debates are being wafted from India in the vessel that brings Lord Ellenborough, we hope the best as to the first; and, on the principle that it is useless to meet evils half way, postpone consideration of the latter; and with little talk about either, turn to the Royal Castle of Windsor, where the Queen of England is entertaining, as a guest, the King of the French.

This visit the French Opposition Journals are converting into a national grievance. If so much political importance is attached to it, we, as Englishmen, ought to look upon it in the light of a national triumph. Yet we are content to take it for what it really is—a courteous return of the compliment paid by her Majesty to Louis Philippe last year, in accepting the hospitality of the Chateau d'Eu. Our brethren of the French press persist in seeing all sorts of plots and schemes for the degradation of France, and the aggrandisement of England in the banquets and concerts and receptions given in honour of the King. His answer to the worthy mayor and councillors of Portsmouth will, no doubt, be construed into "another insult" to France, as the papers have already designated the resolution of the Duke of Wellington to receive the Monarch on his landing, forgetting, or possibly not knowing, that Lord Lieutenant of Hampshire, it was on the part of the Duke a mere act of official duty—and official duty, even to its minutiae, the Duke of Wellington was never known to neglect. When her Majesty went to France, we never dreamed that the excursion was part of a diplomatic web of policy, the terminating knots of which were to be tied amid the uncorking of Champagne bottles in the forest fêtes of Eu.

But the French do not make so quiet and simple an estimate of the value of royal movements; the power of the crown is great, and under Louis Philippe does not seem likely to be lessened; he is hesitating to be a man that acts but little from impulse, and much from calculation, so that in attributing to his journey a purpose wholly political, the French may be more readily excused than we should be, if we attached the same motive to every one of the now ordinary progresses of the Queen. But for the obstinacy and perverted ingenuity with which the organs of the Opposition persist in seeing in every little act a determination to injure and insult the French people, they are wholly unjustifiable. The wish to do so does not exist among us, and, as a consequence, our acts do not deserve so perverted an interpretation.

It is absurd to suppose that sovereigns are always statesmen, that they never drop their official dignity, or relax into human beings, receiving and returning those kindly offices of courtesy and hospitality which spring from feeling, and are not dictated by policy. Is there nothing in the past history of Louis Philippe that can account, and naturally account, for a wish to visit in his old age the country that afforded him an asylum in his struggles with the destiny that surrounded his youth? Let us cast a rapid glance over his career; it is one which shows that the highest earthly rank is not exempt from human vicissitudes, or from the operation of "time and chance which happens unto all."

Louis Philippe is the son of the too famous Duke of Orleans, who lent the aid of his fortune, which was immense, and his talents, of which the same could not be said, to the revolutionary party of France in all the agitations that preceded the total destruction of the monarchy. To fall in with the levelling temper of the times, he first threw off his rank, and styled himself simply Citizen Egalité; with at least equal readiness he threw off that which is better and higher than rank and title; he must have divested himself of feeling and affection ere he could have voted for the death of Louis XVI. When the revolution was degenerating into anarchy, and, like Saturn, was devouring its own children, his extreme opinions did not save him from the penalty attached to the crime of being wealthy and nobly born, and he fell beneath the guillotine, the least pitied perhaps of all the victims of that horrible epoch. His son was born in 1773, and the worst of all these scenes were acted during the first twenty years of his life. We pass over his education by Madame de Genlis—preferred by his father on account of her talents, to a tutor—and take him up at that part of his history when he was earning a name among men as an officer in the army of the Republic, which was engaged on the frontiers against the invading force of Austria. He served his first campaign, in 1792, under Dumouriez; he had for a short time been attached to the force under the command of General Kellerman, and was present with his younger brother, the Duke de Montpensier, at the battle of Valmy. But it was at the battle of Gemappes, under Dumouriez, that he first distinguished himself. The action was fought on the 6th of November, 1792, and to the young Duke de Chartres, the title of the eldest sons of the House of Orleans, was entrusted the command of the right wing of the French army. The attack on the strong position occupied by the Austrian centre was at first successful, but the advancing force was afterwards checked, and the check became a repulse; it was in the rallying his broken troops, forming the several battalions into one large one, inspiring the mass with confidence, and leading them on to a complete victory, that Louis Philippe displayed the bravery, cool presence of mind, and power of combination which are the first qualities of a commander. He again signalled himself at Anderlecht, on the 14th of November; at Turenne, on the 19th; and on the 27th, at Vaux. But his connection with the French Republic was not destined to be a long one; the battle of Nerwinde, fought in March, 1793, was unfavourable to the French army; the formidable Committee of Public Safety had grown powerful, cruel, and suspicious, and punished with death those generals who chanced to be unsuccessful. Thirteen days after the battle, Dumouriez and the Duke de Chartres both received orders to repair to Paris and account for their defeat. The mandate was equivalent to a sentence of death, and to avoid it, there was no expedient but flight. The general and the prince therefore mounted their horses and set off for the frontiers. The evasion was suspected—for, like all the generals of the Republic, Dumouriez was surrounded with spies—they were pursued and all but overtaken, and a volley of balls sent after them by the men they had so recently commanded was the parting salute which the French army gave its officers. It passed them by more harmless in its effect than its intention, and the fugitives proceeded directly to Mons, the head quarters of the Austrian army. Here Louis Philippe was pressed to accept a commission in the Austrian service, but, with a very proper spirit, he refused, in any capacity, to bear arms against his country. From henceforth his life, for many years, was that of a poor exile. He went to Switzerland, and, under the assumed name of Chabaud, obtained, after a strict examination of his ability, the appointment of mathematical teacher in the College of Reichenau. He had been here for eight months, when the news of his father's dreadful fate compelled him to seek change of scene. He went to Hamburg, and from thence travelled on foot, with nothing but a knapsack and a staff, through great part of the north of Europe—visiting Sweden, Norway, Lapland, and the North Cape—and, during his pilgrimage, meditating, probably, the fallen fortune of his house, but scarcely dreaming of its future elevation. It was in consequence of a negotiation opened with him by the French Directory, that he embarked for the United States. He again returned to Europe, and fixed his residence in England, with his two brothers, the Duke of Montpensier and Count Beaujolais. They were reconciled to Louis XVIII., and the elder branch of the family, from whom they had been estranged; were received at Court, and lived in good society, quietly, and without ostentation. Thus years passed away, till the death of his two brothers induced Louis Philippe to leave England for awhile. He proceeded to Sicily, and there met the Princess Amelia, daughter of the King of Naples, whom he married in 1809; and the union being one into which considerations of state and ambition did not enter, it has proved a happy one. He resided at Palermo, with his bride, till the fall of Napoleon, when he returned to Paris, watching, but not joining in, the policy of the Government. When the return of Napoleon from Elba drove Louis XVIII. from his throne, the Duke of Orleans did all in his power to keep the soldiers of the Army of the North faithful to the King, but could not succeed against the enthusiasm awakened by the very name of the Emperor. He therefore left France, and returned to his former residence, at Twickenham. Shortly came the battle of Waterloo, and the restoration of the Bourbons. The Duke of Orleans returned to France, but only to be coldly received at Court; the King mistrusted him; but the species of persecution to which he was subjected by the Monarch increased his popularity with the people. Louis died, and the fatal policy pursued by Charles X. filled up the measure of popular indignation. The Revolution of July, 1830, burst like a thunder-clap on Europe; and in the dissolution of the Government that followed, the Duke of Orleans was nominated "Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom," a dignity which he soon converted into that of "King of the French," with more power, and more ability to use it, than any King of the Bourbon race has possessed since the days of Louis XIV.

And this Monarch, after so many changes, is again in England, not as an exiled man, but as a crowned head, the guest of royalty, received with all the pomp, pride, and circumstance that attend on kingly state. May he not wish, on the verge of life, to see once more the land that must be to him linked with so many recollections? We cannot see anything in the visit that is not graceful and natural. The supposition that Louis Philippe would engage in a deliberate conspiracy against the honour and interests of his country is too absurd to obtain credit from any one but the conductors of the French Opposition press, for whom nothing seems too absurd when England or the English are in question.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Our news from France this week is but scanty. The Paris papers, like those on this side of the Channel, are chiefly filled with incidents connected with the departure of the King for England. His Majesty has made his visit to our Queen the occasion for an act of clemency, and has ordered the liberation of a number of political prisoners. The Moniteur publishes their names, amounting in all to nearly 60. They are for the most part obscure persons, implicated in the insurrection of the 12th and 13th of May, 1839, in Paris; in the Republican plot of Marseilles; the expedition of Louis Napoleon to Sicily; and the attempt of Quinquet against the lives of the Dukes of Orleans and Anjou.

The most remarkable among them are—Hubert, Bouffet, Montauban, Orlé, Bataille, Berchet, Becker, Dourlan, Dupuy, Hendrick, Herbulot, Dubouard, Bonfond, Elie, Fovartier, Ormado, Lombard, Bourdillon, Louis Dufour, &c.

Arrangements have been made in Paris to procure the most speedy transmission of news from Louis Philippe, and, in his Majesty's absence, the Duke de Nemours was to transact official business with the Ministers.

The Sémaphore de Marseilles of the 13th inst. brings news from Algeria of the 25th ult. The Duke d'Angoulême arrived at Rome on the 18th ult. The Prince having been complimented by the Mayor of that town, replied:—

"I am very grateful to you for the flattering sentiments you express towards me and my family. The King has long demonstrated the lively interest he takes in the future welfare of Algeria; he proved it by actions as well as words, and will be happy to hear that his intentions are so well appreciated. Called by his will to the command of this noble province, I have endeavoured to study all its wants. Those of the district and town of Bone are well known to me, and you may rest persuaded that your interests will not have a more zealous advocate than me."

The Duke de Glucksberg has left Paris for Madrid, whence he is to proceed to the Kingdom of Morocco. He was the bearer of the treaty of peace between that power and France, ratified by the French Government. The King had appointed the Duke de Glucksberg officer of the Legion of Honour.

M. Lévain, former member of the National Convention and Counsellor of the Court of Cassation until 1814, when he resigned his functions, not to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the Bourbons, died a few days ago in the 75th year of his age, at Clercy, where he had resided since his retirement from public life.

One of the papers before us publishes a letter from Cadix of the 25th ult., mentioning the complete evacuation of the island of Mogadore by the French, and the arrival at Cadix of the garrison and the remainder of the squadron. The Moorish envoy sent from Tangier, in the Cavite, to inform his countrymen of the conclusion of peace, was unable to meet in the town a single inhabitant to whom he could communicate that pleasing intelligence. Ever since the bombardment, Moors had been daily entering Mogadore, to search for booty among its ruins. On the 12th, these plunderers accidentally set fire to a mine, which had been opened under one of the forts, commanding the channel between the island and town, and the battery situated at the gate of the Marins. The latter was blown up by the Moors; but the fear leading to the powder magazine under the fort having been extinguished, no explosion took place. On the 12th, the French garrison was awake by the report of an explosion which completely destroyed that fort. The Emperor of Morocco had accepted the mediation of France for the adjustment of his differences with Denmark and Sweden, and it was believed that he would renounce the tribute paid to him by those two powers in virtue of ancient treaties.

The Journal des Débats has an admirable article in answer to the epigrammatic and abusive effusions of some of the revolutionary journals on the subject of the visit of the King to England. It says:—"The Queen of Great Britain is preparing to give the King of the French a reception worthy of him and of England. The nation unites in feeling with the Sovereign, and in preparing festivities for the officers of the French navy, as the Court is preparing a similar honour for the King. We should have imagined that such a spontaneous manifestation would have been regarded as a proof of good feeling and of sincere cordiality. It appears that we were mistaken to think so, and that England is perfidious. We should have thought that those preparations were to do us honour; it appears that the purpose is to insult us. It is France which has been sacrificed to prepare the King's journey; it is, again, France which will be insulted during the King's stay in the country of an ally. What, then, is that grand affront which England intends us? She sends the Duke of Wellington to meet the King! This is the insult offered to France, and to the revolution of July! This is, in truth, to display a strange knowledge of the dignity of one's country! Assuredly we cannot efface history. We cannot prevent this name from being mixed with the most painful, as well as with the most glorious, period of our annals. But is France, then, so feeble—is she so small, that she cannot look those men in the face whom she formerly engaged on the field of battle? When the first Lieutenant of the Emperor proceeded to assist at the coronation of Queen Victoria, did England perceive an insult in his presence? Did she attribute as a crime to the veteran of all the wars of the Empire the recollections which attach to his name and to his illustrious reputation? Has nothing occurred during thirty years? And is the Revolution of 1830, which has replaced us in the first rank amongst free nations, nothing? England sends her most illustrious citizens to meet the Sovereign of France. This is termed an insult to the Revolution of July; we consider it as an act of homage paid to it. It is precisely because England sees beyond the King, or rather, sees in the King the nation over which he reigns, and the revolution from which he springs, that the reception is given to him which does honour to the British nation."

"Richard in Palestine," a new opera in three acts, was performed for the first time at the Académie Royale de Musique of Paris on last Monday night. It appears to have met with moderate success, although its music on a whole is pronounced very splendid. The libretto, which is by M. P. Feuchère, is founded on Sir Walter Scott's novel. The music is by M. A. Adam.

The latest Madrid letters state that the Count Fontes has been appointed by the Queen as President of the Senate, and the Duke de Gor and General Espelita Vice-Presidents.

The Madrid Gazette contains a royal decree ordering the establishment of a telegraphic line between Madrid and Iran.

There is now political news, but reports were very prevalent of an approaching change of ministry.

Our letters from Lisbon of the 1st instant, announce the opening of the Cortes on the previous day. The Minister Caltel presented a report to both Chambers, explanatory of the exercises of the extraordinary powers conferred on the Government. The Duke de Palmella presided over the Chamber of Peers. Senhor Rodriguez Magalhães appeared in the Deputies as a leader of the opposition. The Government, on a division in the Peers, had a majority of five. The majority in the Chamber of Deputies is supposed to have fallen off, but is still considerable. The report of the Minister was referred to a committee, and a bill of indemnity was demanded for the Government.

The tobacco, soap, and gunpowder contracts had been let most advantageously for 1,331 contos, with the condition annexed of a loan of 1,000,000 sterling to Government, at five per cent. and at par, to be reduced within twenty-three years.

On the 24th ult., a decree was published, instituting a tribunal for the trial of persons charged with slave-trading, and found on board captured slavers, at Angola.

THE WEST INDIES.—The Royal Mail Company's steamer the Seymour has arrived from the West Indies.—The dates of the papers brought by this conveyance are—Demerara, of the 3d; Trinidad and Antigua, the 3d; Barbadoes, the 4th; St. Lucia, the 5th; St. Kitt's, the 5th; and Jamaica, St. Vincent's, and Dominica, the 7th ult. There is little in the papers worth notice, except an account of the shock of an earthquake on the 18th of August, which was felt severely in Demerara, Barbadoes, and Trinidad, but no damage was the result. It seems to be expected, that as the shock proceeded from the interior of Guiana, the full effects will have been experienced in the neighbourhood of Caracas, and hence the next accounts from these localities are looked for with some interest.

The Jamaica papers report a very favourable account of the weather, and the prospects of the crops equally so. Coolie immigration, it is supposed, will not be favourably regarded by the new House of Assembly, to follow on the general election which was going on, but to African immigration it is said there does not exist any strong objection.

The commercial intelligence by this mail is exceedingly meagre. The accounts respecting the prospect of the ensuing sugar crop, are more than usually favourable, if nothing afterwards occurs to disturb it.

PERU.—News has been received of another revolution in Peru, which took place on the 17th of July. The government was entirely changed. Vivanco's authority was no longer acknowledged, but that of Rios, a civilian, and a man of the people in some measure. Rios is a man of large property, and supported Vivanco's cause, in the hope and expectation of procuring for the country some cessation from the constant round of revolutions which have continued to distract it. The movement has proved very popular, and much enthusiasm has been displayed by the whole population.

FURTHER NEWS FROM TAHITI.

ANOTHER INQUIRY TO THE BRITISH FLAG.—The Archipel, which has arrived at Papeete from Sydney, whence she sailed on the 8th of June, brings an account of a serious outrage committed on the British flag at Tahiti, on the 4th of April, by the French commander, Brust, in command at that island.

It appears that the Harand, Commander Bell, on her passage from the Sandwich Islands to Sydney, received instructions from Admiral Thomas, of her Majesty's ship Dublin, lying at the former port, to touch at Tahiti, with despatches for the acting British Consul there. At the same time, Captain Bell was specially charged by the Admiral not to recognise the French authority in the execution of this mission. Accordingly, on the date above-mentioned, the Harand arrived off Tahiti, and having dispatched a boat and four hands, under command of Lieutenant Rose, to her Majesty's ship Basilik, lying at anchor in the roadstead, they were interrupted in their passage thither by a large armed barge belonging to one of the French frigates, the officer on board of which stated that he had orders to take the British boat and crew to his commodore. This act Lieutenant Rose protested against, when, the French being about to use force, Lieutenant Rose at once surrendered his sword, and stated that he considered himself their prisoner. They were then taken alongside the French frigate and detained some hours, after which they were released and allowed to go on shore, the French Admiral afterwards sending an apology to Commander Bell, of the Harand, for the interruption. On Lieutenant Rose's return to the Harand she immediately sailed for Sydney, and it is said that Lieutenant Rose has come home expressly with despatches to the Admiralty, detailing the affair.

Mrs. Pritchard (the lady of Mr. Consul Pritchard) and her three daughters have arrived in London. They came home on board the harque Cape Breton, Capt. Cair, which left Valparaiso on the 11th of June, and arrived at Co. K on the 12th of October, bringing Government despatches from the master of the Basilik, on board of which Queen Pomaré has taken refuge, and from Admiral Thomas on the North American station. Mrs. Pritchard and her daughters reached Bristol on Saturday, and London the same evening. They are under the roof of the Rev. James Sherman, minister of Surrey Chapel. Mrs. Pritchard left Tahiti towards the end of April, and arrived at Valparaiso on the 1st of June, staying there ten days. The day before leaving Tahiti, she went on board the Basilik, and had an interview with Queen Pomaré. Her Majesty had been very unwell, but was then recovering. She is accompanied on board the Basilik by her husband and three children (who are eight, six, and two years of age respectively), and also by her mother, aunt, and household servants. She is totally without money or provisions, the French Governor Brust having strictly prohibited all communications from the shore. The commander of the Basilik, however, allowed the ketch's boat to visit the shore, and bring off supplies of provisions deposited there for the purpose. The information which Mrs. Pritchard brings of the state of the island is distressing. She confirms the details given of the battle of Mahana. The Tahitians protest that so long as a single Frenchman remains upon the island they will fight. The number of natives who have been induced to side with the French is very small, not exceeding twenty; while, as a counterpoise, a much greater number of French soldiers had passed over with their arms to the ranks of the Tahitians. The mass of the natives were in their mountain fastnesses, with plenty of provisions; and the fort which was abandoned by the French after the battle of Mahana, was held, as before, by the advance post of the native forces. When Mrs. Pritchard left the island, nearly all the missionaries had gone. The only persons connected with the mission who were actually on the island at Mrs. Pritchard's departure were believed to be the Rev. Messrs. Moore and Darling, Mr. Buchanan, schoolmaster, and Mr. Stone, printer. The people having nearly all retired to the mountains, congregations of 1500 or 1600 souls were reduced to less than twenty persons each.

The France contains the following account of the affair between the French and the natives of Tahiti, of which we have already given an account:—"The natives assembled about twelve miles from the town occupied by our troops, constructed redoubts, mounted them with seven cannon, and manned them with the best of the population. Five hundred French landed, and attacked these works, which for three long hours resisted the most determined assaults. At last four soldiers, exasperated by the fall of about fifty of their messmates, two officers, and two divers, rushed on sword in hand with irresistible fury. Having gained possession of the redoubts, they found the dead bodies of 92 natives, and two English deserters, who had joined them. The natives, disheartened by a defeat so complete, dispersed in all directions. Our loss has been 52 men hors de combat, and 25 killed. The two officers died on the ground. One of the divers (Colonde) received a ball in the arm; the other (Dubre) had his thigh broken, a ball in the fleshy part of one of his arms, and another on his breast. There are no other fears of him than that he must lose his leg."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

This being the day to which Parliament was prorogued, both houses met, for the purpose of further proroguing them till December. Shortly after one o'clock the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharfedale, and the Earl of Dalhousie, dressed as Lords Commissioners, took their seats below the throne, and Mr. Fulman, the Deputy Clerk of the Black Rod, was ordered by their lordships to summon the House of Commons, to hear her Majesty's commission for the further prorogation of parliament read.

Mr. Fulman then retired from the house to summon the Commons, and in a few minutes Mr. Ley, the junior table clerk, together with several other officers of the House of Commons, appeared at the bar.

The commission for the further prorogation of parliament was then read by the clerk at the table, at the conclusion of which

The Lord Chancellor, in the name of her Majesty, declared the parliament prorogued to Thursday, the 12th of December.

The whole proceeding did not occupy their lordships ten minutes.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

A BANKRUPT REMOVED FOR ALLEGED FRAUD.—At the Court of Bankruptcy, on Tuesday, the case of Mr. Weston, the stock-broker, was adjudicated upon. The bankrupt, described as a stockbroker, carrying on business in Throgmorton-street, appeared before the Court on his adjourned last examination. His debts are stated to be £287, and his liabilities, connected with stock transactions, £2459. He was opposed on behalf of several creditors, and the grounds of complaint were unsatisfactory accounts and the improper application of monies invested in Dutch stock in his own and in the names of a Mr. Hanner, as trustees for Lady Hayes. The amount of cash invested in Dutch stock was £1909, the greater part of which was ultimately lost in speculations entered into between Hanner and the bankrupt. Mr. Commissioner Evans refused to allow the bankrupt to pass his last examination, and adjourned the case sine die, remarking that it was one of gross fraud. Unless better accounts were furnished, he could never hope to pass.

THE GAMBLING-HOUSE CASES.—On Tuesday, at the Middlesex sessions, some anxiety was excited to know the decision of the court on the appeals made to convictions for gambling. The first appeal was that of "John Harlowe, against a conviction of E. H. Malby, Esq., for gambling in the house No. 15, Leicester-street, which excited so much interest about six or seven months ago. Mr. Bodkin and Mr. Montague Chambers appeared for the respondents, and Mr. Clarkson for the appellants. Mr. Bodkin, after raising several technical objections as to the jurisdiction of the court, proceeded to state the facts of the case as follows:—"The appellant, John Harlowe, kept a cigar-shop at the house No. 15, Leicester-street, being part of a house of which he was proprietor, and the upper part of which was used as a common gaming-house, and with which and his shop a private door opened. Although he was not proved to have been gaming in the upper part of the house, or taking part in any of the transactions going on there, yet he was employing out of it in his shirt-sleeves, continually, shortly before the police broke in; and he (Mr. Bodkin) thought that, under such circumstances, the conviction was good. The learned counsel then called Mr. Inspector Baker, of the C division of police, who detailed all the facts of the case, which must be fresh in the memory of our readers, and was subjected to a searching cross-examination by Mr. Clarkson. A map of the premises having been produced in court, the Assistant-Judge, after a consultation with the Bench, considered that the fact of the existence of a direct communication between the two houses had not been sufficiently proved, and decided that the conviction should be quashed. The convictions of Wm. Curry and Joe. Everett, for keeping a gambling-house at 15, Jersey-street, were also quashed, the court considering that the evidence did not support them."

A LUNATIC THIEF.—At the Middlesex Sessions, on Wednesday, Charles Augustus Cook was indicted for having stolen two baskets and a quantity of pearls, the property of W. Atwood. The case was clearly proved against the prisoner, who cross-examined the witnesses with much readiness and acuteness, and then entered into a rambling story in his defence. The jury found him guilty.—Mr. Russell, one of the visiting justices of the New Prison, said he had made inquiries into this case, and found that the prisoner had been confined in a lunatic asylum, from which he had escaped.—The Prisoner: Oh, yes, I have been put into an asylum, but I am not mad.—The Judge (Mr. Sergeant Adams) said he thought the best plan would be to pass a sentence of imprisonment upon him, and then it probably would be ascertained whether he were sane or not.—The Prisoner: Oh! you had far better transport me—send me out of the country. I had better go out of it. I don't want to stop in it.—The Judge: We think it may be the greater charity to you to send you to prison here, where you will be taken care of.—The Prisoner: No; you had much better send me away.—The Judge: We think otherwise. We think we may do you more service, and have you more comfortably taken care of.—The Prisoner: The fact then is this,—you are as mad as I am. But I am not mad; no, not I. You ought to be here instead of me; I have seen much greater rogues than I am in this court to-day. Send me out of the country. It is highly inconvenient for me to stop in it to be treated as I have been. For the last two years I have been made to spend the greater part of my time in prisons or in lunatic asylums; but, mind, I am not mad; no more mad than you are; and that is the way I have been treated; but it is very unpleasant, as well as inconvenient.—The Judge: No doubt it is; and therefore we will imprison you once more, in order that you may be cured, if possible.—The father of the prisoner here stepped forward, and stated that his son's mind was not right, and expressed a hope that he might be sent to Hanwell.—The Judge said that would be done, if, upon examination, he were found to be as he feared he was. The sentence of the Court was, that he be imprisoned for six months.—The Prisoner: Thank you. It's all very well; but you had better send me out of the country. I don't want to stop in it. Ah! the Queen—why, what is it? First Regime!—the name ought to be Regime Tyranny,—that's what it should be.

INCENDIARY FIRE NEAR SOUTHAMPTON.—On Sunday evening a destructive fire broke out at Northampton, four miles from Southampton, supposed to be an incendiary one. It burned down the greater part of an extensive homestead, the property of Mr. Pridie, consisting of several stacks of corn, barns, granaries, and other outbuildings. The loss is very considerable.

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

HIS MAJESTY KING LOUIS PHILIPPE.

This important event has already excited very considerable interest and expectation, to gratify which, we have been fortunate enough to secure such authorised aid as will enable us to illustrate the principal scenes of the Royal Visit with strict attention to fidelity of detail and circumstance, and due regard to artistic execution. The Landing of Louis Philippe at Portsmouth, and his Majesty's Reception by our Gracious Queen at Windsor Castle, are the leading incidents of this week's illustrations; but, in our next journal, we shall resume this graphic record, with several more pictures of the magnificent hospitalities at Windsor, and of the most attractive characteristics of this deeply interesting visit.

We now proceed with a copious account of the several incidents, commencing with

THE EMBARKATION AT TREPORT.

On Monday evening his Majesty and suite reached the picturesque town of Treport. As it was known that the King could not arrive before nightfall, all the houses were illuminated, while the wives and daughters of the fishermen, to a very considerable number, lined the way from the quay to the border strand, where lay the royal gig, each holding a flaming torch; the effect was most striking from its cheerful and primitive simplicity. About six o'clock, three carriages dashed down, amidst cries of "Vive le Roi," and from these descended the King, wrapped in a travelling cloak, his son the Duke de Montpensier, M. Guizot, and other distinguished personages. The King led the way to the admiral's gig, bowing with marked courtesy to his fair guard of torch-bearers. The gig dashed through a heavy swell over the bar, riding gallantly; soon afterwards the officers of the different ships went on board a tender steamer, and followed the gig at a respectful distance. The Gomer, waiting for the King, was anchored at about two miles from the shore. Immediately upon the approach of the canal, as it is called, a sudden illumination took place of the most striking effect; blue lights were shown from the deck and from the yards, so that the vessel seemed enveloped in a sheet of flame. Rocket after rocket was then shot up, and replied to by the Calman and the Elan. The fleet did not weigh anchor for a full hour afterwards, when the Gomer, which lay nearest the shore, sailed past and took the lead. Her appearance was lovely; the light from the range of cabin windows was intense enough to look like an illumination, while three lights of great brilliancy were attached to the stern: she seemed a moving illuminated castle. During the King's embarkation, the marine band played away merrily; and the sound over the water, coming with the effect of the light upon the waves, the rockets in the air, the cheering of the sailors, and the shouts of "Vive le Roi" from the shore, formed a most beautiful and affecting scene.

THE ARRIVAL AT PORTSMOUTH.

On Tuesday morning, the guns of the Queen, 110 gun-ship, at Spithead, began to boom in the distance, announcing the coming in sight of the squadron of the eagerly expected Sovereigns. This occurred at a quarter to eight, and King Louis Philippe might have arrived much earlier. The wind and the weather were so fine and favourable that he neared our shores at seven o'clock, but knowing that his Royal Highness Prince Albert would not reach Portsmouth until nine or ten o'clock, the steam squadron was ordered to stand out to sea once more. The firing of the Queen brought out the three regiments of the Line and the division of the Royal Marines from their quarters, with their bands playing and colours flying, whilst the whole population thronged the beach. This general movement, combined with the display of flags streaming in every direction in the town, and covering the yachts and ships of war in the port, presented a scene of animation beyond all power of description. Every moment this scene increased in interest. The French squadron came on slowly and majestically, each ship of war saluting as it advanced, and each battery in turn taking up the salute: the climax, however, was when the armed steamers entered the harbour; then the cheers of the population on the shores, and of the sailors who manned the yards, struggled in intensity of sound with the reports of the cannon fired by the batteries, by the Excellence, and by the Victory (Nelson's renowned ship), moored within the harbour. Whilst the French steam squadron was coming to the moorings which Admiral Launay, its commander, had fixed upon a few days previously, the troops took up their position. They were disposed in two lines, each three deep, from the Royal Dock-yard to the railroad terminus. At the inner and outer gates of the railroad station at Gosport, and in other favourable spots along the line of the royal progress, tasteful triumphal arches of laurel and other evergreens, with complimentary mottoes, had been erected. From the moment she anchored, the Gomer, which bore his Majesty, was an object of riveted and eager attention; round her crowded every disposable boat or small craft about the port, whilst the most distant spectators examined her with their telescopes. Nor was this steam-frigate unworthy of their curiosity. She presented an aspect at the same time imposing and interesting. Her form is admirable: the wide expanse of her spoolless deck, her masts, yards, and rigging show she has been the pet handiwork of the French shipwrights, and that she is the favourite of her captain and crew, who manoeuvred her in silence, and with a most seamanklike celerity and ease. Below she has all the character of a floating palace—the drawing-rooms are as convenient as they are magnificent; that in which the King received his visitors has its sides lined with crimson velvet, whilst in every direction you behold tables of the rarest woods, and luxurious conveniences and sofas lined with yellow satin. (One of the engravings represents this magnificent steam-ship.)

On the deck could be easily discovered, on one side, the French Marines in their peculiar picturesque uniforms, with their officers, and the band of the Princes de Joinville at their head; the aide-de-camp of the King, Generale Athalin, de Rumigny; the Colonel Count de Chabannes; Captain Thiercy attending the young Prince; the physician, Dr. Fouquier; the surgeon of the King, M. Pasquier; his secretary, Baron Pain; the Commissary-General of the Harve, &c., all in splendid uniforms of bright and of different colours, were constantly seen crossing and re-crossing, according as descending in the execution of orders. Amidst these moving groups were conspicuous the slight and elegant figure of the admiral in command, M. Launay; the burly giant form of Admiral Mackau, with his aide-de-camp Capt. Pelian and Page, standing behind him; nor was the more diminutive figure of the great Minister of France, M. Guizot, the least anxiously observed. The personage who, however, perhaps attracted the greatest admiration was his Royal Highness the young Duke de Montpensier, above the middle height, with a noble countenance. This youthful Prince (nineteen years of age) combines a handsome appearance and a manly bearing with a gracefulness of the most striking appearance.

By the time the Gomer had reached the Victoria-pier (a place of embarkation for the smaller steam-boats to places in the neighbourhood, and which is situated near the old Semaphore at the bottom of the High-street), the Mayor and corporation were assembled for the purpose of going on board to present their addresses. The pier was crowded with ladies and gentlemen, and the corporate officers were in their robes, so that the place formed a pleasing object when seen from the river. Admiralty barges, with boatmen from the dockyard, were in waiting off the pier, in which the corporation embarked to proceed to the Gomer, which stopped opposite the pier in order to allow them to go on board. About six o'clock in the morning, Mr. Louis Van den Bergh, jun., the Consul at Portsmouth, went off in a steamer, accompanied by M. Le Comte D'Harcourt, Commander of the King's sailing yacht La Reine Amelie, to announce to his Majesty the fact that the address of the corporation would be presented to him on board the Gomer, and not after he had landed, as the jurisdiction of the corporation expires at the Royal Clarence-yard. His Majesty, in compliance with this suggestion, stopped before the Victoria-pier.

TIFFY'S PEACOCK.

The corporation were shown into the saloon of the Gomer, a beautiful chamber, decorated with yellow damask, where they were most graciously received by the King. M. Guizot was there, as was also the Duke de Montpensier, Admiral Launay, Admiral de Mackau, and the chief members of the King's suite.

The Recorder, Mr. Rawlinson, then read the following address:—

"TO HIS MAJESTY LOUIS PHILIPPE, KING OF THE FRENCH.

"We, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the borough of Portsmouth, the loyal and affectionate subjects of our Most Gracious Sovereign Queen Victoria, desirous of expressing the sentiments by which we are actuated on the auspicious occasion of your Majesty's visit to England, and availing ourselves of the opportunity afforded to us by your Majesty's arrival within the limits of the port and borough of Portsmouth, beg leave to offer to your Majesty, with unfeigned sincerity and earnestness, the respects and congratulations of this ancient municipality.

"Regarding your Majesty's arrival as an honour conferred on our locality, we hail it the more especially as a highly important national event, from its tendency to promote those kindly feelings of mutual respect which should ever subsist between two such powerful and influential countries as France and Great Britain.

"Solicitous to welcome the illustrious guest of our beloved Queen with every demonstration becoming so great and memorable an occasion, permit us to assure your Majesty of the lively interest we take in your Majesty's health and welfare, and in the joyful celebration of your royal visit.

"We rejoice in the new era it is calculated to form in the history of the two countries, and in the hope it affords of a more enlarged and general intercourse between them, which, under the blessing of Divine Providence, shall contribute to their mutual welfare, to the preservation of the peace of Europe, and to the advantage of every part of the habitable globe."

His Majesty received the address most graciously, and immediately delivered in English the following reply:—

"Mr. Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses,—

"Gentlemen,—It affords me particular pleasure to know that her Most Gracious Majesty your Queen has permitted you to present me with an address on my arrival on your hospitable shores. I have not forgotten the many kindnesses I received from your countrymen during my residence among you many years since. During that period I was frequently pained considerably at the existence of differences and feuds between our countries. I assure you, gentlemen, I shall endeavour at all times to prevent a repetition of those feelings and conduct, believing, as I do, most sincerely, that the happiness and prosperity of a nation depend quite as much on the peace of those nations by which she is surrounded as on quiet within her own dominions. I was peculiarly gratified at being honoured with the presence of your beloved Queen in France during the last year, and it is a source of pleasure to be able to accept the kind invitation then given me to again visit those shores where I had been so generously treated many years since. I hope, under the blessings of Divine Providence, that those kindly feelings will be long cherished between our nations, and tend to promote the happiness and prosperity of mankind."

His Majesty spoke with very great impressiveness, particularly in that part of his brief address in which he inculcated the necessity and the desirableness of peace. His Majesty then conversed for some time with the Recorder and other members of the corporation. Mr. Galsot and other members of the suite did the same. Among the little incidents which occurred, were one or two which marked the affability of the King, and his desire to put the members of the corporation entirely at their ease. The Recorder is a very tall man, and his head now and then touched the beams under the roof of the deck. The King laughed, and, as if apologising for the want of height between decks, said, "We did not allow for your wig." Alderman Ellyett, one of those present, asked to have the honour of shaking hands with the King, on which His Majesty said, "I should like to shake hands with you all. I should like to know your names." His Majesty then asked the names of the Mayor and the Recorder, with both of whom he conversed for a short time. He shook hands with every member of the corporation, and to some of them who were slow in getting off their white gloves, he said, "Oh, never mind your gloves, gentlemen." Altogether, their reception by the King seems to have been most gratifying to the corporation. He exhibited the most marked desire to please. In the course of conversation with members of the corporation, his Majesty alluded feelingly to his former visit to Portsmouth, many years ago. He remarked that this was not the first time he had been in Portsmouth. He remembered the "Point," the "Sallyport," the Fountain Hotel; and added, that he also remembered the Dockyard well, though it was then called the Naval College. When asked by the Recorder to favour the corporation with a copy of the reply he had made to the address, his Majesty said with much feeling, "I have no copy. My words are from my heart." He also, in the course of his conversation with the Recorder, observed, that when he was last in England he used to visit with much interest the law courts. The King remembered Southsea Castle. When his Majesty was last here, it appears, he embarked here on board the Mercury frigate, Captain Rogers, to proceed to the Mediterranean. The conversation being over, the corporation took their leave of his Majesty, and retired. They re-entered their boats, and followed in the wake of the Gomer up the harbour.

His Majesty had descended to the saloon to receive the corporation, having previously been on deck, where he repeatedly acknowledged the cheers of the people on the shore, and in the different craft around. After the corporation had retired, his Majesty again returned on deck, and the Gomer proceeded up the harbour, past the Round Tower (where the Royal standard was flying), the Sullyport (so celebrated in Marryat's novels and Dibdin's songs), and the floating bridge, which attracted his Majesty's attention. All these places were crowded with people, who cheered vociferously as the King passed. Further up the harbour his Majesty's ship Victory, 110, commanded by Captain Mowbray, saluted the royal steamer with 21 guns. The Victory (Nelson's Victory) was gallantly dressed, and her yards were manned. The shore on either side (Point beach and Gosport beach) were crowded with people, and the windows of the houses along shore were also filled with faces. At the gun-wharf, a little farther on, the royal standard was hoisted. On Cold-harbour, which is on the right as you approach the dockyard, a great number of persons had collected, as also on the left, at Cold Harbour, where, too, the royal standard was hoisted on the flagstaff. As this point commanded a fine view of the landing-place, it was particularly selected by spectators. On the right, a little further on, the Gomer came nearly opposite the Dockyard, where the royal standard was hoisted. Farther on lay the Excellent, 74, Captain Sir Thomas Hastings, which saluted the Gomer as she came up to take her moorings.

THE DEBARKATION.

loud and reiterated cheering from the crews of the various small craft afloat and from the crowds assembled on the shores of the harbour.

His Royal Highness was received on board the yacht by a guard of honour of the French Marines, the yards of the steamer being manned, and the band playing the English National Anthem.

The royal and distinguished party moved towards the gangway in order to descend to the boat which was to convey them on shore; and here a friendly contest prevailed for a moment between the King of the French and Prince Albert, as to which should have the pleasure of giving precedence to the other. The Prince, however, was persevering enough to gain his point, and so the King was the first to descend the gangway, followed by Prince Albert, the Duke de Montpensier, and the Duke of Wellington.

The return of the royal party towards the Clarence-yard was the signal for renewed cheering, shouting, and salutes. From the time the barge left the sides of the Gomer till she came alongside the stairs, the same excitement continued. The King of the French repeatedly acknowledged the cheers of the spectators, taking off his hat, and bowing. He wore the uniform of a Lieutenant-General, blue with red facings, and he also wore a blue ribbon.

His Majesty looked remarkably well and animated. He had evidently suffered nothing from his voyage. Arrived at the stairs, the Prince bowed the King, by his desire, and, as he passed on from the top, bowed to the people. The King stepped quickly up the stairs, bowing also to the spectators, and when he reached the top, he turned round and bowed repeatedly on all sides, laying his hand on his heart. The Duke of Wellington, M. Guizot, and the other distinguished persons accompanying the King, followed, and the party walked up the yard to the point where the carriages were placed. The King and Prince Albert entered one carriage, which immediately afterwards drove off, the band playing the National Anthem. The other carriages followed, and in a few minutes after, they reached the railway station, which had been decorated by Captain Burney with flags, kindly lent by the Admiralty for the purpose, and also with some evergreens. Here a limited number of persons were admitted to witness the departure. Colonel Henderson and Mr. Chaplin, directors, were present to receive the King.

The train started from Gosport with the King, Prince Albert, and the distinguished persons who accompanied them, at eleven o'clock, and arrived at Farnborough station at half-past twelve o'clock, where carriages were in waiting, in which they immediately went off at a rapid pace towards Windsor.

The following is a list of the distinguished individuals accompanying his Majesty and the Duke de Montpensier to this country:—

His Excellency M. Guizot, Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, attended by M. Herbet, Secretary of Legation, and M. Hennequin, Private Secretary to his Excellency.

His Excellency Admiral Le Baron Mackau, Minister of Marine and Colonies, attended by Le Capitaine Pellion, R.N., and Le Capitaine Page, R.N., aides-de-camp to his Excellency.

Dr. Fournier, M.D., physician in attendance on his Majesty; and M. Paquer, surgeon in ordinary to the King.

Le General Baron Athalin, le General Comte de Rumigny, Colonel Comte de Chabannes, and Colonel Comte Dumas, are the aides-de-camp in attendance on the King.

Vice-Admiral le Baron Lasussee has the command of the squadron.

We must not omit to state that his Majesty appeared in high spirits, and seemed much gratified at the enthusiastic reception with which he was every where greeted.

THE ARRIVAL AND RECEPTION OF LOUIS PHILIPPE AT WINDSOR.

Soon after two o'clock, on Tuesday, the guns in the park announced the King and the Prince Consort to have nearly finished their journey, the visit from the principal vestibule of Windsor Castle, up to the summit of the Long Walk, enabling the attendants within the royal abode to apprise her Majesty of the approach of her royal guest at such a convenient time as would obviate the awkwardness of a prolonged attendance at the entrance of her castle, where the duties of hospitality, no less than the affectionate respect entertained by the Queen for Louis Philippe, prompted our beloved monarch to await and welcome the King's arrival. Her Majesty, however, was so anxious not to suffer the opportunity of receiving her august visitor to escape, that she descended into the grand vestibule fronting George the Fourth's gate, at which the cortège was to enter, some minutes before the carriages drove up. This was a most interesting moment, and cannot be paralleled by any occurrence that took place on her Majesty's visit to Chateau d'Eu, where the King and Queen of the French, together with their family, drove down to Treport in the simple char-à-banc to receive and convey the Queen and Prince to the chateau. During the short interval that elapsed, Queen Victoria, accompanied by the Duchess of Kent, and attended by the Countess of Gainsborough, the Lady in Waiting, and by Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Liverpool, Earl Delaware, the Hon. George Anson, and some other of the principal officers of the household, awaited the King's arrival. Her Majesty was evidently in high spirits, and conversed affably with her attendants, her countenance beaming with satisfaction and excitement at the interesting meeting which awaited her.

At a quarter past two o'clock, the escort swept rapidly round the quadrangle and formed in front, whilst the first carriage, containing the King, Prince Albert, the Duke de Montpensier, and M. Guizot, drove under the portico. At this moment Queen Victoria advanced to the threshold, and in the most cordial manner extended her arms, whilst Louis Philippe and the Prince descended from the carriage. Their Majesties embraced most affectionately at the moment of meeting, and the three principal personages advanced into the vestibule, the French monarch bestowing his cordial smiles and greetings upon Sir R. Peel, the Earl of Liverpool, the Hon. George Anson, and others of the Royal household with whom he was familiarly acquainted. The Duke de Montpensier and Admiral de Mackau escorted the Duchess of Kent, and the royal party, followed by the Ministers and suites of both the monarchs, proceeded at once to the grand staircase.

The large engraving represents the most impressive scene of the royal reception, and the splendid George IV. Staircase, which is only used by the Sovereign on state occasions. Her Majesty, leaning on the arm of the King, accompanied his Majesty to the foot of the staircase, and then led the way as hostess of the magnificent palace, and introduced the French monarch to the company assembled on the first and second landings. The royal party then advanced across the Great Gothic Hall, through the Waterloo Gallery, to the Grand Reception or Hall-Room; whence the royal guest proceeded to his suite of apartments, and the Queen and the Prince Consort withdrew.

THE NAUTILUS CUP.

Here his Majesty awaited the arrival of Prince Albert, who was expected at the Royal Vessels-yard by a special train from Farnborough.

Nearly an hour elapsed after the King's steamer took up her moorings before the Prince arrived. The officers of the port, Admiral Hyde Parker, Sir Charles Rowley, and others, went off in their boats to the Gomer to pay their respects to the King. Soon after their return a distant salute, and the National Anthem played by the band, announced that Prince Albert was coming. At 25 minutes past 10, his Royal Highness, who had left Farnborough in a special train at 27 minutes past 8 o'clock, and arrived at the terminus at 20 minutes past 10 o'clock, entered the yard, accompanied by the Duke of Wellington, and walked briskly down the stairs whence he was to embark. A barge with Prince Albert's flag, the Royal arms quartered with the Prince's, was waiting alongside, into which the Prince stepped, loudly cheered by the spectators, who thronged in the boats that covered the harbour. Immediately behind the Prince was the Duke of Wellington, and, as he descended the steps, a cry was raised of "A cheer for the Duke," to which a deafening response was given. The Duke wore his Field Marshal's uniform; but the Prince was dressed in plain clothes (black), with a white hat and cravat. The Duke having followed the Prince into the boat, they went off rapidly to the Gomer, amidst the cheers of the multitude that surrounded them on all sides.

The harbour at this time, and until the final departure of the royal party, was a scene of animation not often witnessed. The shores were lined with people. The fortifications in the distance, and the roads where they were elevated, also showed dense masses of human beings; the surface of the water was one mass of floating life, every boat crammed with people; the craft moored in different parts of the harbour or tacking about were dressed in the gayest and most brilliant colours, the larger vessels having their yards manned. The French steamers were also gallantly adorned with flags and ensigns, the Tricolours alternating with the Union Jack and the Royal Standard.

Upon stepping on deck the Prince was received by his Majesty in the most affectionate manner, the King embracing and shaking hands very cordially with his Royal Highness.

His Majesty also shook hands with the Duke of Wellington, and in a few moments, together with the Prince and the Duke, entered the royal barge, which returned to the stairs with the French national flag flying from the stem, in the place of the royal standard of England.

(The large engraving in our front page, represents this most interesting scene, or rather, spectacle.)

The royal barge was succeeded by the admiralty barge, conveying the Lords of the Admiralty, and steered by Lieut. Fremont.

The Port-Admiral's barge and that of the Admiral-Superintendent followed in succession. The passage of the boats across the harbour being the signal for

KING LOUIS PHILIPPE ENTERING THE RAILWAY STATION.

- "J. H. S.,"—King's Lynn, cannot recover a debt contracted in the year 1835, unless proof can be given that it has been already applied for since that date.
- "An Inquirer,"—Huddersfield.—A good air-pump may be purchased for £35s. Our subscriber will be entitled to the Large Print.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1844.

Our domestic political intelligence of the week is completely void of interest. The heads of the Ministry have been joining in the festivities of Windsor; the heads of the people, as we suppose we ought to call the members of the Legislature, are scattered abroad, one to his farm, another to his merchandise. O'Connell is quiescent as far as agitation is concerned; for he is hunting among the Kerry hills, instead of haranguing at the Conciliation Hall, which, in his absence, presents that void space which, in theatres of another kind, too plainly tells that the "star" has left its usual sphere. In another point, however, the comparison will not hold good: the emptiness of the benches in the Hall onburgh Quay causes no diminution in the funds; the rent of last Monday is stated to have been £600. The steadiness of this contribution, which now seems to keep at a tolerably regular average, indicates the existence of two things worthy the consideration of our rulers,—a uniformity and continuance of the feeling in which the fund originates, and a completeness in the organisation by which it is collected and managed. Some weeks will elapse before any of the usual signs of life will be visible in this quarter.

The death of Lady Heytesbury, which took place at the Castle of Dublin on Sunday last, has thrown a gloom over the Irish metropolis. The "Castle" is, in little, the same to Ireland as the Court is to London; and an event that must of course close it to any kind of official display, or vice-regal hospitality, cannot but be considered as a public misfortune, independent of the sorrow that must be felt by all parties for the affliction that has fallen on the family of the Lord-Lieutenant so soon after his installation as the representative of the Sovereign.

One of the last acts of Louis Philippe, before leaving his own shores for this country, has been one of the best of his reign. The good effect it has had in France, cannot be altogether concealed even by the efforts of the war journals. An amnesty appeared in the Moniteur of Tuesday, setting at liberty fifty-nine political prisoners, sentenced to various terms of confinement. There is an impression in England that the greater number of them were persons connected more or less directly with the press, but this does not appear to be the case. M. Dupoty, one of the liberated, was certainly a journalist, but he was implicated in the attempt made by Quenisset on the life of the King, and was punished as a conspirator rather than as a writer. Even the most determined advocates of liberty of discussion must allow that aiding and abetting the crime of assassination, is no part of the duty of a "public instructor." The following is a brief account of some of the other prisoners now discharged:—

Bodet, Montauban, J. Ori, M. E. Dattail, J. B. Lombard, M. Orsano, and Theodore Perrelet were implicated in Prince Louis Napoleon's descent on Boulogne; Joseph Bodet was convicted of selling the Moniteur Republicain; Felix Becker and three others were condemned as belonging to a secret society; N. Raymond was condemned for what is known as the Marcellin plot; J. M. Houdon and seventeen others were implicated in the troubles at Paris of the 12th and 13th of May, 1839; and J. André and five more were condemned for some excesses committed during the troubles in the west.

On perusing the names here given, one more will doubtless recur to every reader with something of regret that it is not to be found among them. Prince Louis Napoleon is still a prisoner at Ham. We have no sympathy with the vanity that made him think his name was a sufficient title to the throne of France, nor with the mingled folly and madness that prompted his two attempts at Strasbourg and Boulogne. But it is not in the nature of the magic influence once exercised by the name of Napoleon to be hereditary, and time has worn its political power down to a "dream of a dream, and shadow of a shade." What we have, we think with justice, called the madness and folly of the Prince, also render him less to be feared: two such utter failures are not likely to inspire a third attempt. Imprisonment for life is a dreadful doom for a young, and as the Prince is said to be, a gallant and generous spirit; he appears to have been sufficiently punished for the past, nor do we think he need be much feared for the future. Neither can it be forgotten that there are very reasonable grounds for suspecting that in the descent on Boulogne, the Prince was less the chief mover in the affair than the victim of cleverer heads than his own; that, in short, he was trapped into the absurd undertaking by the intrigues of the French police. We wish the Prince could have been included in the present amnesty; but because it is not so, we will not the less give our approbation to the spirit that has extended pardon to so many others.

The last packet from Rio has brought what is supposed to be a copy of the New Brazilian Tariff. Some doubt yet exists as to whether it is not a mere copy of the form that was struck off for private circulation among the resident merchants at Rio, in order to collect their opinions with respect to it. Our treaty with the Brazils expires next month, when this new Tariff, whatever may be its provisions, will come into operation. It occupies fifty-three folio pages, and its principle is that of levying specific duties, that of levying them ad valorem being, it is said, totally abandoned. A low range of duty will be levied on all imported articles considered of the first necessity, while on those considered of a higher quality and higher price, the duty will be heavier. A great drawback on the working efficacy of the Tariff, is the fact that "the valuations are to be arbitrarily made by the officers of the Custom House, and it is concluded, that in many cases this will run the duty up to not less than fifty per cent."

The French and Spaniards are both fanatically possessed in favour of an intricate and oppressive custom-house system, seeming to think that commerce was intended to support the officers of these establishments, not that the custom-house officials should merely be the servants of commerce. It is feared, that if the present tariff is passed, the greater part of the trade of Brazil will be driven into the hands of the contrabandists. This perverse attachment to high duties has already ruined the trade of Spain—injuring that of France, and has destroyed the wine trade of Portugal. All this is lamentable; but while there is a chance that the scale of duties may be modified before it is brought into operation, we are unwilling to treat a commercial blunder in a valuable customer to the manufacturers of this country, as a fait accompli.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE REVENUE.

We have great gratification in stating that the accounts of the Revenue for the quarter ending on the 10th of October (Thursday) present a very large increase, particularly in the Customs, probably owing to the augmented importations under the new Tariff.

The following is a summary of the accounts:—The total revenue for the year just concluded amounts to £58,741,622, for the quarter to £14,372,353. The net increase upon the year is £1,395,340, upon the quarter, £524,944. The great head of increase is in the Customs; this head exhibits the enormous amount of £1,723,185 increase upon the year; £473,347 upon the quarter. The Excise presents also its increase upon the year, £178,898. The Stamp duty, upon the year, an increase of £49,159. The year's increase upon the Property Tax (notwithstanding repayments) is £116,413. The increase upon the Post Office is, for the year, £23,603—making a total increase of £2,162,105. This increase is, however, reduced by a decrease under three or four heads, to the amount of £290,941. Nearly the whole of this decrease—viz., £290,941, however, is to be found under the head of Miscellaneous Revenue.

Notwithstanding this casual deduction, however, the net increase of the revenue is nearly £1,400,000; and but for the casual deduction would, with the repayments, amount to £2,393,164.

We congratulate the country upon these results, because the increase of the Revenue affords a certain proof of the improvement in our commerce and trade, and an indication of the augmented resources of the people.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, it is confidently reported, will go to Portsmouth with the King of the French, on his return to France, and witness the embarkation of his Majesty. The Queen, it is said, will remain one night at the official residence of Sir Charles Rowley, the commander-in-chief.

PRESENTS TO HER MAJESTY.—The ponies ridden by her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Princess Royal, during their sojourn at Blair Athol, have arrived at the Royal News, Windsor, with the other ponies of her Majesty, having been handsomely presented to their royal riders by Lord Glenlyon. Five roe deer have also been brought from Scotland, presents from the same nobleman.

PRESENT FROM LOUIS PHILIPPE TO HER MAJESTY.—The album which King Louis Philippe proposed to offer to Queen Victoria, in commemoration of her visit to the Chateau d'Eu, is finished; and his Majesty has brought it over with him to be presented at Windsor. It is of unusually large size, being 22 inches by 24, and proportionally thick. It contains thirty-two drawings, by the first French artists, representing the different apartments of the Chateau d'Eu, and scenes and events connected with her Britannic Majesty's visit. To prevent friction, the drawings are let in, and, as it were, framed by thick sheets of Bristol paper. It is splendidly bound in scarlet morocco, by Goussin, bearing the arms of England, within a rich border of the most delicate tooling. The case or box, in which it is enclosed, is covered with rich purple velvet, on which is also impressed the Queen's arms.

THE DUKEDOM OF DORSET.—It is said that her Majesty is about to raise the Earl of Down to the first rank in the peerage, by reviving in his person the extinct Dukedom of Dorset—the countess being, with the exception of the Countess Amherst, the only surviving representative of John Frederick, third duke, as sister of George, fourth duke, whose melancholy death, by a fall from his horse, occurred on the 14th of February, 1815.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, attended by Lady Georgiana Bathurst and the Hon. Captain Liddell, has been honouring the Duke and Duchess of Bedford with her company at Welham Abbey.

THE VACANT SEAT OF HUNTER.—The baronetcy placed at the disposal of the Premier, by the recent death of the Duke of Grafton, occasions the eighth vacancy that has occurred in the list of Knights of the Most Noble Order of the Garter since the accession of the present Ministry to office. Few similar instances of so large an amount of patronage have fallen into the hands of the First Minister of the Crown within so short a period of time as to be met with in the annals of the Order.

The Duke of Devonshire's party, at Chatsworth, separated on Tuesday, when the noble duke left that princely seat for Bolton Abbey, Yorkshire. His grace intends to receive a select circle at that ancient seat, expressly for the excellent shooting that estate affords.

Count Nassau took his departure from London, on Saturday morning, for Hamburg.

We hear that the preliminaries have been arranged for a matrimonial alliance between the Hon. Captain Bayle, second daughter of the Earl of Cork, and Miss Georgiana Roberts, daughter of the well-known banker of that name. The ceremony will take place during the present month.

The Earl and Countess of Lincoln have arrived in town.

Lord Palmerston arrived at Berlin, on the 1st instant, from Dresden.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane, M.P., is about to lead to the hymenal altar the eldest daughter of Mr. and Lady Elizabeth Drummond, and grand-daughter to the Duke of Rutland.

ELEVATION OF LORD STANLEY TO THE HOUSE OF PEERS.—The Gazette of Tuesday contains the notification of Lord Stanley's elevation to the peerage, under the title of Baron Stanley, of Bickerstaffe.

The Hon. Miss Sybella Mary Harris, fourth daughter of the late gallant Lord Harris, died on Sunday, at Southborough, near Tonbridge, in her 49th year.

MISS PEEL.—Miss Peel is still residing in Eastern-terrace, Brighton. We are happy to say that Miss Peel is now in improved health.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, and several of the Cabinet Ministers, left town on Thursday afternoon, by a special train, from the terminus of the Great Western Railway for Windsor Castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

Sir George Clerk has arrived in town from Scotland.

We are sorry to hear that the Hon. C. A. Murray is still confined to his room at the Pavilion, Brighton, by severe indisposition.

Sir Henry Portinger has arrived in town from China.

DEATH OF LADY HEYTESBURY.—The account of the state of health of Lady Heytesbury published by us last week will have left little hope of her ladyship's recovery, and we regret to say her demise took place on Sunday afternoon, at twenty minutes before four o'clock, at the Vice-regal Lodge, Dublin. The lamented lady had arrived but a short time in Ireland, when she was attacked by the fatal illness, under the effects of which she laboured so long and painfully. In immediate attendance on her last moments were—his Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant; his brother, the Hon. E. H. A. Court, M.P. for Tamworth, Captain in the Navy; her son, the Hon. W. H. A. Court, M.P. for the Isle of Wight; the Hon. Miss A. Court, daughter; and Mrs. Penne, sister to the late lady. Her ladyship was in her 60th year, and second daughter of the Hon. William Henry Howden, and grand-daughter of the Earl of Radnor. She was married to his Excellency on the 3rd of October, 1808. She has left two surviving children. Her ladyship was assiduously attended during her illness by Sir Henry H. Marsh, Bart., and Dr. J. Graves, the physician in ordinary to the household, and Dr. George Hestonell.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF DOWDALL.—The noble marquis expired on Saturday morning last, at Ormeau, near Belfast, after a protracted illness. His lordship, George Augustus Chichester, Marquis of Donegal, Viscount of Chichester, and Baron Belfast (Viscount Fishwick, in England), lieutenant of the county Donegal, Knight of St. Patrick, &c., was born in 1769, and was consequently in the twenty-sixth year of his age. He is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son, the Earl of Belfast, lieutenant of the county Antrim.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &amp;c.

ELECTION OF VICE-CHANCELLOR OF OXFORD.

On Tuesday morning at one o'clock the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University, preceded by the Bishops and Yeoman Warders, and attended by nearly all the heads of Colleges and halls, and a large number of other doctors in divinity, law, and medicine, went in procession from the Clarendon to the theatre, when, having taken their seats, the Chancellor's letter, nominating Dr. Symonds, Warden of Wadham College, to be Vice-Chancellor for the year ensuing, was read by the Senior Precentor, and submitted to the approbation of the house.

Some members having called out "non-placet," the Vice-Chancellor stated that he had the Chancellor's permission to take a scrutiny, which immediately commenced, at the end of which the numbers were as follow:—

Placets	852
Non-placets	153
Majority	699

The new Vice-Chancellor was then admitted into office, on taking the customary oath, and after a very appropriate address, nominated as Pro Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Wynter, President of St. John's College, and late Vice-Chancellor.

Dr. Hawkins, President of Oriel College; Dr. Plumptre, Master of University College; Dr. Radford, Rector of Lincoln College, were also sworn in.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PROSECUTION OF PARLIAMENT.—Parliament was prorogued on Thursday, by Commission, till the 13th of December. The Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharfedale, and the Earl of Dalhousie.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE CITY.—It is generally supposed that the 23rd instant will be the day on which her Majesty will visit the City, on the occasion of opening the Royal Exchange. The number of persons to be invited to dinner will not exceed 1200. The collation is to be held. According to the present arrangements, it is intended that her Majesty should enter at the west end of the building. It is impossible to finish every part of the works; the portions left unfinished will, therefore, be covered with crimson cloth. As the time is too short for the statue of her Majesty to be finished, it is arranged that the model shall be fired up for the occasion, and it is now undergoing a process of enamelling, to make it appear like marble. The large commemorative medal, to be presented to her Majesty, the royal family, and others, will not be ready; but the smaller silver medal, of the size of half-a-crown, is already finished, and will be given to the company who are invited.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—A Court of Aldermen was held on Wednesday, when Mr. Sheriff Sidney was sworn in as alderman of Billingsgate ward. Some conversation ensued in consequence of the non-attendance of Mr. Salomons, to be sworn in as alderman of Portoken ward; and ultimately the Lord Mayor postponed the question of Mr. Salomons appearing to take upon himself the office till Tuesday next. The Court unanimously agreed to an address of congratulation and welcome to Louis Philippe.

LATE HOUSE OF BUSINESS IN THE METROPOLIS.—A very numerous and respectfully-attended meeting, called by the Metropolitan Drapers' Association, was held on Wednesday night at Exeter Hall, to adopt means to discourage the practice of keeping open shops in the metropolis to a late hour. Mr. Sheriff Sidney was in the chair, the Lord Mayor having been prevented from attending. Resolutions were agreed to expressive of the opinion that protracted hours of business were unnecessary, and that they sacrificed the health, morals, and spiritual interests of the community. A donation of twenty guineas from Mr. Hitchcock, of St. Paul's Churchyard, was announced, accompanied by the intimation that that gentleman's establishment now closes at seven o'clock. Mr. Hitchcock, it appears, has stated that in his large establishment, since the introduction of the shorter hours, the greatest improvement had taken place. So cheerful and assiduous were his young men, that he could actually carry on his business with fewer assistants than when they were jaded by excessive labour. A resolution was also passed pledging the meeting to adopt all necessary steps to abridge the hours of business in shops, and to discontinue the practice of evening shopping.

ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.—Thursday last the half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors of this Company was held at the London Tavern; Thomas Hanning, Esq., M.P. for Huntingdon, in the chair. The report read by the Secretary stated that the expectations formerly held out by the Directors have been fully realised, and that the concern is, in every respect, steady and surely improving. The surplus of the half-year had considerably exceeded that of the former. Since the last meeting the debt of the Company had been further reduced £20,000; and the Directors intend to pay off the loan of £10,000 the 4th of February, being now the remaining balance of the Company's debt. The only matter affecting insurance that had occurred during the year was the recent circumstance of the Tay striking upon Goodwin Reef. The ship, however, being but slightly damaged, the casualty is likely to prove less injurious to the Company than might at first have been anticipated. After some reference to the future repairing of ships, &c., the report stated that the plan of packet routes, which had now been in operation for months, had given great satisfaction, both to her Majesty's Government and to the Colonies—the ships arriving at and departing from all the numerous places comprehended in the scheme with the utmost regularity. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, having recently required that the mails to and from between Jamaica, Santa Martha, Cartagena, Chagres, and St. Juan de Nicaragua, shall be conveyed by steam instead of a sailing vessel, will involve the necessity for building a new steamship. It appeared that the total receipts were, £174,977 16s. 8d. Deducting the disbursements, a balance of £66,187 14s. 9d. remained. After some discussion, the report was agreed to.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The week ending on Saturday last, the 5th inst., was one of the most salubrious of the present year, and the number of deaths is accordingly considerably below the average of this season. The total number, from all causes, in a population of 1,915,184 was last week only 901—a decrease of 29 upon the average of the last five autumns. There is still, however, a larger proportion than ordinary of deaths from epidemic diseases, the number under this head last week being 757, while the average of the last five autumns is not higher than 391. In epidemic diseases and in those affecting the lungs, there is a perceptible decrease, and it is principally by smallpox that the increased mortality from epidemics is occasioned. The number of deaths recorded under this head last week is 51, while the average is only 17.

REDUCTION IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—A reduction of a halfpenny, and in some instances of a penny, in the price of the four-pound loaf, was made by several bakers on Wednesday. The prices at which the seconds, or household bread is sold at in the metropolis vary considerably. It is strange that the best bread can be obtained in Gravesend at 6d. to 7d. per 4lb loaf—2s per cent. less than in London.

EXTENSIVE FIRE IN THE BOROUGH MARKET.—A fire of a very alarming character broke out on Monday night, behind the London-road, Southwark, on which was erected a number of shops, occupied by various tradesmen, and known as St. George's Market. The fire first took place in the stalls of Mr. Barrett, a butcher, and the buildings were totally destroyed. About a dozen other buildings, in the whole one hundred feet long by thirty-five feet wide, and used as butchers' stalls, and miscellaneous tradesmen's shops in the market, were also destroyed, with the contents. The buildings were insured, but the contents were not insured.

A memorial recently agreed to at a meeting at Gateshead, was transmitted to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with a view to obtaining the pardon of Peter, William, and James, but Mr. Phillips replied, on behalf of Sir James Graham, that the right hon. baronet expressed his regret that there was no sufficient ground to justify him, consistently with his public duty, in advising her Majesty to comply with his prayer.

COUNTRY NEWS.

MONUMENT TO DR. DALTON.—At a recent meeting of the inhabitants of Manchester the following resolution was come to:—"That it is desirable that a simple and suitable memorial should be placed in the cemetery at Ardwick, over the mortal remains of this illustrious philosopher and exemplary Christian; and that it is most desirable to found a professorship of chemistry in some public institution in Manchester, to be named the 'Daltonian Professorship,' one object of which shall be to illustrate the atomic theory and the discoveries of Dalton, in connection with other branches of physical science."

MUNICIPAL LEGACY.—The late James Heyworth, Esq., of Everton, has bequeathed a legacy of £15,000 to his principal clerk, as a testimony of the value which he placed on that gentleman's faithful services for a number of years.

SUDDEN DEATH OF LADY HAYTER AT BRIGHTON.—On Tuesday evening a jury was empanelled at Brighton to inquire into the circumstances attending the death of Lady Hayter, wife of Sir George Hayter. Her ladyship had been staying for the last fortnight in Brighton, and on Sunday afternoon she went to see her niece, in the Montpelier-road, with the intention of spending the remainder of the day with her. Soon after she arrived at the residence of her niece, she was taken in a fit, and in less than four hours she was a corpse. Medical aid was called in, but it was of no avail. Her ladyship was sixty-six years of age. She had been in a delicate state of health, but not to any ill. The jury being satisfied that she died from natural causes, returned a verdict to that effect.

STATE OF TRADE AT MANCHESTER.—There was a very good demand for yarn on Tuesday; and, as the market was very bare, rather higher prices were in many cases obtained, and purchasers were desirous of making contracts for future delivery. The goods market, also, was very firm, and full prices were paid for nearly all descriptions of cloth.—The Rochdale Flannel Market was very dull on Monday, the demand very limited, and prices rather watering. There is the same inactivity in the wool market, but prices remain firm.

JAMES COCKBURN BELLEVILLE.—Letters have been received from the Home Office, expressive of the regret of Sir James Graham at the outrages that have been committed against the person and property of Mr. Belleville since his return to North Sunderland. The Government has joined in offering a reward of £100 for the apprehension and conviction of the offenders who set fire to his dwelling-house on the evening of the 18th ult., and her Majesty's gracious pardon to any accomplice informant. An inspector of police has been sent down to inquire into the nature and particulars of the recent outrages. He has been actively engaged, and has had information against Mr. George Gray Bell, the late clerk of the firm of Robson and Stally, and three other persons of the names of Stevenson, Brown, and Gallager, as principals at the incendiary fire of the 18th ult. The Rev. Dixon Clark, of Bedford, a magistrate for the district, after hearing a part of the evidence collected by the inspector, granted warrants for the immediate apprehension of the parties. A warrant was also granted to search the dwelling-house of Mr. Bell, for property belonging to Mr. Belleville, which he is charged with having improperly taken away.

THE ACCIDENT AT HASWELL COLLIERY.—On Wednesday the inquest on the bodies of those who fell victims to the late explosion was resumed, and, after a very long and minute examination of witnesses, the inquiry was once more adjourned to Friday (yesterday). Professors Paraday and Lyall have been sent down by the Government to assist in the inquiry. Both these scientific gentlemen have arranged to go down the Haswell pit to inspect the workings. On Tuesday night a meeting was held at the Lecture-room, Nelson-street, Newcastle, to devise means for alleviating the distress of those families whom the recent awful occurrence had left destitute. Some excellent appeals were made in behalf of the destitute families of the sufferers, and a committee was formed to organize a subscription for them.

INCENDIARISM IN LINCOLNSHIRE.—An incendiary fire occurred at Sudbrook, near Auster, on Sunday morning last; a stack of straw, the property of Charles Allen, Esq., of Willoughby Hall, was entirely consumed.

BURIOUS FIRE NEAR GRAVESEND.—On Wednesday night a fire of a very alarming character, broke out at the premises belonging to Mr. Maes, farmer, in Perry-street, about one mile and a half this side of Gravesend. That part in which the fire commenced was the basement, in which stood a vast number of ricks of great value. The flames next extended to several other stacks, also to a large building, upwards of the feet long by 40 wide, and filled with grain; then to a number of pea-ricks, and from thence to the pigsties. The flames, by a quarter past ten, were ascending into the air several hundred feet, and large flakes of ice were wafted into the stables and cart-houses, all of which were blazing away in a manner truly awful. The progress of the fire was subdued after some time, but the value of the property consumed amounts to some thousands of pounds.

FATAL ACCIDENT WITH FIRE-ARMS.—A dreadful event occurred in the parish of English Bicknor, Gloucestershire, on Tuesday last. Lieut.-Col. Charles Davies, of Bicknor Court, was shooting near that place, and, in the act of getting over a hedge, his gun, becoming entangled in the briars, went off and lodged the contents of both barrels in his right side. He immediately fell, and, on the keeper (who was accompanying him) coming to his side, and attempting to raise him, exclaimed, "It is of no use, I am a dead man!" He then prayed earnestly for mercy on his soul, and on the souls of his relations. The keeper ran to the village for assistance, but before he could return the unfortunate gentleman had breathed his last. Deceased had been for forty years in the service of the Hon. East India Company's Bombay establishment.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The Hon. Henry Hutchinson was the chairman of the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday. The whole proceedings were of an interesting nature. Mr. Maurice O'Connell informed the meeting that the "Liberator" was in the enjoyment of strong health and buoyant spirits. He intended writing to the Association this week, and on Monday next, he (Mr. M. O'Connell) hoped to have a long letter to read to them from his father. (Cheers.) The hon. member then proceeded to acknowledge subscriptions, and to pay handsome compliments, as he went along, to all who had been so charitably disposed as to send them a donation.—Mr. O'Neil Duant, who has not for some time made his appearance in the hall, next acknowledged a sum of £10 from the county Clare. (Great cheering.)—Mr. William Charles O'Connell, the London "Inspector-General," or chief of all the Repeal tax gatherers, next came forward, and gave an account of his stewardship.—Mr. Maurice O'Connell, after handing in subscriptions from Liverpool and Manchester, proceeded to give an account of a meeting of Repeal wardens which he had convened on the previous afternoon (Sunday). They were determined (he added) to have a warden and collector for every street in Dublin. There were eight hundred streets in the city, and by very moderate exertions, they calculated that they could raise £200 weekly within these precincts.—Mr. O'Neil Duant dwelt at great length upon the subject of Repeal.—Mr. Gratian followed, in a long speech.—The amount of rent was upwards of £600.

HEALTH OF MR. O'CONNELL.—A letter from Derry, describes Mr. O'Connell as in the enjoyment of excellent health, and as occupied during the greater part of the day hunting with his celebrated hounds.

ATTEMPT AT MURDER IN TIPPERARY.—A letter from Roscrea states that the driver of Mr. Laloucha, residing near Wat town, was fired at on Sunday night, and wounded mortally.

POLICE.

CRIME AND DISTRESS.—Two cases have occurred this week which exhibit in a lamentable point of view the effects of poverty. The first took place at Queen-square Police-office on Tuesday, when Sarah Baker, a miserable-looking woman, who appeared to be upwards of seventy years of age, was charged with stealing a half-quarter loaf from the shop of Mrs. Wallace, a baker, 5, Camberwell-road, Chelsea. The son of the prosecutor stated that he was sitting in the parlour that morning, when he saw the prisoner enter the shop, and take a half-quarter loaf from the counter, with which she walked out. He followed, and finding the bread under her shawl, gave her into custody. Prisoner, in reply to the charge, said that she was very sorry, but that starvation had induced her to do it. She had lately been at work in some market gardens, but there being nothing now for her to do in that way, she had become much distressed; she added, that she was ready to faint away from hunger. A friend of the shop-keeper's said that she had been frequently robbed, and could ill afford it, as she was a widow with a large family; she did not wish to press for any very severe punishment on the prisoner. Mr. Read said that being hungry was no excuse in this country for theft; if people were distressed they could always go to their workhouse, where they could get relief. If everybody were allowed to go into a shop and help themselves, tradesmen would soon be ruined. He must commit the prisoner for trial.—Committed accordingly.—The second case, which was heard before the Magistrates at Bromley, on Monday, exhibited another instance of the commission of crime to insure temporary shelter in a prison. Such cases as these afford matter for serious reflection. In the latter instance the accused was a wretched-looking fellow, named Joseph Tyrrell, who was charged with stealing two pounds of bread, value 4s., the property of Mr. White, a baker, at Bromley.—The complainant deposed that the prisoner walked into his shop, and asked for a half-quarter loaf. He handed him one across the counter, and the prisoner immediately seized it, and began to devour it. He tried to take it away from him, but it was of no use, and the prisoner told him that he had no money to pay him for the bread, and he might do what he pleased with him.—The master of the Bromley union workhouse said that the prisoner was admitted into the establishment on Sunday night, as a casual pauper, and his supper was given to him. He refused to get up until half-past seven o'clock in the morning, and, as he then declared he would not do any work, he was turned out of the house.—The prisoner, in answer to the charge, said that he had committed the offence in order that he might be sent to prison. He was suffering under disease, and was anxious to be sent to goal, where he should have an opportunity of being cured.—The Bench said they did not think a charge of felony could be supported. It was clear, however, that the prisoner had brought himself within the provisions of the Vagrant Act, and they should, therefore, commit him for one month to the House of Correction. It will be remarked that the offence in both cases was that of stealing bread to appease the cravings of hunger.

THE AMERICAN GOSSIPING SYSTEM.—At Lambeth-street police-office, Wednesday, William Dumas, an American sailor on board the Prince Oscar, an English vessel at present lying in the London Docks, was charged with the serious offence of "gossiping" or forcing one of the eyes of his captain (Lawson) from its socket, and inflicting other injuries upon him. It was proved in evidence that on the preceding afternoon the prisoner was directed to superintend the top-sail sheets of the vessel, and, in doing so, some words took place between him and the chief mate. The prisoner then went towards the captain, who was on deck, and demanded his wages for some days which were due to him. The captain told him that if he did not conduct himself in a proper manner, he must either go below or on shore. The prisoner became more impatient, upon which Capt. Lawson held him to put him out of the vessel, and a struggle ensued, during which the prisoner made use of the most violent exclamations, and, amongst other things, said, "Only let me get once clear, and I'll do for you." The prisoner managed to overpower the captain, and got on the top of him, when getting the end of his thumb under the eye, he forced it from the socket. Captain Lawson instantly shrieked, and exclaimed, "Oh, he's got my eye out!" and two of the men on board, who had seen their captain's eye falling upon his cheek, became so sick that some moments elapsed before they could go to his assistance, and secure the prisoner. Captain Lawson, with much presence of mind, repelled his eye in the socket, but, in addition to this injury, it was found he had sprained his ankle. He was removed to the London Hospital, where every attention was paid to him. A certificate was put in, stating that Captain Lawson was not in a fit state to attend to give his evidence, or leave the hospital at present, and it was stated that there were but faint hopes entertained of restoring the sight of his eye. The prisoner, in reply to the charge, carelessly replied, that he was in such a state of mind at the time as to be unable to control his passion, and unconscious of what he did. He was remanded to a future day, when Captain Lawson will be able to attend and prosecute him.

CLAIM AGAINST LOUIS PHILIPPE.—At Maylebone police-office, on Wednesday, a tall athletic Frenchman was introduced to the sitting magistrate (Mr. Harrison), who inquired the nature of his business. The applicant (who carried in his hand a great number of papers, some of which were printed): I have to take the liberty, sir, of requesting that you, as a magistrate, will use your best endeavours to get one of my papers presented to her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, in order that it may by her be brought under the notice of King Louis Philippe.—It will be remembered that about a fortnight ago the applicant attended at one of the city police-courts, for the purpose of obtaining a warrant for the detention of the King, immediately upon his setting foot in England; and it need scarcely be added that the wished-for warrant was not granted. The applicant gave a paper into the hands of the magistrate, which Mr. Harrison promised to read. The Frenchman, who seemed highly elated at the magistrate condescending to peruse his appeal to her Majesty in his behalf, bowed respectfully, and then quitted the court. The paper contained a voluminous statement, printed in English and French, in which the writer sets forth certain pecuniary claims on his Majesty the King of the French, for services rendered by him (the applicant) in maintaining and supporting a large number of the most active partisans of the great Revolution of July 1830. The applicant, in very energetic language, mixed with no slight share of bombast, entreats her Majesty to use her influence with her royal guest to induce him to recognise his claim. The applicant is the same person who, between nine and ten years ago, was brought before the then sitting magistrates, Messrs. Shutt and Robbins, charged with having caused a mob to assemble in the vicinity of the residence of the French Ambassador, Manchester-square. Upon that occasion the applicant, who was then a vendor of blacking, was mounted upon a donkey caparisoned in a most grotesque manner; and had a quantity of blacking for sale, which, according to him, was put forth by him, was manufactured from the bones and blood of the skeletons of the hypocrite King Louis Philippe, who had been killed fighting against the Republicans of Lyons. He was then discharged by the magistrates, upon his promising not to cause an obstruction in the streets again.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

There is now an engineer at Bale who is making estimates for constructing a railroad from that city to Olten, traversing the mountains of the Jura, and having branches at Zurich, Lucerne, and Solothurn.

A day or two ago 100 shares in the Thames Tunnel upon which £10 each had been paid, amounting to £1000, were sold to an extensive shareholder at the exceedingly low price of six shillings per share, realising only £600, and £400 less than had been paid for them. The sale was a bona fide one, the shares having been put up by the executors of a deceased gentleman.

The Oporto papers announce the assassination of a Judge on the 17th ult., at Cruz, in the district of Paredes. He was shot in the back as he entered his house at nightfall, and died on the spot. The murderer escaped.

The manufactures of cambrics and lawns, formerly so flourishing in the rural districts between Valenciennes and Cambrai, is declining from day to day. The linen manufactures are almost everywhere by those of cotton. At the commencement of the Restoration 250,000 pieces of cambric were manufactured every year. At present not more than 95,000 pieces are manufactured, the value of which is about 3,950,000 francs.

Accounts have been received of the murder of the captain and two of the crew of the French merchant vessel L'Indie, by the natives of one of the islands in the Gulf of Bengal. The captain and two men had left the vessel in a boat, to take soundings of the coast, and not returning, they were sought for by the rest of the crew, who found them lying murdered on the shore, and stripped of their clothing.

A farmer in Leicestershire found a wasp's nest the other day on the roof of his house, and he put it, wasps and all, into a sack, intending to throw the whole into a pond. Some thieves stole the sack from the door of the farmhouse, and, on their opening it to inspect their booty, the wasps flew out, settling on them and simply punishing them for the theft.

Recent accounts from Rio announce an attempt at suicide by M. de Senzats, Consul General and Chargé d'Affaires of Sweden at the Brazilian Court, but the dose of arsenic by which he had hoped to effect his purpose was not so strong, and did not effect the intended object. The cause of his desperate act was said to be his dismissal from his post. He is said to have been much beloved by the ex-King of Sweden.

The Liverpool papers say that the practicability of connecting the opposite shores of the Mersey by a stupendous chain bridge is under consideration.

We learn from Naples, 27th ult., that great preparations are making there for the marriage of his Royal Highness the Duke d'Aumale, who is expected at Naples about the end of this month.

It appears by a letter from Vienna, that the Emperor of Austria has positively ordered the suppression of lotteries in his states from the 1st of January next.

The long-pending law suits between Sir Richard Dobson, Knt., and Mr. Sutton, on the one side, and the watermen of Greenwich on the other, relative to the pier at Greenwich, have been finally decided by Sir John Bailey, Bart., to whom they were referred at Maidstone assizes in March last, in favour of the watermen.

Several of the papers this week have given an account of the death of the infidel preacher and writer, the Rev. Robert Taylor, which is stated to have taken place at Tours in France last month. He had renounced, or professed to have renounced, his delusional principles. Mr. Taylor was for some time in a declining state of health. He was 53 years of age. He had written several works, and has left, it is said, a mass of manuscript on the subject of revealed religion.

Some excitement has been caused at Mayence in consequence of the approaching trial of the young Prince of Leiningen for striding the wife of a lot-keeper of a drawbridge. The Prince, who had crossed the river in a boat, refused to pay the toll, and the blow was struck during an altercation that ensued. The Prince is a member of a former reigning family in Germany, is related to several royal families, and also closely allied to the royal family of England.

Jocoso, the Sauk chief, who was presented to Queen Victoria, and her royal court, a few weeks since, died of consumption on the 3rd of September, in Cleveland, Ohio, far from home, and relatives, but kindly provided for by a benevolent family residing in Cleveland. He was 35 years of age. There is every reason to believe that he died of consumption, brought on by the dissipation of civilized life.

MURDER OF AN ENGLISHMAN AT CALAIS.—A sad event has placed all Calais in movement. The Commissaire de Police for Pauports, M. Sullier, had been drinking on Sunday night with a Mr. Thorne, an English surgeon, at which time they were apparently on very friendly terms; when, about one o'clock in the morning, they went to the commissaire's office together, for what reason is not known, when a dispute arose, and the commissaire stabbed the other to the heart with a poignard, which, after some search, was discovered in the office.

Mr. Thorne fell on the floor, and died instantly. He was a quiet man, who has resided at Calais several years, and has left a widow and several children. M. Sullier was a man not much liked in the town from his habits of drinking, and in consequence he showed at times some rudeness of manner. There is a report that M. Sullier owed Mr. Thorne money lost at cards. However, all is uncertain, and probably will ever remain so, no one having been present at the dispute. Mr. Sullier spoke English remarkably well, and had formerly been an actor. The murderer was given into the custody of the gens d'armes, who detained him at his own house till the arrival of the Procureur du Roi from Belgium. An investigation has been made of the affair by the Procureur du Roi, at the Town-hall (the body of the deceased being in the apartment, according to the law in France), before the Mayor and the second Commissaire of Police. This investigation was private, and lasted till half-past ten o'clock at night, when it would appear there was thought to be sufficient circumstantial evidence against M. Sullier, and he was sent off under a guard to the prison of Besseigne, and from thence he will be transferred to St. Omer, and tried in the course of next month. M. Sullier has not admitted his guilt, but, during the investigation, constantly alleged that he had no recollection of any of the acts imputed to him. Mr. Thorne has left a widow and three children, objects of great commiseration.

On Thursday week, died at Ewell-hall, Major-General Cotton, in his 67th year. He entered the army at the age of 19, in 1797, as ensign of the 5th Foot.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL SIR JOHN POO BARRINGTON, BART., K.C.B., AND R.D.S.—This distinguished flag-officer expired on Wednesday, at the Hall, Huddersfield, Yorkshire, after a protracted illness. The deceased Admiral Sir John Poo Barrington, Bart., was born in 1759, and was illegitimate son of George first Marquis of Waterford, and brother of Viscount Barrington. Sir John at an early age entered the navy, as the date of his entry is in the year 1782.

LECTURES ON THE EAR.—Mr. Curtis, in recently commencing his autumnal course of lectures on the ear at the Royal Dispensary, Dean-street, Soho, discussed the improvements and discoveries recently introduced in auricular surgery, and described what, in a recent visit to Paris, he had become acquainted with. Amongst other illustrations of the science of auricular surgery the lecturer exhibited the curves of the ear, and showed their minute ramifications by means of Cary's double achromatic microscope. He then went more minutely into the curative processes of various diseases of the organs of hearing, describing the nature and application of ligatures, the forceps, &c.; and showed how herpes, and other cutaneous affections of the auricle, are removed by the authorisation, and in what manner Tinnitus Aurium is made to yield to the internal administration of Arsenic Monia and Imperatoria Osmatrum, combined with the valiant use of zinc and the citrate and lactate of iron. The lecturer also described the use of Gruber's speculum, a lamp for viewing the meatus and membrane of the tympanum, and the use of the ophthalmoscope to judge of the normal and abnormal sounds in the organ of hearing. He concluded by adverting to the mode of treating the deaf and dumb; and advocated a system in which endeavours should be made to develop the latent sense of hearing in patients, instead of supplying a substitute for such sense, and thereby condensing deafness, instead of curing it.

MAQUERADES AT VACKHALL GARDENS.—There was a masquerade at these gardens on Wednesday evening, and the conductors of the entertainment had evidently used their best endeavours to satisfy their guests. Masquerades in England are generally rather dull affairs, however, and the amusement must depend more upon the patrons themselves than upon those who project them. Those present seemed to feel this, and consequently vast exertions were made to induce mirth; it was, however, of rather a hoistrous description. There was no lack of characters, some of which were well supported, and upon the whole, the entertainment passed off satisfactorily for all parties.

THE LONDON DOCKS.—Great progress is being made in the works and improvements at this great commercial establishment. The splendid new warehouse in course of erection, facing the wool-warehouse and abutting on the west quay, on the site where the superintendent's office and baggage-warehouse originally stood, is rapidly advancing towards completion. That portion of the new warehouse facing the wool-warehouse is already finished and roofed, it being intended to carry that part higher than the warehouse on the opposite side. The portion allotted to stands on the site of the range of shops which formerly stood between the outer and inner gates, being enormous for natural instruments, ship-tackle, &c., well known to commercial men and persons having business at that place of traffic. The other portion of the warehouse is of great extent and strength, consisting of several floors, for the housing of tea, &c. Spacious vaults have also been made underneath this warehouse.

POSTSCRIPT.

RECEPTION OF LOUIS PHILIPPE.—A letter from Portsmouth, dated Thursday evening, says:—"This morning, a few minutes before twelve o'clock, the French war-steamer Elan came into harbour from Treport, which she left on Wednesday evening, with despatches from her Majesty the Queen of the French to her royal consort. This was the vessel that was despatched by his Majesty Louis Philippe immediately after his arrival on Tuesday, with letters to the Queen. It appears that they were to announce his having reached the shores of England in safety, and the enthusiastic reception he had met with from the British people. The accounts brought by the Elan state that nothing could equal the delight of the Queen upon perusing his Majesty's letters, and that she expressed her gratification in the most unmeasured terms at the flattering manner in which his Majesty had been received. The despatches brought by the Elan were immediately forwarded to his Majesty at Windsor.

ADDRESS TO THE KING OF THE FRENCH.—The Court of Common Council has agreed to an address of congratulation to Louis Philippe. It is similar to that voted by the Court of Aldermen, and both addresses will probably be presented to his Majesty together.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—We are sorry to hear that her Majesty's health will not admit of her enjoying the festivities at Windsor Castle during the visit of Louis Philippe.

THE KING OF SAXONY.—A letter from Leipzig, dated Sept. 29, says:—"His Majesty the King of Saxony, before his journey to England, made purchases of a Jewish jeweller to the amount of 30,000 dollars for presents. On distributing them it appeared that most of the stones were false, for which reason the return of all the presents is requested."

THE FRENCH OFFICERS AT PORTSMOUTH.—The officers of the French squadron were entertained at dinner, on Wednesday, by Major-General Sir Hercules and Lady Pakenham. The dinner-party consisted of Vice-Admiral Baron de Nassau, Baron de Larosiere, and Capitaine Gouin, of his Majesty's ship Gomer; Capitaine Comte d'Harcourt, of his Majesty's ship La Reine Amelie; le Duc d'Harcourt, Capitaine Comte de Valmont, Capitaine d'Armand, of his Majesty's ship Caiman; Capitaine Brunet, of his Majesty's ship Piton; Capitaine d'Extremont de Manerdy, of his Majesty's ship Favos; the Earl of Yarborough, Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker; Capt. Lord Adolphus Francis, of his Majesty's Royal yacht; Colonel Sir James Schœdlin, 18th Regt. 1. Hon. Sir Francis and Lady Stapleton, Lady Louisa Noel, &c. &c. Major-General and Lady Pakenham also issued cards of invitation to an evening party to the whole of the naval and military officers in command, and to the principal people in the neighbourhood. Among those present were the Earl and Countess of Orkney, the Vice-Chancellor of England, Hon. Captain and Mrs. Byng, &c. &c. The band of the Royal Marine played during the evening. A handsome supper was served.

DEATH OF THE DEAN OF CARLISLE.—We have to announce the demise of the Rev. Dr. Hodgson, Dean of Carlisle, at his mansion in Lower Grosvenor-street, on Thursday morning, after a protracted illness. The late dean was also rector of the wealthy parish of St. George, Hanover-square, which living he had held for forty years, and the net revenue of which is of the annual value of £1850. The deanery is worth about £1600 a year.

Mrs. Byng, the sister of Sir W. Follett, the Attorney-General, died on Thursday, at her residence in Seville-row.

NEWS OF DR. WOLFE.—Dr. Wolfe writes from Bokhara, dated July 25:—"The Amer has returned from Kokhan, and presented me with a dress of honour, a horse, and one hundred tomans, and I hope to set out in a few days for Persia."

SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL OFFICE.—Yesterday (Friday) the subscribers to this institution assembled at the office, King William-street, City, for the purpose of receiving the quarterly statements regarding patients, finances, &c. At two o'clock John Labouchere, Esq., took the chair, when the report was read, which stated that the total number of patients admitted from the 1st of July to the 30th of September had been 761, several of whom had been discharged since, much relieved, leaving the number at present on board 161. Detaching the expenditure for the period, a balance of £248 remained. The total number of the relieved since the commencement amounts to 49,155.

FIRE AT TOTTENHAM.—On Thursday a fire was discovered on the farm of Mr. Frederick Antenbrink, Farmwood-green, Tottenham, Middlesex. After the fire had raged for two hours, the firemen succeeded in reducing it, but not until the bee-house, granary, cottage, cart-shed, calf-pen, stacks of hay, beams, farming implements, &c., had been consumed. The stable, dwelling-house, and other out-buildings on the opposite side of the yard were with the utmost difficulty saved.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE BRANDLING JUNCTION RAILWAY.—We have received a report of an inquest which was held on Wednesday at South Shields, on the body of John Brown, who was killed on the Brandling Junction Railway, under circumstances stated in another part of our paper. Evidence was adduced of a similar nature to the facts there mentioned, and the jury gave the following verdict:—"That the deceased was killed by the Nelson locomotive engine propelling a carriage, in which was the said John Brown, and against certain other carriages, thereby causing his death, the engine being the property of the Brandling Railway Company. Deceased on the engine, £300." The jury also expressed a strong opinion that the accident was the result of gross negligence and mismanagement of the agents of the company. Mr. Alport, the superintendent of the railway, produced a list of persons seriously injured:—John Brown and Joseph Burrell (since dead), John Young, William Westwell, George Gamble, Thomas Baley, William Greenwell, John Derthwaite, John Tindall, John Wilkinson, guard, and Anthony Brown. There were other persons slightly injured. Greenwell, Gamble, and Young, are still in a precarious state.

SEVEN LIVES LOST AT PLYMOUTH.—On Wednesday, a boat containing eleven persons was swamped while sailing over the ridge of rocks which stretches from Drake's Island to Mount Edgumbe, and seven of them were drowned. The names of the unfortunate persons are—Thomas Mayne, seaman on board her Majesty's ship Reliance;—Cummings, ditto;—Robertson, ditto;—Thomas, ditto;—Lacombe, ditto; Atwell, waterman, plying at Mutton Cove; and Amelia Smart, wife of a seaman on board her Majesty's ship Rhadamanthus.—An inquest was held at Devonport on the body of the unfortunate woman, whose body has been brought ashore, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death by drowning."

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE CRIMSON DRAWING-ROOM:—INTRODUCTION OF LOUIS PHILIPPE TO THE INFANT ROYAL FAMILY.

England and the Insigula of France (the latter copied from "the Charter," entwined with bay and laurel; together with the crest of France, the black cock, and the motto of St. Michael.

Shortly after, the Queen and Prince Albert, the King of the French, the Duchess of Kent, and the Duke de Montpensier entered the White Room, where a déjeuner was served to the august circle. The other distinguished visitors and the members of the royal suite were conducted to the Oak Room and the Ecquerrie Room, where a déjeuner was served.

[Dinner was served at seven o'clock in the dining-room. The table was tastefully decorated with sprays of silver gilt filled with artificial flowers, also with vases and other ornaments, and was lighted by gold candelabras with wax lights. George IV.'s magnificent wine-cooler was placed in the centre window of this apartment.

The next of our engravings shows the Grand Corridor, with the royal party proceeding to the banquet. The entire corridor occupies the southern and eastern inner sides of the great quadrangle of the castle, and its entire extent is 500 feet; it communicates with the several private apartments, and at the angle is a beautiful staircase exclusively used by her Majesty. The corridor is cased with oak, richly carved in the perpendicular style of architecture; the walls are nearly covered with paintings, numbering 109 by Canaletti; and 129 by Zuccarelli; upon the floor are ranged superb candelabras and cabinets, and upon pilasters and pedestals five marble busts of distinguished literary characters of the last century, and bronzes of eminent Frenchmen. There are throughout the entire corridor upwards of 300 ebony chairs and stools.

The company included his Majesty Louis Philippe, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier, Lady Charlotte Dundas, Countess Wratlaw, the Count and Countess de St. Anlaire, the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Exeter, the Earl of Liverpool, Earl Delaware, the Earl of Jersey, the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir Robert Peel, M. Guizot, Admiral de Mackau, Count de Jarnac, General Athalin, General Rungui, Colonel Dumas, Count de Chabannes, M. Jarnar, Baron de Pain, M. Pasquier, M. Pasquier, an aide-de-camp to the Duke de Montpensier; Viscount Sydney, Lord in Waiting on the King; and Lord Charles Wellesley (Clerk-Marshal), Equerry in Waiting on the King.

The band of the Royal Horse Guards attended during dinner. Her Majesty's private band afterwards attended at the castle.

The wish of her Majesty, as well as that of Louis Philippe, has been to treat this visit purely as one of a private nature, and consequently the same quiet manner of receiving her guests was adopted as was observed last year. The range of rooms set apart for Louis Philippe are situated in the north wing of the castle, looking immediately upon the manoeuvring ground of the Home-park, below the slopes. The suite is that which was recently occupied by his Imperial Majesty of Russia, and is only very slightly altered from the disposition which it received for the Czar's reception. The anti-room, the drawing-room, the private council-room, the library, are all fitted up alike in crimson silk, with the royal insignia embossed in the pattern. The King's bedroom is the blue and silver chamber, which was furnished under the direction of her Majesty Queen Adelaide, whose cypher is embossed or wrought on the pattern of the beautiful blue silk hangings which adorn the walls. The four corner pillars of the bed are each surmounted by a helmet, and the fauvels and coussins are in the style of furniture in vogue during the time of the Regent D'Orléans. The pictures which adorn the walls of this most unique and splendid suite are mostly masterpieces. The principal drawing-room is hung with the chefs-d'œuvre of Rubens, of whom it is well known the superiority of the Windsor collection has enabled her Majesty to become a most competent judge and admirer. Hon-thorst, Kaelier, Holbein, Zuccarelli, and some also of the secondary painters of the French school, contribute to the decoration of the remaining apartments and afford ample scope for the indulgence of that refined love of art for which Louis Philippe is so celebrated. In one of the rooms is placed the splendid vase of marble, presented by the Emperor of Russia, and which is matched both in size and form. This beautiful work of art is flanked by two statues of Berlin spar, of fine proportions, presented to her Majesty by the King of Prussia.

One of the engravings, at page 233, shows the crimson or principal drawing-room, which is only used upon state occasions. The furniture of this apartment is extremely costly; the screens, chairs, &c., being of carved oak, gilt, and the draperies of rich, embroidered velvet. Two of the most interesting pictures are Haymer's portrait of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Kent; and Winterhalter's portrait of her Majesty the Duchess of Kent.

THE ROYAL PARTY AT WINDSOR.

The King of the French, who experienced not the slightest fatigue after his long and rapid journey, rose, according to custom, at an early hour on Wednesday morning, and walked for some time on the Slopes, enjoying the magnificent scenery, with which his previous residence in England has rendered him familiar. His Majesty breakfasted in his private apartment, and was visited immediately afterwards by the Queen and Prince Albert.

The King spent some time in viewing the magnificent collection of paintings with which the walls of the principal state apartments are so profusely decorated.

In the afternoon, at three o'clock, his Majesty the King of the French entered the Grand Quadrangle from the Queen's Entrance, accompanied by her Majesty and Prince Albert, and passed through George the Fourth's Gateway, on the South-terrace of the Castle. Their Majesties and his Royal Highness proceeded on the South and East Terraces, followed by a party including some of the vicarages and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting of the royal suite.

The royal and august party re-entered the Castle, and afterwards quitting it by the Norman-gate, walked down to St. George's Chapel, which their Majesties and the Prince entered. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor received the illustrious visitors, and attended them during their inspection of the different objects of interest within the sacred edifice. Louis Philippe stopped for some minutes before the choir, evidently admiring the splendid carvings, the altarpiece (which is a painting of "The Last Supper," by West) the knights' banners and stalls, and the general picturesque appearance of this portion of the sacred edifice. He proceeded under the organ-loft into the nave; and after visiting the Beautiful, Lincoln, Aldworth, Redland, and May chapels, and the cenotaph to the memory of the late Princess Charlotte at the north-west corner of the nave, went up the north aisle to the chapter room, which is ornamented with a full-length portrait of Edward III., the founder of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. The King is represented in his robes of state, holding a sword, on which are displayed the crowns of England and France. The two-handed sword of Edward III., which hangs on one side of his portrait, excited the especial attention and curiosity of Louis Philippe and his son, the Duke de Montpensier. This singular weapon, which is nearly seven feet in length, and of great weight, was taken down by the King's special desire, and placed in the hands of his Majesty.

After viewing St. George's Chapel, the august party entered Cardinal Wolsey's Chapel, and afterwards took their departure, attended by the Dean to the entrance.

Passing round the base of the Round Tower, his Majesty Louis Philippe, having the Queen on his arm, accompanied by Prince Albert, and followed by the royal suite, entered the precincts of the Castle, near St. George's Gate, and walked down the Home park to the Dairy.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Charlotte Dundas, Lady in Waiting, and Colonel Sir George Couper, Comptroller of her Royal Highness's Household, received their Majesties and his Royal Highness at the entrance to Frogmore House.

His Majesty and the Queen and Prince Albert remained near an hour with the royal Duchess, and then left, followed by the different ladies and gentlemen of their respective suites; the illustrious party returning in pony carriages to the Castle at twenty-five minutes to five o'clock.

His Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier returned to the Castle to dinner from town.

Vicount and Viscountess Canning and Lady Peel arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen.

A grand dinner was given in the evening at seven o'clock, in St. George's Hall, in honour of her Majesty's august visitor. The magnificent service of gold plate was used on the occasion.

The long table on which the dinner was served was covered with magnificent candelabras, épergnes, vases, wine-coolers, and dishes, all of gold or silver gilt. In the centre of the table were épergnes and candelabras, placed alternately; several of the former, of a circular form, being filled with artificial flowers. A row of candelabras, with wax lights, were placed on each side, and beyond these, at both sides of the table, were numerous vases, wine-coolers, and dishes, of the most elegant forms and designs.

At each end of the hall were erected sideboards of equal dimensions, containing a choice selection from the numerous and valuable articles of plate in the royal treasury, remarkable for their excellence of workmanship, antiquity, or historical interest.

Flaxman's celebrated "Shield of Achilles," "The Amaziad Ure," and some ancient armour were displayed on the west sideboard; and a large shield sculptured in high relief, with the representation of a battle, and the "Neptune Épergne," richly embellished with marine emblems, and surrounded with a statue of the Marine Deity, were on the east sideboard. Numerous tankards, vases, shields, and bulb cups, richly chased, were tastefully arranged on a background of crimson, and were very brilliantly illuminated with candelabras and scenes of silver gilt, bearing wax lights.

Two of the most superb articles of ivory in the Royal Collection are engraved at pages 238 and 239.

THE NAUTICAL SHELL.—This exquisite work of art is believed, upon good authority, to be the work of Benvenuto Cellini. The height of the cup is twenty inches. The breadth of light on the face of the shell is admirably supported by the richness of the general details, which are themselves made more gorgeous by the contrast.

THE "PANTHER'S" PRACOCKE. so much admired in her Majesty's buffets, formed, originally, the crowning embellishment, or focal, of Tippon Sahib's throne. The jewels consist of diamonds, emeralds, rubies, and pearls—the ruby pendant from the head being one of the largest and finest known. The height from the feet to the top of the tail is seventeen inches. The estimated value of the whole is £30,000.

The Queen was seated at the north side of the table, between his Majesty Louis Philippe and his Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier. Opposite were seated Prince Albert between the Countess St. Aulaire and Lady Charlotte Dundas.

The Prince of Wales' Épergne, crowned with his Royal Highness's Plume, was placed at this part of the table, between the other épergnes of great beauty sculptured in gold at the base with "Dancing Fauns." These épergnes had on either side the "Hesperides" candelabras.

M. Gazon, the Earl of Aberdeen, his Excellency Count de St. Aulaire, the Countess of Gainsborough, the Duke of Wellington, had also seats in the vicinity of the royal circle.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent sat by the side of the King of the French.

The following had the honour of dining with the Queen: The Count and Countess St. Aulaire, Prince Castelnuovo, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Lyndhurst, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Wellington, Marquis of Exeter, Lady Charlotte Dundas, Earl of Liverpool, Earl and Countess Dehew, Lady Mary West, Earl of Jersey, Earl of Aberdeen, Earl of Jersey, Lord and Lady Warrimble, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Sir Robert and Lady Peel, Sir James and Lady Graham, Sir George Murray, Sir W. Fremantle and Miss Henry, Sir Henry Wheatley, Sir George Couper, Lady Isabella Wemyss, Sir Charles Bowler, the Provost of Eton and the Hon. Mrs. Hodgson, the Hon. and Rev. R. Stoddard, Mr. George R. Anson, Hon. Miss Lytton, Monsieur Guizot, Admiral de Mackau, Count de Jarnac, General Athalin, General Romilly Col. Dumas, Count de Chabannes, M. Tolly, Baron de Fain, M. Farquier, M. Paquer, M. Herbet, M. Hennequin, Le Capitaine Page, Le Capitaine Pelion, Viscount Sydney, Lord C. Wellesley, and the Hon. Captain Duncombe.

The band of the Scots Fusilier Guards was stationed in a gallery at the west end of the hall during dinner, and performed several pieces.

After dinner her Majesty's private band, with numerous additions of the most eminent performers, attended, under the direction of Mr. Anderson.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.
The chér-à-bon, the magnificent gift presented to her Majesty by the King of the French, was used, for the first time since its arrival at Windsor from Paris, this morning.

Arrangements having been made last evening for his Majesty, accompanied by the Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, &c., to proceed to Twickenham, Hampton Court, Bushy and Claremont, this morning, in the chér-à-bon, this splendid equipage, with four horses, arrived in the quadrangle from the Royal Mews shortly after nine o'clock.

At twenty minutes before eleven o'clock, her Majesty and the King of the French, the Queen leaning on the arm of her royal guest, descended the grand staircase, followed by Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Duke de Montpensier, and several other distinguished guests and royal attendants, to the quadrangle, where the chér-à-bon was in waiting. The Queen was handed to the front seat of the carriage by her King, who took his seat by her side, on the left of her Majesty.

The Duke de Montpensier handed the Duchess of Kent into the second seat, and placed himself on the left of her Royal Highness. On the third row were his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Countess of Gainsborough, the Lady in Waiting upon the Queen; and on the hindmost seat were Admiral Mackau and General Baron Athalin.

Lord Charles Wellesley and Colonel Bouverie were in attendance on horseback. The royal party proceeded to Sunbury Common, where relays of horses had been sent, and thence to Twickenham, Hampton, &c., on to Claremont to luncheon, which had been early this morning despatched from the castle.

Her Majesty and illustrious guests returned to the castle from Claremont through Chertsey, to which place relays of horses had also been sent this morning shortly before six o'clock. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent alighted at Frogmore House, on the return of the royal party passing by the mansion to the palace.

Upon the approach of the royal carriage the illustrious party were received with enthusiastic cheering, which continued throughout the whole line up to the gates leading to the castle. The King of the French (who looked remarkably well), and her Majesty returned these loyal and affectionate greetings in the most marked and humane manner. The King appeared warmly to appreciate the gratifying cheers which saluted him on every side.

The grand banquet will take place this evening, and also to-morrow and Saturday, in St. George's Hall.

On Sunday the dinner will be served in the grand dining-room.

His Majesty and his Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier, with their respective suites, will attend high mass, at the Roman Catholic Chapel, at Clarendon, on Sunday next. The service will be performed by the Rev. Mr. Williamson.

In consequence of the lateness of the season, and the extremely unfavourable state of the ground, it is now extremely problematical if a review will take place in the Great Park during his Majesty's visit.

The grand banquet to be given by her Majesty, in honour of the auspicious occasion, which will take place at seven o'clock in the evening, in the Hall of St. George, will be of the greatest magnificence and regal splendour. The banquetting table, the elevated sideboards, and the side-tables, will be profusely decorated with the most gorgeous specimens of the gold plate, selected from the royal treasure, agreeably to the suggestions, and in accordance with the refined taste of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Covers will be laid for upwards of one hundred royal and illustrious guests.

WINDSOR, Friday Evening.

ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY FROM THE CORPORATION OF WINDSOR.
This morning, at nine o'clock, the members of the Corporation, with the Rev. Isaac Gossett, the vicar, in full canonicals, assembled in the Council Chamber, at the Town Hall, for the purpose of proceeding in procession to the Castle, to present the following address, which had been agreed to at a numerous meeting of the Aldermen and Town Council on the preceding day:—

"To his Majesty, Louis Philippe, King of the French."

"The humble address of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of New Windsor, in the county of Berks, in council assembled."

"May it please your Majesty,"

"We, Ber British Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the ancient borough of New Windsor, most respectfully beg leave to tender your Majesty the expression of our sincere and hearty congratulations on the safe arrival of your Majesty on the shores of England, on your visit to our gracious Monarch at the long favoured seat of the sovereigns of this country."

"The presence of your Majesty at the Castle of Windsor must at any time have formed a subject of lively congratulation, as tending more firmly to cement in the bonds of friendship the justly popular monarchs of two of the most powerful nations on the face of the globe. But we have now so recently witnessed the splendid and hospitable reception awarded to the Queen of England by your Majesty and all the members of your illustrious family, and the joyous enthusiasm which pervaded the entire French people on the occasion of her Majesty's visit at your palace on the shores of Normandy, that we are especially delighted your Majesty should now be inclined to experience amongst us the renewal of that cordial and affectionate welcome, the echoes of whose fervent greetings, and the universal expression of royal devotion and attachment with which her Majesty was invariably cheered during her sojourn at the Chateau, and in the beautiful environs of Eu."

"We are sensible, Sir, that to the wisdom and vigour of your Majesty's counsels, and to your increasing endeavours to promote the truest interests of the powerful and generous nation which Providence has committed to your care, may be greatly attributed the reigning tranquillity of Europe; and we venture to assure, that by co-ordinating a friendly and personal intercourse between your Majesty and the sovereigns of Great Britain, your Majesty adopts the surest means, not only of strengthening the happy and stable alliance between the two countries, but of encouraging the governments of surrounding kingdoms to the maintenance of their present amiable relations with each other."

"May your Majesty be long spared, in union with our gracious Sovereign, to cultivate the arts of peace. May your Majesty's constant and zealous exertions to advance the general welfare of mankind be crowned by the dutiful and loyal attachment of all classes of the gallant and enlightened people whose destinies are placed under the wise and paternal government of your Majesty. And may the two mighty empires of Great Britain and France be so indissolubly connected by the relations of amity and concord, as to ensure and perpetuate to both, and the world at large, the blessings of uninterrupted peace and repose."

The civic procession left the hall at half-past nine, preceded by the mayor, who, with the whole of the members of the corporation, was in his full official robes. Upon their arrival at the Castle, they were taken to the Queen's drawing (on Zuccarini) room, there to wait the pleasure of the King. After waiting for a few minutes, the mayor, vicar, and town councillors were ushered into the presence of his Majesty, in the King's drawing-room, where his Majesty (who was surrounded by the Duke de Montpensier, Admiral Mackau, General Hamigny, Count Dumas, General Baron Athalin, Count de Chabannes, Colonel Thierry, Baron Fain, and several others in the suite of the King) received them in the most gracious and affable manner. The address, after having been read by the town clerk in an extremely emphatic and feeling manner, was handed by him to the mayor, who presented it to his Majesty, by whom it was received very graciously. The King made an extremely suitable and appropriate extemporaneous reply to the address.

Thirty of the Yeomen of the Queen's Guard also arrived at Windsor this morning, their services having been so commanded by the Queen this afternoon, at the Palace. They were accompanied by the Earl of Beverley, Captain Sir Samuel Hancock, and Thomas Seymour Sadler, Esq., Knave; and Jonathan Minterhope, Esq., Clerk of the Cheque and Secretary.

VISIT TO THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

Her Majesty, accompanied by the King of the French, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, left the Castle this day at noon, in an open pony carriage and four, and proceeded across the Home Park, to Frogmore House, to pay a morning visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. Three other pony carriages and four, containing Prince Albert, the Duke de Montpensier, M. Guizot, Admiral Mackau, and several others of the illustrious guests, followed the Queen and the King of the French.

The royal and distinguished party, after alighting for a short time at the mansion, again entered the carriage, driving along the Frogmore road, and entering the Home Park at the iron gates opposite the Long Walk. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent received them to the Castle in lanchon, in the carriage with the Queen and his Majesty Louis Philippe.

Her Majesty and her august visitors lunched at half-past one o'clock, in consequence of the invitations having been appointed to take place at half-past two.

INVESTITURE OF THE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

This afternoon, at two o'clock, a guard of honour, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Mierneuf, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, marched into the Quadrangle, and took up its position beneath the window of the Guard Chamber, and directly opposite to the Grand Entrance to the State Apartments.

The following members of the Hon. Corps of Gentlemen at Arms were stationed as a guard of honour at the door of the King of the French's apartments:—T. G. Wright, A. Perkins, H. L. Ewart, and E. C. Murray, Esquires. The remainder of the Honourable Corps were stationed in the Blue Chamber, forming a double line through which the Knights proceeded to the Throne-room, in which were stationed G. Platt and G. Donne, Esquires, two of the Gentlemen at Arms.

The Queen, being seated on a chair of state, and the Knights Companions having taken their respective places at the table, the Chancellor of the Order, the Bishop of Oxford, signified, by her Majesty's command, the Sovereign's royal will and pleasure, that Louis Philippe, the King of the French, should be elected into the Most Noble Order.

The Knight Companions then proceeded to the election, and the suffrages having been collected by the Chancellor, were by the Lord Bishop presented to the Sovereign, who commanded his lordship to declare that his Majesty Louis Philippe, King of the French, had been elected a Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

The King of the French was then conducted from an adjoining apartment into the Chapter-room by their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge, preceded by Garter King of Arms, Sir Charles Young, bearing the ensigns of the Order upon a crimson velvet cushion, and by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Sir Augustus Clifford. Upon entering the Chapter-room, his Majesty was received by the Sovereign and the Knight Companions, standing, and placed in a chair of state on the right hand of the Sovereign. Her Majesty then announced to the King of the French that his Majesty had been duly elected a Knight of the Most Noble Order.

Garter, upon his knee, then presented the garter to her Majesty. The Sovereign, who was assisted by Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge, buckled it on the left knee of the King, the Chancellor pronouncing the usual admonition.

Garter next presented, in like manner, the Ribband and George, when her Majesty, assisted as before, placed these ensigns over the left shoulder of the King, the Chancellor pronouncing the admonition. The Sovereign then gave the accolade to the King of the French, when his Majesty received the congratulations of the Knight Companions present.

The Chapter being ended, Garter, by her Majesty's command, again called over the Knight Companions, who with the Officers of the Order, then retired from the presence of the Sovereign with the usual severances.

Her Majesty, on retiring from the chapter-room, took the arm of the King of the French (paying his Majesty the highest compliment ever conferred upon a newly-created Knight of the Order), and proceeded with the King to the door of his apartment, and there left his Majesty, proceeding thence, attended by the lady, maids of honour, &c. in waiting, to her own room on the south side of the palace.

Before, and at the conclusion of the investiture, the band of the Scots Fusilier Guards, stationed in the Quadrangle, played several favourite airs from the compositions of Rossini, Beethoven, Asher, &c.

CARRIAGE LEAVING THIS AFTERNOON.

Between 4 and 5 o'clock this afternoon, her Majesty, accompanied by the King of the French, left the Quadrangle in a pony carriage and four by George IV.'s gateway, crossing the Frogmore road (which was crowded at this point by an immense number of persons who had arrived in Windsor during the day, and by whom their Majesties were received with loud acclamations) into the Long Walk, through which they drove into the Great Park.

Their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, the Duke de Montpensier, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and several of her Majesty's visitors and royal suite were on horseback.

In the second carriage were their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent and Cambridge.

Several other carriages and four, filled with her Majesty's distinguished guests, followed.

The royal and illustrious party returned to the Castle through the Long Walk, after being absent for about an hour.

THE ROYAL BANQUET, MUSIC, &c.

Covers were laid this evening, in St. George's Hall, for 130. The banquetting table was unadorned, if possible, in a still more gorgeous and magnificent manner, with gold plate, épergnes, candelabras, vases, wine coolers, &c., than upon the two former occasions of the banquet in St. George's Hall during his Majesty's visit.

The band of the Scots Fusilier Guards performed during the dinner in the Western Gallery.

At the conclusion of the banquet the Queen and her illustrious visitors retired to the Waterloo Gallery where tea and coffee were served.

Her Majesty's private band, led by Mr. Anderson, was stationed in the gallery and performed during the remainder of the evening. The Queen's private band of musicians was strengthened this evening by the following members, amongst others, of the Philharmonic Society:—Messrs. W. and T. Blagrove, Loder, Thomas, Gramsch, Howell, and Lucas.

VISIT OF HIS MAJESTY TO ETON COLLEGE.

The King, at the royal dinner-party at the Castle, yesterday evening, expressed a very warm desire to the Rev. Mr. Hawtrey, the Head Master of Eton, who was one of her Majesty's guests, to pay that ancient seat of learning a visit before his departure from Windsor. The honour of a visit from the French Sovereign to Eton College, will, it is expected, be conferred upon the authorities in the course of to-morrow.

DEPARTURE OF HIS MAJESTY.

It is stated that the King will leave Windsor on Monday next for Portsmouth, and be accompanied by his Majesty and the Prince Consort.

The Honourable Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms dined this evening at the White Hart Hotel.

THE MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.

THE NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains a paper entitled "Africa in France; or the Beard and the Pipe," a sort of feu d'Espoir at "La Jeune France" and the rage for smoking; although we suspect there to be more smoke than fire in the article itself. The next paper, "The Last of the Contrabandieri," is a pleasant Italian romance; and "The Lover's Rock," by Mrs. Romer, is of the Spanish school. Mrs. Trollope continues "The Robertes on their Travels;" Lillian Blanchard has a smart sketch, "On Considering Oneself Horse-whipped;" and "Peter Prigins," a piece of quiet humour, entitled "Kitty Dangerous," perhaps, is the gem of the number.

BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY is, altogether, a lively number. In the "Scattergood Papers" are some piquant glances at the "Shakespeare" mania, and "Fancy Fair," "The Rainbow of Reality," and "The Monthly Muff" are not to be mistaken. "The Inn at Henley-in-Arden, and the Shakespearian enthusiast and matter-of-fact damper are admirable. Leech's illustration, too, of Mr. Fogg's Shakespearian dream is clever. "Miss Jifkin's Benefit," by Charles Whitehead, is pleasant enough; but "Smoking Robin," by Abraham Elder, is weak and pointless. Miss Costello, we perceive, has commenced "Sketches of Legendary Cities," with Chester, which we accept as a sort of make-weight to the "airy nothings" of the number. In weaving fact with fiction, Miss Costello is one of the most accomplished writers of her day.

TAIT has a sterling number. The attempted parallel, or rather the contrast, of Burns and Byron, is, however, a sad failure. William Howitt's sketch from the Swedish, "The Carpenter and the Capricious Monk," is better stuff. "A Teacher's Journal" relates, somewhat too barely, the sufferings of that much-to-be-pitied class. "The Life of Lord Eldon" furnishes the staple for a capital review paper, in "TAIT's" usual style.

BLACKWOOD contains but eight papers, three of which are review essays; the pegs being "The Life of the First Earl of Malmesbury," "Thierry's History of the Gauls," and "Finlay's Greece under the Romans." The lighter articles are scarcely worth characterising; the conclusion of "The Witchfinder" is, however, intensely interesting. The continuation of the papers, "On the Poems and Ballads of Schiller," will be gladly welcomed; but, despite of much excellent writing, the number is unattractive.

THE UNITED SERVICE MAGAZINE opens with a second notice of "France and Morocco," full of well-timed details. The next article, on "The Banners and National Colours of Poland," is attractively anecdotic of national customs, &c. "The Notices from Kairland" are continued with considerable spirit; and "The Naval Chaplain's Note-book," and "Sketches from a Soldier's Life," are in the smart, sketchy line. The "Letters on the Afghanistan Campaign, in 1842," form a valuable circumstantial contribution towards one of the little wars of a great people. Perhaps the most important paper in the number is "A Memorial of the Mandarin Shu, in relation to the War with England, and the State of China," derived from the indefatigable Mr. Gutzlaff, who states that it contains a fair exposition of the views of a small but liberally-minded party in China; and that Old Shu is one of the few who can read the "far-off future."

HOOD'S MAGAZINE right heartily merits the affix of "Comic Miscellany." We are glad to see the continuation of the Editor's domestic novel, "Our Family." The humorous spirit is admirably kept up throughout the "Sketches and Stories," be their localities Paris, Calais, Victoria, or Rio. Here is a specimen of the Editor's novel:—"Ah, a child of nature," said Uncle Remond; "well, I like her all the better; and if she has a sister disengaged in the same capacity, I'll hire her on the spot. The true old breed of English servants is almost worn out, nearly extinct in England, like the bustard and the cock-of-the-wood—partly their fault, and partly our own—by always setting them either too high or too low—over our heads or under our heels—either pampered like pet monkeys, or snubbed like born slaves—never treated according to the light of nature. For instance, there's the tender passion. It's notorious that nine-tenths of the poor girls in Bedlam went crazy from suppressed sweethearts; and yet, forsooth, no followers are to be allowed; so that, unless Molly falls in love with my lord, and John nourishes a flame for my lady, as he often does, by the way, they might as well have no human hearts in their bosoms. Whereas, servants have passions and feelings as well as ourselves," &c.

AINWORTH'S MAGAZINE opens with the Editor's promised "Revelations of London," a silly title, to say the best of it. The chapters are, "The Elbow of Life," and "The Ruined House in the Vauxhall-road." In the first is introduced Dr. Lambe, the celebrated alchemist and necromancer on old London-bridge. There is an abundance of spirited description in both chapters, and provided the editor does not get too deep in the necromantic business (in managing which he is not very successful), and deals judiciously with the horrible, all may go on well for the reader's amusement. The prologue, by the way, is of the date 1389, and the tale itself 1530. The machinery of the transition we have not room to explain. The illustrations, by Peiz, are much in advance of his usual productions; the alchemist's chamber sparkles with artistic brilliancy. Of the remaining papers, a chapter of Theatrical Reminiscences, by Drinkwater Meadows, is the most striking. It really smells of the lamps and orange-peel, and savours of the piquancy of the green-room.

FRANK has a lively number throughout. The opening paper, "An Election to the Long Parliament," though documentary, and thickly annotated, is a most entertaining picture of old English manners. "The State Murder," is a stirring tale, adapted and bridged from George Sand's charming novel, "Le Secretaire Intime," which is not defaced by any of those faults usually so offensive to English tastes. "Some Account of a Poet's Friend" is a charming letter from Oxford, relating the friendship of the poet Gray with a clergyman, Mr. Nichols, of Blundeston. "Bull and Nongtonpaw" maintains, in a lively vein, that "all that is not English must be French." "The Classics of the Table" discusses sweet cider, perry, liquors, wines, and anti-fashionable beer. A paper by Morgan Rattler, "On Matters Musical, and of the Italian Opera," is a very piquant affair, advocating the advance of the English musical taste; the summary of the late opera season is laudatory, yet discriminating. Timmarsh has contributed some very pleasant glimpses of Ghent and Bruges. In a paper, "Courses of English Reading," is shown a deep acquaintance with our literature, though with a leaning to "old books," affirming that "the old book is easier than the new." The "Apology for Art Unions" is a good piece of plain-speaking.

THE POLYTECHNIC REVIEW AND MAGAZINE has for its main subjects the Warner Invention, and a speculative paper on the production of Earthquakes by the Electric Fluid. The summing up of Captain Warner's merits is very oracular—"We are convinced that he has a heated imagination, and that he is led to believe that he possesses powers which have not been granted to man."

THE NEW EDINBURGH REVIEW (No. 1) is a sort of hybrid between the review and magazine, of no startling merit, if we except a paper entitled "The Edinburgh Reviewers," whence we quote the following, explanatory of the #### ORIGIN OF THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

The mode of the Reviewers raising their first perch, seems to have been nearly as follows. Mr. Francis Jeffrey, the son of a respectable attorney, late a student at Oxford, and then an advocate at the Scottish bar, was living high and dry in Beechcroft-place. Here he was invaded by the Rev. Sydney Smith, a curate on Salisbury Place, and led captive to a young squire of his parish, with whom he had made a descent upon Edinburgh through failure of reaching a German university. At Jeffrey's lodgings he met Brougham and Murray (late Lord Advocate). Society was in a dreadful commotion, through the effluence of the French Revolution, and on political subjects all of them held opinions too liberal for the dynasty of Dandies, then sole monarch of Scotland. Mr. Smith proposed they should start a Review, with the motto—

"We cultivate literature upon a little oatmeal."

"But this," says she, "was too near the truth to be admitted, and we took our present grave one from Pablia's hymn, of whom none of us had, I am sure, read a line, and so began what has since turned out a very important and able Journal."

About this period a cluster of young men of first-rate talent at Edinburgh, met at the Speculative Society, to discuss metaphysical questions. Who some of them were will be seen from the following entry in Welsh's "Life of Brown":—"January 7, 1797. Present, Erskine, president; Brougham, Birkbeck, Heddle, Layden; afterwards Jeffrey, Horner, and Smith joined." In this year Lord Brougham distinguished himself by an able mathematical paper inserted in the "Philosophical Transactions."

All that the age is now chiefly proud of, that which has become the common faith—religious freedom and equality—commercial freedom—the abolition of the Slave Trade—the responsibility of rulers—parliamentary, church, legal, fiscal, and university reform—international peace—popular instruction, and the general elevation of the people in diet, taste, and intelligence—were precluded, and powerfully advocated through adverse and favourable times, in sunshine and cloud, by the Edinburgh reviewers. They have not been inseparable; they have sometimes neglected merit, or treated it unjustly; occasionally they have given to party what was meant for mankind, but we lack to general bearing and its results. Amongst their misdeeds we would not severely visit them for their demerits towards the Lake Poets; that they were too severe they have conceded, but that they were unjust is not so manifest. What men of metal, of many senses and feeling, sitting in critical judgment with a duty to discharge, could pass over unscathed mere badinage for only for a variety: a sickly, insipid sentimentality or German mysticism. They might admit the poetical soul of Southey or Wordsworth, as one may the ability of Thomas Carlyle, but more affectionate should be as nature, or even genius, called for the not.

THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE is a number of varied attractions. The opening paper describes, though somewhat too minutely, the regiments, &c., of the Model Prison at Pentonville; still, the article is one of considerable importance and interest. It is succeeded by Miss Toolmin's "Villager Sketch," a piquant sketch of hiring a servant. "The Man of High Notions" is a pleasant exposé of that social excrement, by Laman Blanchard. "The Philosophy of Shops," by Angus B. Reach, is a concentration of the tricks of a nation of shopkeepers. Mr. Wade's sketch of Mad Austin is full of touching melancholy. Mark Lemon's sketch of the Steam-boat Call-boy is smartly observant. The large illustration is a superb engraving on wood, by Linton, of Ruben's "Judgment of Paris," lately added to the collection in the National Gallery. The other engravings are good, especially those accompanying the paper entitled "Addison and Holland House."

THE LOVE MATCH. By HENRY COCKTON. No. 1. This new tale, of the Shilling school, promises abundant amusement in the eccentricities which develop themselves in the "tender passion." The story opens with a general and his family located in a fine old hall—the amour of his daughter with a groom—the declaration—the engagement, &c.

THE THEATRES.

No important novelty has been produced during the past week at DRURY-LANE. Miss Delcy appeared on Tuesday as Zerlina in "Fra Diavolo," but created no very great sensation amongst the audience; and another resuscitated ballet of action, "The Deserter of Naples," came off at half-price. Mr. Bunn must bestir himself: we always get uncomfortable about his management when we see "Gustavus," "Der Freyschutz," and "Fra Diavolo," appearing in the bills; and he must be aware that the "national establishment" cannot rest upon the shoulders—or rather, the legs—of Mademoiselle Dumilatre alone.

THE ADOLPHI has also revived the worn-out "Foreign Affairs," (a translation of "Les Premières Armes de Richelieu") and an old farce or two. This is not as it should be, in a house so famous for its novelties. Madame Celeste is a most talented lady, and a clever actress; but still, "toujours perdrix" must die.

THE LYCEUM remains as per last; all hands being employed in bringing out the translation of "Les Sept Châteaux du Diable," for which the license arrived after we had gone to press last week.

THE STRAND is nightly filled with merry folks, laughing until their sides are sore, at Mr. Marble's irresistible American comicities. Meanwhile, Don Cesar de Bazan will soon be theatrically ubiquitous. We think, in all conscience, that the Dramatic Authors' Society ought to present an address to King Louis Philippe, now he is amongst us, especially after the peaceable spirit of his reply to the mayor of Portsmouth. Had a war with England been determined upon, and all communication stopped, what would have become of that intelligent and hard-working body of literary gentlemen?

The bill of the HAYMARKET has also remained unchanged during this week: "The Confederacy," "The Thimble Rig," and "The Milliner's Holiday," having drawn good houses. Mr. Webster, we hear, will bring forward four new pieces on Monday evening at his two establishments. Two of these are translations of "Don Cesar de Bazan": himself playing the hero at the Adelphi, and Mr. Charles Mathews at the Haymarket. At the former theatre, a burlesque will also be produced, if sufficiently forward, called "Telemachus," in which Mr. Wright will play the fair heroine. A burlesque on the same subject was, if we mistake not, performed at the Olympic during the Vestris management.

The legitimate drama is still thriving, as it deserves to do, at SADDLER'S WELLS: "The Bridal" having been excellently performed, and to famous houses, the greater part of the week, with some musical afterpiece.

POOR COVENT-GARDEN remains mournfully desolate, and the speculations as to its ultimate fate are as vague as ever. There was a talk, a month or two back, of some Promenade Concerts on a grand scale about to be established therein, but nothing more appears to have transpired. The only performances now pertaining to it take place outside; and these are a number of "ballets of action" by the boys of the neighbourhood, who climb about its palisades in vast numbers, or skirmish upon the barricades of upturned pavement and excavated mould in Bow-street.

PRINCESS.

This elegant house opened for the season on last Saturday night, with Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor." Although out-generalled by Mr. Bunn with regard to Madame Thillon, Mr. Maddox may congratulate himself on having been so lucky as to secure the services of Mlle. Nau, who, if she possess not all the fascination of our fair countrywoman, is, nevertheless, a very charming vocalist. Her voice is somewhat thin, particularly in the upper register; but her style is very finished, though somewhat cold. It was quite evident that she felt the awkwardness of her position: to succeed a most popular singer, and adequately atone for her loss, was an arduous undertaking; but Mlle. Nau has triumphed over all her difficulties, and was completely successful. The finale to the first act was sung with great spirit and power, and at the fall of the curtain the applause was immense. It was quite evident, though, that her triumph was not anticipated to be so great, as only one prepared compliment—one solitary bouquet—was thrown at her feet. Allen is improved much in his singing, and is really now becoming an actor.

The rest of the cast is not worth mentioning. A ballet divertissement, entitled "The Slave Market," introduced some new dancers of extraordinary ability, if not grace. The Roussets' tour de force are wonderful: Madlle. Caroline Roussel's pirouette can be compared to nothing but the spinning of a top. The whole concluded with a most laughable farce, called "Taking the Pledge," a title which, no doubt, was intended to mislead people's anticipations: it is, we understand, from the pen of Mr. Osberry, and was received with roars of laughter. The house was well attended; and, altogether, the lessee seems to have commenced the season most auspiciously.

On Tuesday evening, the first of the translations of the French piece, "Don Cesar de Bazan," which has created such a furor in Paris, was produced here, and with most undeniable success. We say the "first," because we are informed that an adaptation of the same piece is now at nearly every theatre in London, in a state of active preparation, the Adelphi and the Haymarket following next. We question, however, whether an perfect representative of the hero will be found anywhere as Mr. James Wallack, who re-appeared on the London boards on Tuesday in this drama. The part is of that species familiar to the French dramatists as a "Lemaitre part," or one peculiarly adapted to that great actor—the creator of "Robert Macaire"; and we have no one now upon the stage who can fill that line so well as Mr. Wallack. "Don Cesar" then is of this class; or rather a copy from Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas." The plot is somewhat too intricate and lengthy to be detailed in our columns, but we will give a sketch of it. Don Cesar de Bazan is a reckless gentlemanly adventurer, of great descent and small means, at present at Madrid. In rescuing a page from the threatened vengeance of an armorer, his master, the Don, involves himself in a duel with the Captain of the Guard, and shoots his adversary. For this he is condemned to death, such being the punishment for duelling in the Holy Week. Meanwhile, the King of Spain, Charles II., has been captivated by a street ballad-singer, Martina; and in order that she may be introduced at court, to further his designs, gets his favourite minister, Don Juan, to prevail on Don Cesar to marry her, that she may become a countess, for which office his sentence will be changed from hanging to being shot. Don Cesar consents. The marriage takes place, and the bride is immediately removed, whilst the hero is led forth to execution. A discharge of musketry is heard without, announcing the execution, and the first act ends. In the second act, during a brilliant court fête, a pilgrim claims admittance to the presence of Don Juan; he throws off his robe, and appears as Don Cesar! The grateful armorer's page had withdrawn the bullets from the muskets, and his death was merely a feint. This somewhat disconcerts Don Juan's plans; for he himself is in love with the Queen; and although he had Don Cesar's pardon in his pocket at the time of the execution, never gave it, wishing to get him out of the way, that the King's love for Martina might meet with no obstacle, and a cause might then be given for rousing the Queen's jealousy. Don Cesar has never seen his bride; and on requesting an interview, an aged female is substituted for her, which so annoys our hero, that he is on the point of signing his declaration to abandon her and leave Madrid for ever, when the real Countess de Bazan is announced. This disarranges all Don Juan's plans; and a fine dramatic situation terminates the second act. In the third, the King has gained admittance to the apartments of the Countess; and whilst pouring forth his protestations, Don Cesar enters the room by the window "because," as he coolly observes, "the door was shut." His Majesty, not choosing to be recognised, declares that he himself is Don Cesar de Bazan; upon which the Don replies, "If so, I am King Charles." An interesting episode then ensues; and at last, Don Cesar informs the King of Don Juan's treachery with respect to the Queen; furthermore adding, after a little malicious delight at his Majesty's jealous agony, that he has slain him. Everything is thus cleared up. Martina and Don Cesar become, in reality, espoused; and the King rewards him with the Governorship of Granada, in preference to Seville, from the proximity of the latter place to the Court, which would interfere with his peace of mind respecting the royal attentions to his wife.

It is impossible to speak in too high terms of the acting of Mr. Wallack as Don Cesar. His reckless nonchalance in the midst of the most imminent danger, and proud bearing, kept up amidst his impoverished means, were imitatively portrayed, and drew down the loudest applause from a crowded house. Mrs. Stirling's Martina was a graceful and natural piece of acting; and Miss Marshall, as the Page, who was far more concerned in the action of the piece than we have related, proved herself an actress of no small pretensions—delivering her speeches with much sense and appropriate emphasis.

The piece has been admirably put upon the stage in every particular, both as regards scenery, dresses, and general "getting up." Although there is still some room for improvement in the last act. It was perfectly successful, and Mr. Wallack announced it for repetition amidst continuous cheering. The adaptation is the joint production of Messrs. Lemon and A. Beckett.

During the recess, the house has been thoroughly cleansed and redecorated, and now appears in all its pristine beauty. The arches, also, over the gallery and boxes, have been thrown open, which materially improves the ventilation.

CITY OF LONDON.

The experiment of Mrs. Warner and Mr. Phelps, carried out with such undeniable success at Sadler's Wells, of endeavouring to infuse a healthier tone into the tastes of the audiences assembling at the minor theatres, and supplanting the wretched trash hitherto performed there, by sterling plays, has apparently led to the occupation of this house, by Mrs. Walter Lacy, who opened it on Monday evening, for the first time, under her direction. If such was the laudable object in view, it is to be regretted that some comedy was not chosen for the inauguration, better adapted to the powers of the company than "The School for Scandal," a play requiring the highest dramatic talent for its cast that it is possible to get together. In all candour, we regret that we cannot speak well of this performance; although it was certainly well received by the audience, who showed a judgment and discrimination in their applause which could scarcely have been looked for amongst those so long habituated to the worst species of dramatic representation. The fair lessee played Lady Teazle excellently well; and Mr. James Browne's Charles Surface was equally good; to the other performers we cannot assign more than moderate praise. After the comedy, Mlle. Louise, whom our readers may remember dancing, during the past season, at the Opera; and Mlle. Adèle (advertised as from the San Carlo, at Naples); appeared in a Spanish "Pas de Caractere"—a species of double cauchuca—and with such good effect, that they elicited an enthusiastic crescendo; and the entertainments concluded with Mr. Gilbert A. Beckett's version of the now popular "Aladdin," which lost none of its attraction by being transported to the "far East," as the applause bestowed by "Young Shore-ditch" on its dialogue and other drolleries testified. We were glad to see Miss Ellen Daly—an excellent burlesque actress, by the way—so well received, as the Princess Badrabadour; on the part of some of the other performers, a little more attention to metre—the absence of which is death to an extravaganza—would have been an advantage. Mr. Stilt played the Magician's Slave, but, being a speaking character, had not the same scope for pantomimic display as his brother Kasrac at the Lyceum; Mr. James Brown was the Aladdin; and Mr. Wild the Aladdin. We must not omit to mention a very dashing and effective Polka, introduced in the second act, by an admirably trained corps de ballet. It is decidedly the most picturesque in costume that has yet been produced. Previous to the National Anthem being sung by the company, an excellent address, written by Mr. Albert Smith, was delivered by Mrs. Walter Lacy, and loudly cheered by the audience.

NEW MUSIC.

THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE: comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the Study of that Instrument and Music in general. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE. Whitaker and Co.

This work sets out with the most praiseworthy of all intentions, namely: utility. To accomplish this desirable object, the most rigid perspicuity has been adopted by the author, and in the first twenty pages, we have no hesitation in saying that there is more knowledge of the art of music communicated than by all the ponderous tomes of Albrechtsberger, Choron, Marpurg, &c. As a manual to the pianoforte it is a short and simple guide—including most essential matters hitherto neglected: such as touch, feeling, brilliancy, &c. The diligent study of the scales is judiciously requested, for without a thorough digital fluency with them no one can hope to be a fine performer. This part of the work may seem a little too severe to some, particularly to young students, but they may rest assured it is the basis of all future success, and we therefore rejoice to see that Mr. Wade has devoted his attention more to a solid foundation than to a flighty superstructure. He has not given many extracts from other composers' works, knowing, perhaps, that a grammar is a tiresome book, and that "the shorter and sweeter, the better;" but the charming Polonaise of Mozart, which we do not recollect to have seen before, and which contains all styles of musical expression, is in itself a study for ever. In the second part harmony and its elements are reduced to the smallest possible terms, and rendered intelligible to the dullest capacity. Even the quickest intelligence prefers a short and lucid exposition of any thing or circumstance, to a dull, prolix, round-about communication; we therefore recommend all to turn from the mysteries of Loger and other German writers on music, to the open simplicities of the present little volume, and to forget the ungraceful puerilities of Jousse, &c., in their works on the pianoforte, by justly and patiently considering the advice of the present livraison.

BEST ISLAND OF BEAUTY, BRITANNIA THE FREE. National Song. Written by J. W. LAKE, Esq.; Composed by E. J. WESTROFF. E. Ransford.

Three verses of unequivocal, but, at the same time, common-place effect. The melody and treatment of the first bar reminds us strongly of one of Benedict's songs.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

In the way of public sporting à fresco, there is nothing for it during the month of October save a little current-jelly-work with "the long dogs," and the wind-up of the racing season in the south. Coursing has commenced on a small scale, and racing is still current after a brilliant fashion. During the present week turf operations in the metropolis have been, however, merely theoretical—that is to say, we have been laying wagers, which the coming week is to determine. May the Fates be propitious! On Monday the Newmarket Second October Meeting commenced, under auspices of unusual promise. The first day has a list of twelve races, and the second will bring to an issue two of the most important events of the autumn—the Cesarewitch Handicap and the Clearwell—the best of the two-year-old stakes. The former of these will probably turn out one of the most profitable speculations of the season to the book-makers? Nearly, if not absolutely, thirty horses have been publicly backed for it, at prices that can scarce fall amply to repay the bettors round. At the head of the odds since first the race came into the market has been the Duke of Portland's filly by Beiram, out of Souvenir. She is a four-year-old, and will carry 56 lbs., no doubt a flattering weight. But year had once rarely win under any circumstances; and we should be very sorry to stand on her against such a field as will come to the post on Tuesday. Later, they have made Jamal, another bad four-year-old, with 56 lbs., up the second favourite—a position formerly occupied by the Reverie, who has since gone to 50 to 1. Glossy, about whom a great deal of business was done at 12 to 1, is a four-year-old, a winner, and in at 50 to 1. We were to be asked our opinion, we should say that here is a nomination that ought to find friends. Sir C. Monk has found out the way of winning a great handicap, and link in with the backing. Lightning, a three-year-old, carrying 56 lbs., with some running to boast of, has been freely done at the same odds. Of the other market horses, we should say that Feigh-a-Hallagh and Albion are all in a formidable way; and Vibration, if Ma Mie was in her form last week at Newmarket, a still more dangerous customer. At weight for age, over the Dutch-linn course, she ran the best mare in the south to a head; and with 56 lbs. (13 lbs. less) she must be very forward at the finish, if that performance be a criterion of her quality. Give-him-a-Name we have no opinion of; neither had the handicapper, who put 66 lbs. on a six-year-old. Scalton is well in—is a fine horse, and ought to race fast with 74 lbs. on his back; but is not quite good enough for Newmarket. The Emperor, according to public rumour, cannot lose with 74 lbs. to carry, although it is a dollup more than he had on at Ascot. His performance there for the cup this year was a crack one, beating Crusoe, and the second for the Derby—Ionian. We'll back the Emperor against any other of the 20 to 1 division.

The Clearwell numbers among its nominations a host of Derby and Oaks nags, and, unless we are much out in our judgment, it will give us a good winter favourite for one, if not both, of the Kepon events. At present Albion is all the rage for the Derby, and he has no previous engagement. But the Clearwell may give us a clue for his pretension. The Newmarket folk cry up Colonel Peel's Colomb colt to the skies. At Goodwood he was obviously unfit; how they came to send him there is the wonder. Should he win, up he goes to 7 or 8 to 1 for the rest of the interval between autumn and spring. It is not convenient, however, to extend this preliminary speculation. Let all who love racing upon any account pass a part, if not the whole of the coming week, on the borders of Cambridgeshire. If they be fond of sport, they shall have a feast of it; if their taste incline to business, they will lack neither wares nor customers.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The near approach of the day of running has brought few new favourites into play for the Cesarewitch, and occasioned some change in the past rank. Thus, without in the slightest degree affecting the position of the Souvenir filly, Jamal has advanced to 5 to 1; and the places so recently occupied by Glossy and The Brewer (placed on the retired list) were filled up by Lightning and Feigh-a-Hallagh, who were in great force. The Emperor also came into play, but was not in much favour at the close. The other horses comprised in our list were not in much estimation.

THURSDAY.—The Cesarewitch betting this afternoon was distinguished by two or three movements of some consequence. In the first place, Jamal, who it is said, has not been out so often as a full preparation requires, went back to 12 to 1; in the next, Glossy, who on Monday was an outsider, came again, and after a close fight with Feigh-a-Hallagh, obtained the second place. The Souvenir filly, meanwhile, improving slightly on the last question; and Lightning rising a couple of points, with a strong party. Besides this lot, a good deal of money was laid out on Vibration, Una, and Give-him-a-Name; and a few "evens" on the Emperor, Scalton, and some other third-rate favourites. Nothing of consequence was done on the Derby.

FAREWELL DINNER TO LORD ELLENBOROUGH, AT CALCUTTA.

In the review of the news received by the Overland India Mail in our journal of last week, we briefly chronicled this event. We are now enabled to present to our readers three authentic illustrations of the festive spectacle, from large lithographs drawn for the Calcutta Engraver.

This "more than usually interesting entertainment" (to quote the Calcutta Engraver) given by the military of the Presidency to Lord Ellenborough, took place on Monday, the 29th of July, in the Town Hall of the "city of palaces." The exterior of this handsome edifice was decorated for the occasion, as shown in our first engraving. Above the crowning balustrade of the two wings was inscribed, "ELLENBOROUGH," "FAREWELL!" and that of the centre was surmounted by a device inscribed with "Maharajpore, 29th Dec. 1843, Punjar." In front of the entire building was constructed with evergreen a sort of castellated design, from the battlements and towers of which waved several gay flags; and the structure was elsewhere decorated with shields, spears, &c. The entrance to the parties was through a low pointed arch. The troops were drawn up at the parties to receive Lord Ellenborough, who arrived shortly before eight o'clock; and upon his Lordship reaching the entrance, the whole body of officers descended to meet and welcome him—the soldiers cheered him, and the women were re-echoed by the crowds of native spectators who had assembled round the building.

Between two and three hundred of the officers stationed in and near Calcutta sat down with his Lordship to dinner in the hall. This vast apartment, as our illustration shows, was most superbly decorated. The effect of the rich draperies, the canopy over the cross table, surmounted with the British colours, and the shields inscribed with the names of our Indian victories, were truly magnificent.

The following is a copy of the Bill of fare:—

FAREWELL DINNER TO LORD ELLENBOROUGH, AT CALCUTTA.

THE TOWN HALL, CALCUTTA.

Aria—From "Les Diamans de la Couronne," by Madame Cailly.

2. "Sir Henry Hardinge," by Colonel Buxton.

Air—"He was famed for deeds of arms."

4. "The Duke of Wellington," by Captain Champneys.

Air—"The British Grenadiers."

5. "Sir Hugh Gough," by Brigadier Frith.

In the interval between the latter toasts Madame Cailly sang some beautiful selections from the operas of "L'Eau Merveilleuse" and "La Juive."

The speeches were marked with characteristic brevity and pertinence to the subject. The following is a brief account of them, in the order in which they were given, beginning with that of General Cooper, who proposed the health of Lord Ellenborough.

"Gentlemen, I rise to give the health of Lord Ellenborough, and in our name to return to his lordship our warmest thanks for the honor of his company this evening. We are met together, gentlemen, a body of officers it is true, but therefore only the more bounden to abstain from any expression of opinion, as to the merits or demerits of events of a political character. His lordship is now amongst us as a private gentleman, and this circumstance only renders the opportunity the more gratifying to our feelings, of evincing our sense of the many friendly attentions and the kindness he has constantly shown us. Gentlemen, let us drink Lord Ellenborough's health. (Drunk with enthusiastic cheering.)

After a slight pause, his lordship rose to return thanks, and was received with deafening applause. His lordship having thanked the company, and specially referred to the brilliant achievements of the British army in India, added that "It was an object of satisfaction to him that in his successor, the present Governor-general of India, the army would find one who would ever uphold their interests. He was a good soldier himself, and would appreciate a good soldier. He would add that his gallant friend Sir Henry Hardinge had the entire support of one of the greatest men of the age, the Duke of Wellington. Possessing qualifications, too, of no ordinary calibre, there was room to hope and expect that measures would be carried out calculated to benefit the country at large. Sir Henry Hardinge is well fitted for the post to which he has succeeded; and superadds to the general qualifications necessary for a Governor-General, an extensive knowledge of military finance, which he (Lord E.) could never have hoped to have acquired. These statements inspire the liveliest hopes that his endeavours will be directed to the soldier's comfort and welfare, dictated by feelings of appreciation of the soldier's worth."

Captain Champneys, in proposing the health of the Duke of Wellington, observed:—

THE GRAND STAIRCASE.

"I have a toast to propose—a bumper toast! It is one which needs no lengthened preface; for the illustrious statesman whose health I shall now give is known and revered by every British soldier (cheers). He is the acknowledged friend of our noble guest, and of the Indian army (cheers). His time-honoured name is already emblazoned in the pages of history. Gentlemen, Great Britain knows and acknowledges the worth of him whose health I am about to propose; but highly as he undoubtedly is estimated, it will only be hereafter, when the difficulty is felt of replacing him, that his full merit of universal admiration as a soldier and a statesman will be accorded. Gentlemen, may that day be long distant, and let us drink, with due honours, the health of—His Grace the Duke of Wellington, the personal friend of our distinguished guest" (great cheering).

The party broke up at about half-past eleven o'clock, when Lord Ellenborough took his departure, accompanied by the officers to the door of his carriage, and cheered as upon his arrival.

The third illustration shows the grand staircase of the Hall, decorated with flags, &c.

WRECK OF THE WINDSOR CASTLE STEAMER.

WRECK OF THE WINDSOR CASTLE STEAMER.

In our late edition of last week's journal, we briefly recorded this appalling accident. We now proceed to detail the circumstances, illustrated with a sketch of the vessel by our artist, Mr. Landells, who was a passenger for the purpose of sketching the closing incidents of the Royal Visit to Scotland.

It appears that the Windsor Castle sailed from Granton to Dundee on Tuesday morning, with a great number of passengers, to witness the embarkation of the Queen. The passage to Dundee was performed both safely and with expedition, and about four o'clock in the afternoon the Windsor Castle left the west protection wall of Dundee with passengers to the number of nearly 250, on her return home. The vessel steered directly out to the royal squadron, which had not yet got under weigh, and sailed five or six times round the Albert and Victoria, in order to gratify the passengers with a view of her Majesty and her royal consort, both of whom appeared on the deck, and graciously acknowledged the enthusiastic and oft-repeated cheers of those on board the Windsor Castle.

The royal yacht left the roadstead at half-past four o'clock, followed by the other steam-vessels, and by the Windsor Castle. When off the town of St. Andrew's, the Victoria and Albert, followed by the Black Eagle, the Princess Alice, the Stromboli, and the Kclair, were seen far ahead, rapidly fading from the sight. It was now half-past seven o'clock; the vessel had reached the East Neuk of Fife, and all things were going on safely, when a cry was heard from those in the fore-castle to stop and back the engine, which was scarcely done when the vessel, still under the impulse of its former velocity, came with a tremendous crash against the beacons on the North Carr Rock. Instantaneously the air was rent with shrieks from the women and children, the men rushing backwards and forwards in great confusion. Some passengers clung to each other, appalled with the prospect of immediate destruction; others, with great presence of mind, began to lay hold of carpet-stools, pieces of wood, and other lumber lying on the decks, by which they might support themselves in the event of the vessel sinking, while several gentlemen divested themselves of nearly all their clothes, so that they might with more chance of success be able to sustain themselves on the ocean. At the moment the vessel struck, a large party were below at dinner. When the sea-water had attained a considerable depth in the engine-room and the main cabin, the vessel lurched to one side; upon observing which, the passengers rushed to the high side of the vessel, which was thus swung over to the same side, causing the passengers to betake themselves again to the opposite side; and thus the vessel was kept rolling from side to side, the sea water being by the motion lashed up on either side of the vessel's hold. In this awful and helpless condition, the helm was put hard a-port; and after a lapse of nearly twenty minutes, passed in gloomy suspense, the Windsor Castle grounded, most providentially, as was afterwards found, between two large rocks, a little to the east of Kilmanning, and about two miles from Crail. The only boat belonging to the steamer was then lowered, by which the female passengers were conveyed ashore in six voyages. Boats and other aid were then obtained from Crail, and the remainder of the passengers were providentially landed in safety. Up to this time the weather had continued favourable; but it now began to blow a violent gale, which continued all night, causing a heavy sea to beat against the vessel; consequently, the steamer, on the return of the tide, shifted from its first position, and was driven violently on a ledge of rocks close by, against which it continued to grate till it was broken in the back, and became a total wreck. It is stated that had the vessel struck the North Carr Rock stem on, she would immediately have split in two. As it was, she made a sliding stroke over the rock, some of the iron stanchions of the beam, by the concussion, opened up the joining of two plates immediately under the bulkhead, through which the water rushed into the vessel.

The Windsor Castle is stated to have been built on the Clyde, and to have been one of the strongest iron vessels of her size afloat.

Mr. Landells, at the moment the vessel struck, was in the after cabin, in conversation with the steward; and before they got on deck she went right over on her beam-ends. Mr. Landells adds:—"My first thought was to fill my life-preserving coat, which I did directly; and, on looking round, saw the beacon against which we had struck, which I at first took for the funnel of another steamer, which I supposed we had run foul of. The captain immediately ordered her head to be put to shore, and we made all speed towards it. By this time I had mounted to the top of the paddle box, where I remained till we came in sight of land, when all fear left me. I cannot give you any idea of the scene on deck; all were looking with eager eyes towards the shore, except a group of perhaps twenty or thirty persons, that seemed to have given way to complete despair, yelling, shouting, and ringing their hands. In the fore part of the ship, I saw twelve persons holding on by a plank. They had lifted one end off the deck, and placed it on the gunwale of the ship; thus they patiently waited the result. On the vessel being stopped, the screams were again as loud and terrific as when we first struck; the ship gave one or two rolls, and then settled very quietly upon the rock. Three large fishing-boats from Crail came very quickly towards us, having the wind and tide in their favour. When they left, there were yet about ten or twelve of us remaining on deck. The boatmen promised to return as soon as they could; they had got about two miles to go before they could land, and we had no hope of getting off till they returned. As the tide had fallen, so that neither the small boat nor the large one could land near the wreck, I now went forward with some friends on board to see what sort of a place we were in. The moon got out, and we were delighted to see the vessel was quite dry at the bows. I then got down from the bows by a rope and landed safely; several people came towards us with torches. I got my bag and coat thrown down to me, and while my friends were getting out, I made the sketch which you will have in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS this week. It was a romantic scene: the huge black-looking ship, the moon lighting the sea, the black rocks, and the people with torches, altogether made a fine effect. To get to the shore was yet a difficult task, as the rocks were so very rough; but we succeeded and got to our inn. I went down to the wreck next morning, and was surprised to find it covered with water. I waited till the tide went down a little, and got a boat, and went on board to see if I could save my box. The vessel had broken in two, and every thing was floating about in the greatest confusion; she had a pretty cabin, and it was quite painful to see the beautiful furniture and fittings floating about at the mercy of the sea. We saved a few passengers' luggage, but I could not find my own, and returned to shore, thinking it had washed away. On my landing, one of the Coastguard men told me there were two boxes at a cottage a little way off, and, to my joy, one of them was mine. I put it on my shoulder, and had to carry it about three miles along a coast, the like of which I never saw before, or wish to see again."

This catastrophe presents another instance of the inefficient manner in which steam-vessels are provided with the means of escape in case of accidents. "In this case, it is truly awful to think that, had the vessel gone down immediately, there was no apparent means by which, in any human probability, one of 250 individuals on board could have been saved. There was only one boat, and that so small as to be incapable of holding more than half a dozen persons, which in the frenzy of the moment would have been, undoubtedly, swamped by the eager multitudes rushing into it. Does not such a state of matters call upon the Government to devise some means of compelling every seagoing steam-vessel to carry at least two or three good boats? The paddle-box boats of Captain Smith have been found in several instances of invaluable service, and every ocean-vessel should be provided with them, or with other efficient means of preserving life in cases of danger. The Windsor Castle had also no apparatus for making signals, neither gun nor rocket was on board, and vain was the attempt of the despairing multitude, by uniting their voices, to bring help from the nearest land, which, at least, was four miles distant from them!"

THE TROPHIES OF THE MOROCCO WAR.

The curiosity of the Parisian public has been for some days past aroused by the exhibition of the trophies taken by the French army from the Moors, consisting of the Tent of the eldest son of the Emperor, and the Parasol of the Emperor himself, which, being an emblem of command, may rank in importance with the baton of an European field-marshal. Both tent and parasol arrived at Paris on the 27th of September, but some time elapsed before the tent could be raised and submitted to public inspection. It was erected over the great basin of the Tuileries, by the side of the Place de Concorde, the work being executed under the direction of M. Fontaine, architect to the King, by the workmen of the palace, and the machinists of the Opera. The tent is a complete movable house, containing everything a Moor can desire—carpets, bed, sofa. It required no less than forty mules to convey it from place to place. Above the first tent rises a second, and much larger one, which serves to shade the first from the rays of the sun. Both are surmounted by a large ball of gilt copper, which can be seen from a considerable distance. At the entrance of the tent, and on one side of it, are a number of arches, or rather niches, which served as shelter for the guards of the gate. The tent was surrounded at some distance by a kind of wall, also of white linen, which prevented anyone seeing or hearing from the outside what passed in the royal presence. The interior of the tent was hung with tapestry of various designs, and was provided with large round cushions of red Morocco leather and loose ones of cloth of the same colour. Immediately opposite to the curtain which formed the door, was the bed of the Prince, hung likewise with red drapery. It was protected by a mosquito curtain, and had two mattresses—a blue and a red one. The couch itself was of Spanish make, and of the most simple design. Nothing had been forgotten in this palace of linen. Between the tent and the outer wall were two small mosques, one for the officers or secretaries of the Prince, and the other, coloured green and red, served as one of those indispensable apartments called by the Moors harem. The kitchens were about twenty paces distant from the main tent, and were likewise surrounded by a wall of drapery. When the tent was brought to Algiers, some natives employed by the French as labourers were applied to to erect it. But they said, though they could pitch well enough the sort of tents used by poor men like themselves, they knew nothing of the management of that of the great princes; and when, after several attempts, the French succeeded in erecting it themselves, the Moors would not go near it, or look on what was a trophy of the most bloody defeat their countrymen had ever sustained.

The Parasol (el d'Aïala), which was planted in front of the tent, was seized by the French soldiers from the midst of the black troops, grouped at the entrance to defend it. It is round in shape, and is supported by a large handle of pine wood, as thick as the staff of a regimental flag. It appears to be of Spanish make, and, from its worn and tattered appearance, must have seen at least seventy summers. But, in spite of its age, it still shows the brilliant remains of its better days. The top of it is surrounded coloured silk, with embroideries in silver gilt, which are admirable both for their elegance and correctness of design; they are arabesque of flowers, remarkable for their lightness and boldness; the inside is green silk, with flowers of gold; the ribs, ten in number, are of gilded wood; the parasol is surmounted by a ball of gilt silver, something like the top of a drum major's staff. To carry it on horseback would require a strong man, and the post of bearer of the imperial parasol is not one of the least important in the house of the Sultan of Morocco. In the battle of Taly the post was a fatal one, for the parasol-bearer fell in the attack, his face literally cut in two by a sabre stroke, and his breast pierced by a ball.

WEALTH AND WASTE.

HE interest excited by the late Royal Visit having ceased with the departure of the French King, amid thunder, fire, and storm, that rendered the last scene in which he appeared on British ground not unlike the tableau terminating a regal melodrama, the public attention is again directed to the objects that must naturally occupy it at all times—the social condition, state, and prospects of the country. These are questions never totally forgotten; but they are often sadly neglected; the noisy struggles of party, the brilliant attack, the able defence, of rival orators and statesmen—political events that succeed each other with startling rapidity—all these divert the public mind from those social topics which have a permanent interest for all, and which remain unaffected, almost undisturbed, by the rise and fall of parties, and the shifting and change of rulers. But at a period like the present, with the political stage vacated by the great performers who play their part thereon, with little or nothing to distract the mind from "that which about us lies in daily life," these questions recur with double force; we wish that good results were obtainable with equal certainty, and in an equal ratio.

Let us take advantage of the present interval of political repose to survey our present position and future prospects.

In doing so we are first and most forcibly struck by the many unequivocal indications of an improvement in what is called the "state of the country." Manufactures, trade, commerce, business in general, have all received an impulse; the centres of industry are busy—the loom and the steam-engine are in full work—and, what is better still, the thousands who depend for existence on the employment of these inanimate, but not inactive agents, are gaining the wages which enable them to live in an honourable independence of public aid. This general activity has a visible effect in another quarter, and shows itself in a symptom always considered decisive of returning prosperity. The quarterly revenue accounts exhibit a gratifying increase, particularly in the department of the Customs, in which it amounts to no less than a million and a half. As this arises altogether from duties on imports, it shows that the ability of the people to consume the articles on which duties are paid, is reviving from the prostration of the few past years. In other departments, though the increase is not so great, it is still enough to show a marked improvement. With the Income-tax as a sheet-anchor, in case of a financial stress of weather, and the improvement of the public revenue from the old sources, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought, officially speaking, to be a happy and contented man. The nation is, in fact, commercially considered, in a highly prosperous condition; we are manufacturing largely, and exporting extensively; and, as a natural consequence, gold is finding its way here from all those countries which are our purchasers. Now comes the question—what are we going to do with it?

As invariably happens at a time when, to use the language of the City, "money is abundant," we shall live on a little of it, extend our trade with more, and lose all the rest in speculation. If any one wishes to have a proof of this, let him read the announcements in the public journals. They are almost filled with advertisements of contemplated extensions of old companies, an projected formations of new ones. The whole surface of the land is to be laced with iron. Two new lines, with two companies, two chairmen, two boards of directors, and all other grades of employees in duplicate, are in some cases announced, to connect points between which a railroad already exists. That all these should pay is impossible: that Parliament should sanction two such undertakings between the same places is improbable. But a large amount of money will be spent in surveys, law expenses, parliamentary agencies, and all those preliminary steps which make the expense of obtaining an Act of Parliament in such cases, run up to something frightful. And all this will have to come out of the deposits on the shares, the buyers of which are the public. We are always glad to see railway communication extended where it is required; but a little consideration ought to be given as to what lines will pay, and what will not. With a sum of money waiting "investment," it is astonishing what imprudent things an Englishman, careful and cautious in the smaller concerns of life, will be guilty of; mystified and deluded by the magic words "safe investment," and "good per centage," he has buried millions in the bottom of South American mines, or seen his thousands evaporate in Poyais and Pennsylvanian bonds. This was in a time of re-action and prosperity like the present: let him look back on the past then, and, as he loves himself, learn circumspection.

This eagerness of speculation springs from the competition of capital with capital, which is no less remarkable in its results than the competition of labour with labour. It presses in every direction, and flies to every outlet that gives, or only promises to give, a profitable employment for it. In every existing business this reduces profits to the lowest point, just as the competition of labour reduces wages. It is no wonder then that it seeks fields yet unoccupied and untried, and is frequently disappointed in the expectations that led it there. To those gigantic capitalists who can engage with ease in many speculations, and bear without inconvenience even absolute loss in a few of them, it is a matter of comparative indifference if a crash does come that swallows up a few thousands more or less. But in the train of these men follow many of far humbler means, who embark their all in some one specious and attractive speculation; if that fail they have nothing before them but direct ruin. The amount of social and domestic misery that has been thus caused in England cannot be estimated. It is to this class we would particularly address ourselves, and, in the midst of the present activity, with schemes so rife on every side of them, recall to them the scenes that followed the year 1825.

In the midst, too, of all this bustle of wealth-making and wealth-expending, there are still many things in our social condition far from satisfactory. The property of whole districts is still exposed to, and still suffers from, the violence of a sudden and discontented pauperism, who seem in no degree to partake in the benefit diffused over other classes by our commercial prosperity. They are still unemployed, or, if employed, badly paid, so that their whole existence is divided between the three degrees of destitution represented by six shillings a week, involuntary idleness, or the poor-house. The meetings of landed proprietors, and the suggestions made of remedies for this gloomy state of things, show plainly enough the uneasiness that is felt in this direction. We believe, too, that a conviction of the necessity of furnishing wages and employment, as the only real cures for the evil, is being rapidly arrived at, and we may hope to see a little co-operation and some enlightened benevolence in this respect doing much that has been too long left undone. Assuredly, while there is such an immense mass of absolute pauperism among us, and so large a class only one remove above it, we cannot congratulate ourselves with that fulness of satisfaction we should wish to feel, on our present flourishing circumstances. We rejoice in the good, but it is with the consciousness of being in the presence of an evil, and our gloom is repressed like that of the revellers of old who sat at the banquet with a skeleton at the table. We are making wealth; but, unless some prudence is exercised, in this excitement of gaining, the produce of much toil may be uselessly dissipated. And, with so many around us who are, and, under almost any amount of national prosperity, must still be, exposed to destitution, to the virtue of prudence in using what has been gained, may not be added, with advantage, consideration for those to whom the opportunity of gaining is impossible?

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT AT PORTSMOUTH.

A fatal accident took place at Portsmouth on Monday afternoon, on the King's Battery. As the Artillerymen were drilling one of the guns, which is supposed to have hung fire, the charge went off, and blew one of them to pieces and the other was so severely mutilated that he died soon afterwards. The guns upon this battery are 32 pounders, and there are only four of them; consequently to fire a royal salute requires each gun to be loaded five times and one six. It is usual to use the worm to clear out the gun, every second charge, and it is supposed some fire had remained in the chamber. The names of the unfortunate men are Alexander Miller and Michael Walker, between 25 and 27 years of age. Miller was blown into fragments, and Walker had his thigh broken, his arm lacerated into the joint, and his body otherwise disfigured. The remains of the victims were conveyed instantly to the hospital at the Royal Marine Barracks. Only five guns had been fired when the awful catastrophe occurred. The instant accident caused. An inquest was held on the bodies of the unfortunate men on Tuesday, when the above circumstances were given in evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accident at death."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

I have been staying at Eu, and have no expressions to convey to you the anxiety of the Queen and Madame Adelaide, on the subject of Louis Philippe, who, on his return, had to wait with the three elements, wind, water, and fire. It is with the deepest satisfaction that all honest men and lovers of peace in France, behold Louis Philippe safely returned amongst us. Secure of all possible kindness on the part of the English nation, the King's true leges had feared, and his democratic enemies had hoped, that this trip would afford an opportunity of perpetrating some attempt on his life. The journey to England of many a desperate character, confirmed the idea. The extraordinary exertions of the police on both sides of the channel had defeated their detestable plans; the projected attack against the Emperor of Russia during his recent visit, having put the English authorities on their guard. But although the King is safe amongst us, and that the vigour of his mind and body are remarkable for his advanced age, time is the ultimate enemy he cannot conquer already its effects upon the royal statesman are evident. Under these circumstances, it is interesting to study the several attitudes the sons of Louis Philippe assume in the political arena of France. The eldest son (the Duke de Nemours), is destined variously to wield the sceptre in France for many a year, like his great ancestor the Regent Orleans did in the minority of 1715; who bore the same relationship to Louis XIV. as the Count of Paris does to Louis Philippe. The Duke de Nemours, the eldest son, has retained the title of Duke of Orleans—on the one hand to avoid at present any connection with his lamented and popular father, and, on the other, when he succeeds to the Regency, a parallel with that most illustrious prince, the Regent Orleans, who maintained his power by the most subtle corruption in every department of the state, a circumstance which made him worthy pupil and successor, Louis XV. so often, and still so truly exclaim, "après moi le déluge!" The Duke de Nemours is a prince of irrepressible energy, conspicuous and well informed in all the duties of a prince, with an exalted judgment, and severe and unyielding in that which he deems to be right. But young spirit has raised against him general aversion amongst the majority of the more volatile and unreflecting portion of French society. The Prince de Joinville, the next brother, is all "Jeune France" in his bearing, manner, and language, as completely as in the luxuriant surmounting of his beard and moustache. At heart, sincerely attached to his family, he carries on an appearance of fashionable liberalism—and also opposition to his father—an imitation of the liberal policy of the Prince of Wales, during the reign of our three last Georges. His intercourse with his shipmates, and his naval pamphlets (of which several are, by the by, now forthcoming) are the vehicles of his assumed antagonism to his father's views and government.

The Duke d'Angoulême, the third brother, who presides, in his immense private fortune, the means of purchasing golden opinions, has the effect of edifying the military what his brother does with the navy. By exerting Algeria into a separate kingdom, under the absolute rule of his vicereignty, the present dynasty will secure to themselves the means of concentrating on one spot devoted adherents, and secure themselves of a temporary retreat in case of any future convulsion in France. It is well known that the worst straits of the elder dynasty of Bourbons had considered Algeria in this point of view. These views they had not time to mature before the catastrophe occurred.

It is with deep-silent pleasure that we behold here an impotent revolution in literature. You are aware that here the press, in its fraudulent—the stage in every species of drama, both as well as comic—the ephemeral pamphlets of the day, the novels expiring in vapouring rage, are the only works that have interested the nation, and that they have been habitually victims of coarse and most dangerous to domestic as well as political society in France. A love of classical literature is fast reviving, and is now about to reflect its spirit upon and modify the productions of the day. Already, last year, Ponsard, a young poet, had shown the deep interest that can be excited, whilst heralding all that is not pure morality and classical in form. A veteran of philosophy, who has been a university professor, then a minister, and now a poet, and a dilettante in politics as well as in literature, is now contributing his share to raise the mind and feelings of the age, by the profound thoughts and reasoning introduced in his history of Jacqueline Pascal, the gifted and exemplary sister of the immortal author of "Les Pensées." Whilst his elegance is captivating, this interesting biography of an age as well as of an individual is made the means of converting the soundest and sublimest notions, "Democracy and equality, order and liberty, live together, and develop themselves simultaneously; why should not religion and philosophy do the same?" Such is the burden of his song. Sometime, with his double eloquence of poet and political leader, is returning from the baths of Ischia, having employed his leisure that the contents of his postmaster are a sort of trilogy. It contains a poem, a work on his travelling impressions, and another on the political affairs of France.

To the new spirit prevailing, and which we have characterized, is due the examination of a manuscript, which is a sort of literary Pompeii or Hieroglyphic, revealing the state of society in the 17th century. This manuscript, recently published, is a diary kept by the famous Flechier, a bishop, and one of the greatest pulpits of that age. He went to Ausonne with a young man, as tutor to the son of one of a numerous commission of judges, departed by Louis XIV. as an extraordinary tribunal to inquire into and to punish the excesses committed by the nobles and the clergy, who, after the intestine convulsions of the days of the Fronde, still retained the weapons of warfare in their hands, and made them instrumental to their spirit of exaction and tyranny. This work of Flechier, entitled "Les Grands Jours," brings to light the most extraordinary scenes, and reveals society in the 17th century, as vividly as if it were beheld within the magic circle of an enchanter.

As to the pleasures of society at this moment—in private society they have not begun to assume any relief. The pleasures of the turf keep away many persons of fortune from Paris. The races of Chantilly have employed the time of our fashionable; hunting, and field sports of all kinds, almost most of our time. Even the most fashionable of the lady in town are obliged to join the hunt, not to lose the society of their male friends, as Madame de Vintimille and Madame de St. Didier, did the other day in the forest of Chantilly, where they kept at the head of the sportsmen during the whole of the run? No great is the mania, that you find the newspapers chronicling the attack and death of a fawn, by five dogs and a dozen noblemen, at the Chateau of the antiques Counts de Gerfolthe.

As to the theatre, they are either deficient of novelty, or their novelties lack success. The Italian Opera has opened with a flourish of trumpets and shouts of triumph, amidst a concourse of fashionable, but dissatisfaction soon ensued when "Linda di Chamouni" and "Norma" were brought out with an imperfect taste; amongst other actors, Marie not appearing in his national part in one opera, and Lablache in neither of them. The Grand Académie de Musique has been still more unfortunate. "Kuchera," a new ballet, was the first failure, and another has just occurred in the shape of an opera. This will not appear astonishing, when we reflect that to write this grand opera seria were selected Adolphe Adam, who never composed anything but pretty comic operas, and M. Paul Feuchère, who is a writer of vaudevilles and melodramas for the small theatres of the Boulevard. The fact is, the theatre of the Académie de Musique is a gifted man, but he too often tries that in which monarchs themselves often fail, the "stet pro ratione, voluntas."

FRANCE.

The French papers this week have been destitute of news either foreign or domestic. Some of the least respectable of the opposition prints have indulged in a vast deal of absurdity upon the subject of Louis Philippe's visit to England, and they endeavor to make their readers believe that their Sovereign has promised the honour and dignity of France by his devoted declaration in favour of peace. It would be possible, however, to give credence to these frantic ravings. The Constitutionnel contains a long report from Captain Hunt, which was not transmitted to the Government in the usual way, but obtained publicity by appearing in a French journal established by him at Tahiti, under the title of "L'Écume Française." Captain Hunt's version of the affair at Mahakoa, of which we have given the particulars, differs very much, as may be imagined from that supplied by an English writer. He justifies his attack on the natives by necessity; having failed, as he says, even with the aid of the English missionaries, to induce the insurgents against the French authority to desist. The French force is rated by M. Hunt, at 445 men; the natives are said to have had 1000 fighting men, of whom 1000 were engaged in the defence of their entrenchments. They had 100 men killed, their guns spiked, and a large portion of their ammunition captured. The French loss is stated at 15 killed, including two officers, and 51 wounded; and it is admitted that the natives fought with great gallantry and determination.

The Journal des Débats, in conveying M. Hunt's report, comments with just severity on the imprudence of which that gentleman has been guilty in thus anticipating the publication of a document strictly official, without the sanction of his superior officers. This last performance of M. Hunt appears to have opened the eyes of the Government to his unfitness for the responsible position in which he has been placed, and is expected to lead to his immediate recall. He seems to have made a fresh attempt, assisted by the British missionaries on the spot, to effect a reconciliation with the Tahitian chiefs, and to have even invited Queen Pomare to pacify her subjects by her presence. Several chiefs went to see her, and their interview is thus reported in the Tahiti Journal:—She wept and sighed, saying, "I am afraid of the governor." "But it is he who has sent us, and do you believe that we can deride you, Pomare? Come, and be happy as a wife and a Queen!" Pomare hesitated, and at last declared that she was not free, for the English commandant detained her. It is pretended, however, that at the further solicitation of the chiefs, she would have accompanied them ashore, but was prevented from so doing by the commander of the Bahak.

The Constitutionnel affirms that letters have been received from Tahiti to the 8th of May. Tranquillity was re-established, although the Indians still continued to assemble. It was feared, however, that they would make an united attempt to set fire to our establishments; for this reason the greatest precautions are taken against a night attack.

SPAIN.

The ordinary accounts from Madrid to the 9th are uninteresting. The following telegram, despatched, however, received in Paris, announces the opening of the Cortes:—

"MADRID, Oct. 18.—The Queen opened yesterday in person the session of the Cortes. Her Majesty, whose health is excellent, was received during the whole of her passage and on her entrance to the Chamber with the loudest acclamations. Madrid and the provinces enjoy the most complete tranquillity."

We have since received a copy of the speech, which was an unusual long one. Her Majesty first congratulated the Cortes on the friendly dispositions of the Allied Powers. Allusion was made to the good offices of France and England in settling the dispute between Spain and Morocco. The speech also stated that a project of constitutional reform would be presented early in the session. Her Majesty remarked upon the necessity of economy and the maintenance of good faith. Her Majesty also expressed her satisfaction that the army was in the highest state of discipline. The penultimate state of the Treasury was alluded to, but Her Majesty stated that nevertheless she had turned her attention to the fleet, adding that the penultimate situation of Spain, and the rich countries it will hold in many parts of the world, demanded that it should be a powerful one.

PORTUGAL.

Our letters from Lisbon to the 7th inst. are destitute of political news; but it appears from the opening proceedings of the Chamber of Peers, that the Ministers had but a small majority in opposition to a motion to inquire into the mode in which they exercised the powers temporarily entrusted to them for suppressing the Almeida revolt in February last. The Duke de Palmella, upon this occasion voted in opposition to the Government, and expressed himself in favour of the inquiry.

SWEDEN.

CORONATION OF KING OSCAR AND HIS QUEEN.—The coronation of the King and Queen of Sweden was celebrated on the 28th ult., in the cathedral. The morning having been calm, the service could not proceed to the church in the order agreed on. Their Majesties, not wishing to delay the ceremony, went there in their carriages, and were greeted with loud expressions of joy. After the Divine Service, the coronation took place. When it was concluded, the Prince Royal and his brothers, the Dukes of Uppland and Ostrogoth, took the oath of fidelity to the King, who embraced them both. The act of homage of the State General also offered an imposing spectacle, and after they had taken the oath, the vault of the church rang with cries of "Long live King Oscar!" The weather having cleared up, their Majesties returned to the palace on foot, in the order prescribed by the ceremonial. An immense crowd was assembled along their passage, and the windows, doors, and stands erected for the occasion, were filled with spectators, who threw flowers in the line of the procession, and greeted the King with loud shouts of welcome and approbation. The Queen, however, could not, on account of her mourning, be present at the august ceremony; but on the return of their Majesties to the palace, they proceeded to her apartment to pay her their respects. The Duke de Balcanis and the Princess Eugénie were present at the coronation, in a tribune apart. The diplomatic corps and the foreigners of distinction, on leaving the church, proceeded to the inner court of the palace, to present their homage to their Majesties on their passage. The King the same day gave a grand dinner of 600 covers. In the evening the city was illuminated, and their Majesties, accompanied by the youthful branches of the royal family, went through the streets in an open carriage, amidst loud acclamations. The next day the King received, in separate audiences, the ministers of England and Denmark, who presented letters of congratulation from their respective sovereigns on his coronation. In the evening a fire burst out in the northern suburb, but was put down after one house had been consumed. The King proceeded to the scene on horseback.

UNITED STATES.

The Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived at Liverpool on Monday, bringing the American mails to the last met, and Canadian to the usual late date. The intelligence from Canada possesses more than ordinary interest.

Sir Charles Metcalfe, the Governor-General, has delayed the Canadian Assembly; and waits have been issued for a new election, returnable on the 18th of November, at which time the Parliament is to meet for the dispatch of business.

There is no news worth mentioning from the United States. The money market was dull. There was abundance of money, with low rates of interest, and little demand for discount from the banks.

A singular murder is reported to have taken place in Wilcox county, Alabama. A young man, named Rivers, was engaged to be married to a Miss Sarah Tall, with the consent of all the lady's friends, except her brother, a Dr. Tall. The latter, in front of his father's house, before the marriage, shot Rivers, who was taken into the bride's dwelling, and there the marriage ceremony was performed. The murdered man died immediately after.

Accounts from Mexico state that the town of Matamoros has been destroyed by a hurricane. It occurred on the night of the 4th of August, and was more tremendous in its effect than the hurricanes of 1835 and 1837. More than two-thirds of the houses of the city were prostrated, and the remainder were more or less injured. As to the extent of the loss of life we are not accurately informed. The correspondent of El Comercio de Vera Cruz estimates the whole loss at above two hundred souls. The direct destruction, however, was at the two mouths of the Rio Grande, some thirty miles below the city of Matamoros. Here scarcely any were saved. The greater part of the population are compelled to live in shanties built among the ruins of their houses.

A letter dated August 9, states that the remains of 66 people, who perished at the Boca del Rio, had already been found and interred, and that it was ascertained that as many as 27 were drowned at the other mouth of the river. It is presumed that many more have perished, whose names were unknown.

The ship Suez, Captain Edwards, had previously arrived, with the New York papers to the 26th of September; but as the Britannia brings later news, it is only necessary to allude briefly to the accounts brought by the former.

ROKHARA.

We are sorry to learn that the favourable accounts given relative to Dr. Wolff have been falsified by authentic letters from the reverend doctor himself, whose humane mission, it appears, has led him into a position of great propriety. Dr. Wolff writes from Bokhara, under date of June 27, as follows:—

"I have now been already two months in this place, and though five or six times the King has promised to send me instantly to England, with one of his ambassadors, I am in the greatest danger. I cannot stir out of the house without a guard of three men. Did Haxa Khan, the fellow sent with me by the Amir Abdulla, have shamefully rebelled, deceived, and outraged me. The Persian Ambassador, Abbas Kosh Khan, is kind to me, but I think he will not let it be in his power to rescue me. Najeb Abdul Samet Khan has escorted from me a writing to pay him 2000 tomans to effect my liberation. I suspect that he was the cause of Stoddart and Connolly's death in spite of his protestations of friendship. The Amir is at Samarcand, and I am awaiting the most fatal orders from the King daily to reach me. It is true that poor Stoddart professed openly Christianity after he had made a forced profession of Mahomedanism. Do for me what you can, as far as the honour of England is not compromised. All the inhabitants wish that either Russia or England should take the country. Do not believe any former reports of my speedy departure, for I am in great danger."

"JOSEPH WOLFF."

"Bokhara, Aug. 1, 1844."

"TO ALL THE MONARCHS OF EUROPE."

"Sires,—I set out for Bokhara to ransom the lives of two officers, Stoddart and Connolly; but both of them were murdered many months previous to my departure; and I do not know whether or not this blood of mine shall be sold. I do not supplicate for my own safety; but, Monarchs, 200,000 Persian slaves, many of them people of high talent, high in the kingdom of Bokhara. Endeavour to effect their liberation, and I shall rejoice in the grave, that my blood has been the cause of the ransom of so many human beings. I am too much agitated, and watched besides, to be able to write more."

"JOSEPH WOLFF."

The German papers, since received, contain a letter, dated Constantinople, September 25, relative to this enterprising traveller. It would not deserve notice after the above important communication, if it did not state that the Amir, who, according to Dr. Wolff's letter of June 27, was then at Samarcand, had returned, and manifested great kindness to the doctor. We therefore presume that the information, whatever may be its authority on which this letter was written, must have been of later date than that transmitted by Dr. Wolff from Bokhara.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE LATE COLLIERY EXPLOSION AT HASWELL.—In our latest impression last week we were enabled to give the result of the inquest on the unfortunate men who were killed by the explosion at Haswell Colliery, near Newcastle. The following was the verdict of the jury:—"That the said Thomas Dryden, George Dryden, Robert Dryden, and James Dryden, and Edward Nicholson, together with many others, being employed in working in the Haswell Colliery, were therein and then accidentally burnt, scorched, and killed, by an explosion of fire damp, and we further say that no blame is attributable to any one concerned with the pit, and we also further say that the said Thomas Dryden, George Dryden, Robert Dryden, and James Dryden, and Edward Nicholson, came to their death by accident, and so say we all." The verdict was recorded by the Coroner, after which the jury were discharged. A subscription has been set on foot for the benefit of the relatives of the sufferers, which already approaches to near £745. The owners of the Haswell Colliery have contributed the munificent sum of £745.

INCENDIARY NEAR NEWMARKET.—A fire broke out late on Saturday night on the farm occupied by Miss Fykes, at Kensing, about a mile and a half from Newmarket, which in a short time destroyed a barn full of wheat, all the out-buildings and stables, four horses, several pigs, and some poultry.

SEVERAL DEATHS IN A MAIL-COACH.—On Tuesday week Mr. Sammell, a traveller, and sole manufacturer in London, left Haswell Colliery by the mail; after having lighted his cigar, he took his seat by the side of the coachman, but when the coach had proceeded a few miles, feeling disposed to sleep, he took an inside place. While stopping to exchange horses at the first stage, the coachman, thinking Mr. Sammell to be asleep, did not disturb him. On arriving at the next stage, however, where the coach is changed, it was discovered that he was dead. There were two ladies inside the coach with him, but he died so suddenly and unexpectedly that they were not aware of his death until the stoppage of the coach. He was a young man, 25 years of age.

ATTEMPTED MURDER AT LIVERPOOL.—On Saturday afternoon a man named M'Guffey attempted to shoot Mr. John William Arkle, landing surveyor, at Prince's Dock, Liverpool. Fortunately the contents were not discharged, as the pistol missed fire, in consequence of the cap, which was a vast too large for the nipple, having fallen to the ground. An immense crowd of persons were upon the spot at the time of a very few minutes, and M'Guffey, who made no attempt to escape, was almost immediately arrested. It is supposed that M'Guffey was prompted to the act by revenge, as it appears he had been dismissed from a situation he held as weigher in the Customs, in consequence of intemperance, his dismissal having proceeded from the reports of Mr. Arkle, who was landing surveyor over him. The pistol was loaded with ball. The prisoner was examined at the Liverpool office on Monday, and the evidence supported the above view of the case. It was proved that the prisoner was a weigher under Mr. Arkle, until about four months ago, when he was discharged in consequence of being reported by that gentleman for drunkenness. He did not deny any of the evidence advanced against him, and having declined to say anything, was fully committed for trial at the next assizes.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON LANCASTER SANDS.—On Tuesday evening, as John Moore, junr., of Flockburgh, carrier, and two other men of the name of Woodburn and Bell, were crossing from Fleet Bank to Flockburgh, with two horses and carts, they were overtaken by the tide while attempting to ford the main channel, and Moore and Woodburn unfortunately drowned, as also the two horses. Bell, after clinging to one of the carts for some time, during which his cries for assistance were heard on shore, was rescued from his perilous situation by a man in a small boat, and when picked up was nearly exhausted. Moore has left a wife to lament his premature death. Woodburn was a single man.

ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE.—A man, named Richard Young, has been committed for trial by the Chief Criminal Magistrate, on a charge of stabbing his wife on Saturday last, while in bed. He attempted to cut his own throat. On being taken, he said that he knew nothing of what had happened, until his wife cried out, "I am stabbed." He added, "I then re-ordered all, and cut my throat, in hopes we might die together. I cut my throat because I thought I had stabbed my wife."

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SERIES OF ACCIDENTS AT PORTSMOUTH.—Portsmouth was the scene of several shocking accidents during the late fortnight. On Monday, a labourer in the dockyard named Thomas Smart, was struck by a ladder, which was blown down by the violence of the wind, by which his skull was horribly fractured, and he died soon after being conveyed to Haslar Hospital. On Tuesday evening, an elderly man was standing at the bar of the Valiant Soldier, drinking, and talking about the French to the landlord, when he suddenly reeled a mouthful of blood, and fell upon the floor a corpse. An inquest was held upon the body, and a verdict of "Died by the Visitation of God" returned. A young woman was dragged out of the sea near Foat Beach on Sunday night, during the terrific storm which prevailed about one o'clock; which, together with the two soldiers killed by the gun, and one at the same time severely injured, and an accident on board the Rine Annie, form a catalogue of disasters seldom paralleled in so short a space of time in one locality.

LOSS OF LIFE IN THE REGENT'S PARK.—On Sunday afternoon the following melancholy occurrence took place in the Regent's Park. Mr. Nubury, a innkeeper, of Crawford-street, Bryanston-square, was proceeding towards home in his chair along the outer circle, accompanied by his wife, and daughter aged four years, when the horse suddenly took fright, and started off at full speed, until arriving at Marble Arch bridge, where the vehicle came in violent contact with a lamp-post, and Mr. Nubury, with his wife and child, were thrown out, and on being taken to the Middlesex Hospital, he expired. Mrs. Nubury and her daughter were also much hurt.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday, Mr. Wm. Baker held an inquest, at the London Hospital, on view of the body of William Aldrett, aged thirty-five, an engineer, in the employ of the Eastern Counties Railway. It appeared, from the evidence, that the deceased was on that part of the Eastern Counties Railway which crosses John-street, Bethnal-green, when, as he was in the act of laying hold of a baggage-wagon, which had been pulled up on an inclined plane by a chain, he made a signal to a man to stop the engine. As soon as he had done so, he fell through the railings that were put up at the side, to prevent persons (a depth of twenty feet), in consequence, it is supposed, of losing his hold of the wagon. He was taken up insensible, and conveyed to the London Hospital, where his skull was found severely fractured, which had caused a compression of the brain, from the effect of which he died the following day.

SUPPORTS MURDER.—Mr. Hargr, on Monday, held an inquest on the body of a man unknown, who had been on Sunday found in the Thames behind Whitehall quay dead, and pierced with five deep wounds. The landlord of the Rose and Crown, Tooley-street, identified the body as that of the captain of a Yorkshire miller, who frequented his house, but whose name he knew not, and whom he had not seen for two months past. Mr. Bainbridge, a surgeon, who had made a post mortem examination, declared it as his belief that the body had been in the water nearly a fortnight, that the deceased did not die from drowning, and that the wounds were inflicted prior to death. The inference was very strong that they were inflicted by some other person on the deceased. The coroner said the circumstances of the case so very clearly showed that the deceased had met his death by unfair means, that the inquiry must be adjourned for a week.

THE THEATRES.

In a week or two the duties of the dramatic journalist will be almost entirely confined to comparisons between the different merits of those gentlemen who have appeared, or are about to do so, in the various adaptations of Don Cesar de Bazan, who will shortly become completely ubiquitous. We hear Mr. Hicks, Mr. Dale, and Mr. James Brown spoken of as his representatives at different theatres: the only fear is, that the subject will be completely overdone.

The Lyceum is alive in every one of its departments, with busy workmen engaged upon the "Seven Castles of the Passions," to be produced on a scale of splendour which is intended to leave "Aladdin" in the shade, on Monday. An acquisition has been made to the corps of the City National, in the person of Mr. Roxby, an excellent comedian,—we believe from Manchester; and we rejoice to add, that the speculation of Mr. Phelps and Mrs. Warner, for creating a taste for the legitimate drama, at Sadler's Wells, is crowned with undeniable success. We shall make this excellently-conducted theatre the object of a special visit early next week.

DRURY LANE.

At length the long-talked-of opera of "The Syren," the joint production of the thousand-and-one Scribe and Auber, was produced at this theatre on Thursday last, and was certainly successful, although it is as trashy and vulgar a production as ever we witnessed. The libretto is a tissue of unconnected incidents, so any attempt of ours to describe it would give it perhaps the semblance of a plot. Miss Rainforth as the misnamed Syren—for the reader must put all classical associations aside—was interesting, and was engaged in the finale to acts II. and III. Mr. Harrison was also similarly honoured, but was most comically attired; and Mr. Stretton seemed very zealous in turning the old Neapolitan Manager into a Pantaloon. The scenery consisted of but three set-scenes, one for each act.

The grand double scene in the second act is well contrived, and reflects credit on the Givens. The lower part represents an inn under the Abruzzi Mountains, and the upper part a "Footpath in the Forest," winding through trees and rocks, "as the hawks and the play-bills pastorally describe it." There is a rich scene of a saloon also in the palace of the Duke de Popoli, and the baroque Etna mounted; but on the whole it is nothing wonderful. Auber's music is the worst he has composed—it is noisy and common-place. The overture was encorred, much to the detriment, we fear, of M. Benedict's right arm, who of late has become a most furious conductor. All the principal singers were called for at the fall of the curtain, and the piece was loudly applauded; but we fear its duration.

PRINCESS.

At this charming house also has "The Syren" appeared, with the advantage too of a first start, which came off on Monday evening last most triumphantly. "The Syren" is a totally different character from "The Lucia," and one much more fitted to the powers of voice, elegance, and finish of style which belong to Mdlle. Nau. She does not possess tragic energy enough for the "Bride of Lammermoor," but she is truly captivating in the Circassian melody she infuses into the wondrous music she has to sing (though by no means the best, that is to say, of the highest order), which Auber has composed, and which is chiefly indebted to her exquisite performance of it. She was eminently beautiful in the trio of the first act, "When the Shades of Night"—in the bravura "From Head to Foot I Tremble," and in the finale to the last act, "Arouse Poor Dear," her finished execution was beyond all praise. The chansons and romance in the second act were, however, the genius of the opera. Allan sang deliciously; there is a devotion in his voice, particularly in the upper part, which is thrilling beyond measure. Of the rest of the dramatis personæ we say nothing. The piece was highly successful.

But now let us turn to comparisons, and make a few contrasts between what the Princess and "Her Majesty's Servants" as they were wont to be called at old Drury, have effected on this rival occasion.

It is difficult, and would be almost invidious to compare the two "gettings up" of the respective houses. Each has its merit differently diffused throughout; but, in common candour, we prefer, or rather incline to, the Oxford-street version.

By the way, we were in error in attributing the new farce of "Taking the Pledge" to Mr. Oxberry; the author being Mr. John Courtney.

HAYMARKET.

After the "Confederacy" on Monday evening, a fresh translation of "Don Cesar de Bazan" was produced, and with the same good luck which has attended its predecessors, under the title of "A Match for a King," the incidents being compressed into two acts, and much of the melo-dramatic effect omitted to suit the grave taste of the Haymarket audience. The leading features and situations of the drama are, however, closely preserved, and the succession of incidents exactly the same as at the other houses; but, beyond this, the structure of the piece is this, if we may be allowed the term, and appeared more so from the inefficiency of Mr. Charles Mathews as the Dow, in giving weight to the more serious portions of the play, perfectly at home as he was in the lighter phases of the character. It is a rôle of a most peculiar kind, and there are few, very few actors, who can do justice to it: at present Mr. Wallack is decidedly at the head of those who have attempted to portray it. Miss Julia Bennett was an interesting Mariquita, here transformed into a flower-girl. Mrs. W. Clifford, with Mr. Strickland for her spouse, were both very droll as the Marchese and Marchesa de Gran Toronado; and Mr. Stuart was rather dismal for a lover, as the King. In fact, between the light, too light acting of the Dow, and the dark personification of the Monarch, a species of twilight was produced, anything but effective. More welcome was Mr. Mathews in a very pretty song which he introduced at the banquet-table in the prison, descriptive of the charms of his lady-love. It was very catching and characteristic; and we were glad to hear it taken up again at the end of the piece as a finale. An unparagonable wit occurred between the acts, but the audience soon recovered their good temper, and the piece was given out by Mr. Mathews for repetition amidst unqualified applause. Miss Julia Bennett also appeared before the curtain to receive the usual compliments. Both the scenery and dresses of the drama reflect the highest credit on the management. The house was very well filled.

ADELPHI.

On Monday evening another translation of "Don Cesar de Bazan" was brought forward at this theatre, and with perfect success. It is unnecessary to repeat the plot, which is precisely similar to the one we gave last week, as belonging to the version at the Princess; but the entirely different cast of characters, and, in many instances, conception of parts, may admit of a few remarks. Mr. Webster performed the hero, and Madame Celeste the Dancing Girl. Miss Woolgar was the Armourer's Apprentice, and Mr. Howe the enamoured King of Spain: it is to this latter gentleman's performance that, in our opinion, the greatest praise is due. He was drafted from the Haymarket company to these boards, for the purpose of playing the part—not a very gracious one, at best; and which, we believe, was refused by Mr. James Vining; such having been the reason for his quitting the establishment. Mr. Howe may congratulate himself with good reason upon his success. The unlawful love of the licentious monarch, his impetuosity and deceit, were excellently portrayed; and his general acting, especially in the third act, of the highest order. With Mr. Webster's Don Cesar, we must confess that we were less pleased. Although evidently conceived and acted with the greatest care, yet there was throughout a something wanting to identify the character with that of the high-spirited, dissolute, chivalric, decayed nobleman. It was too heavy: its devil-may-care gaiety appeared to pertain more to the respectable bourgeois than the high-born Dow; and much of the rollicking, off-hand dash of the character—the most characteristic attribute—was marred by a hesitation in delivery, which induced a perpetual fear amongst the audience that the performer was about to break down. This was less perceptible in the third act, and here certainly the applause was greatest. Madame Celeste played Mariquita with her usual effective energy; and Miss Woolgar, as Lazarillo, looked and acted charmingly. Aspired Tarantula by these two ladies at the commencement of the play was warmly applauded.

The rest of the cast need not be noticed, except that we think a more fitting representative might have been found for the Minister, whose declamation, so totally void of expression, was anything but agreeable. The piece has been beautifully put upon the stage, and with the greatest attention to detail. The last scene especially was admirable, and would have been still more perfect had the tessellated pavement come down to the lamps instead of finishing at the proscenium. This can be easily remedied, and with the greatest advantage. The audience—a very full one—were in high good spirits throughout, and applauded lustily at the end, when Mr. Webster announced the drama for repetition every evening until further notice. The piece has been adapted with much tact and stage-effect by Mr. Bourgeois, who appears to produce plays with the same high-pressure facility as Donetti does operas.

On Tuesday evening a new burlesque from the pen of Mr. Coyne was produced, called "Telemachus; or, the Island of Calypso." The subject was not a new one, since we recollect an extravaganza on the same story during the Vestris' dynasty at the Olympic, but the present version was entirely original. This species of entertainment has of late become exceedingly popular; and in these days of declining legitimacy is the only vehicle for shooting at folly with effect from the stage. Burlesque, as now written, may be divided into two classes; those which depend upon pointed dialogue, whimsical antitheses, and neatly-turned allusions for their success; and those which create laughter by some broad piece of buffoonery or ultra-absurd assumption of character. Of the former class, we may notice "Fortunio," "Open Sesame," the two "Aladdins," &c.; of the latter, "Norina," and pieces of the like kind. The burlesque of Tuesday evening combined some of the principal features of these two, and was plentifully charged with jokes upon the Art-Union, Joinville, the drama, Captain Warner, &c.; whilst Wright and Paul Bedford had the perpetration of some most exaggerated drolleries entrusted to them, the former gentleman playing the nymph Calypso, and the latter one Mentor, with Miss Woolgar for the hero. We confess that we should have been better pleased had the lady and the nymph changed characters. Mr. Wright, in his line, is imitatively quaint and comic, yet there is something repulsive to us in his assumption of female characters, not more so, perhaps, in him than in any other man; but he is said to "make up" admirably for such parts, and, to our thinking, the closer he carries the personation the more offensive is the performance. We trust this hint will operate in future towards the extinction of such unpleasant assumptions. The jokes of the burlesque were showered about the dialogue with great liberality. The following brought down a hearty round of applause:—

Men. The picture's too delicious; don't proceed.
The island is a charming spot;—indeed,
To see it I had serious thoughts.

Teir. Oh, fel!
Did I say so? I meant to say so!
That's now the very phrase, by which we hope
A thing we can't exactly call our own.

Mr. S. Cowell was amazingly funny as a black attendant, and elicited a loud cacore in a song to the bango "De Polkum Dance," a parody on the Nigger melody, "Dance, de boatman, dance," which the little lads of the metropolis now whistle about the streets. It had verses adapted to passing events, like "Jim Crow." Miss Woolgar had some quaint parodies also, which she gave with her usual spirit and tact; and Miss Ellen Chaplin, as a little tiger Cupid, delivered the lines allotted to her with careful emphasis. A Polka, by six boys, transplanted from the "Avarice" tableaux in "Les Sept Châteaux du Diable," might have been much better, had the figure been more cleverly arranged; as it was, they all appeared abroad, not knowing precisely what to do. Of course, the blame for this falls upon the management.

The burlesque was placed upon the stage with great liberality, and the scenery and dresses were excellent. At the conclusion, Messrs. Wright and Bedford walked, hand in hand, before the curtain, to receive the congratulations of the audience, which were not, however, altogether unmixed.

ASTLEY'S.

Mr. Batty has every reason to be satisfied with the success of his establishment, to which crowded houses nightly bear witness. Mr. Widdicombe—that illustrious individual, concerning whose defiance of time and age such wild legends are extant—dark hints of his having been Master of the Horse to Charops, whose procession he arranged when that monarch laid the first stone of the pyramid—and mysterious whispers of his equestrian achievements in later times, at Agincourt and Tewkesbury—this type of Eugene Sue's last creation took his benefit on Friday evening, when the still attractive "Masceppa" was performed to one of the fullest audiences of the season. Previously to this, however, Mr. Barry, the clown, performed his voyage with four geese, from the Red House to Vauxhall-bridge, to give additional clat to the benefit. We had the curiosity to go and see this feat. There was something irresistibly ludicrous in the grave features of the clown, as he guided his feathered team amongst the throng of hosts that surrounded him. There was one goose, of restless temperament, who had not been properly broken in, and preferred going along with his head under water, and his tail in the air, to the great diversion of the spectators. The intrepid navigator was warmly greeted when he entered the arena at night; and elicited loud applause by his humorous burlesque of a parliamentary speech. The scenes in the circle were of a very superior order, Madame Tournaire exhibiting several graceful poses with a floating scarf; and three "Olympians" performing some wonderful feats of strength upon horseback. A Signor Milano and Miss Cushale were encorred in the "Polka," which, considering it was danced upon six inches of sawdust, required no small amount of labour.

STRAND.

A two act drama was produced at this little theatre on Monday evening, under the title of "Henri de Rochefort," and was deservedly successful. It is a translation, from the French, of "Madelmoine de Bois-Robert," which was also performed at the Haymarket, with effect, last winter; and there called, "Victor and Hortense." The principal characters, in the present instance, were played with much ability by Mrs. Montgomerie and Mr. Roberts, and the entire piece was received with unanimous approbation. Mr. Marble still continues to throw his audiences into fearful convulsions of laughter. He is one of the best histrionic importations we have ever seen from the other side of the Atlantic; and the quiet oddity with which he delivers his drolleries, doubles their effect. Looking to the exceedingly moderate prices of this house, we must confess it offers as good an entertainment as any in London.

ADELAIDE GALLERY.

This popular place of amusement, after a short recess, was reopened last Monday evening under a new management, having undergone a complete alteration in the interior. Amongst other novelties which the enterprising proprietor has succeeded in obtaining, the first that appeared in the programme of the entertainments was the Sax-Horn Band, the "horn" being an instrument which has now, we believe for the first time, made its appearance in this country. The band was excellently conducted by M. Laurent, jun., who on this occasion relinquished his corner-a-piston for the baton. As we were placed at some distance from the orchestra, we confess we could not satisfactorily distinguish the Sax-Horns from the other instruments which formed the band; but we can speak of the general effect as being exceedingly good. At the conclusion of the concert Mr. Ormonde, a gentleman who has before appeared at this institution, commenced the first of a series of lectures upon the popular dances of all nations, said to be compiled by Mr. Stouffer, the successful author of "Polkamania." The lecturer commenced by giving a description of the origin of dancing amongst the Greeks. After some allusions to the weakness of our nation in this respect, he proceeded systematically through the dances of all times, from the ballets of the Augustan age to the Polka of our own. The illustrations were capitally given by some foreign artistes; but we would recommend that on future occasions some arrangements should be made to prepare the dances by the time the allusion is made to them. The gallery was crowded to excess, but the excellent arrangement of the seats enabled everybody to obtain a capital view of the entertainments.

Mr. BELAKET.—A special session has been held at Bedford, near Sunderland, to investigate a charge preferred by Mr. Belaket against Mr. George Grey Bell, and Mr. John Stephenson, of having set fire to his house on the 18th of September. The inquiry on the first day extended to ten hours, during which the Rev. R. Belaket, Thomas Coxon, a baker, Joseph Kidd and Joseph Catton, examiners, were examined, but from whom nothing was elicited to implicate the prisoners. On the next day several other witnesses were examined relating to the fire, but although they saw Bell at the fire, which he did not attempt to extinguish, they witnessed nothing to indicate that he was the incendiary. Stephenson did not appear to be in the slightest degree implicated in the transaction. At the close of the inquiry the magistrates expressed their strongest conviction that there was not the shadow of a charge against either of the prisoners.—Times Mercury.

ANOTHER COLLIERIES EXPLOSION.—Another colliery explosion occurred on Monday, at Cox Lodge Colliery, near Newcastle, which fortunately, however, was not attended with any loss of life. Four or three of the men were rather seriously injured. The explosion was caused by a person named Brown having used a naked candle.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

SONNET ON THE PROJECTED RENDAL AND WINANDERBURY RAILWAY.

Is there no rock of English ground secure
From such assaults? Schemes of retirement soon
In youth, and 'mid the busy world best near
As when their eager fancies of hope were blown,
Must perish: how can there this bright dream
And must he too his old delights disdain
Who seems a false utopian here
'Mid his gaudy birds at random thrown?
Be! the threat, bright dawn, from Grand-head
Given to the passing traveller's rapturous glance!
Fond for my power, thou beautiful romance
Of nature; and of human hearts be dead,
Speak passing words, be ventures, with thy string
And constant voice, protest against the wrong!

Byrd Mount, Oct. 12, 1844.

W. W. WORDSWORTH.

TEA-DRINKING IN RUSSIA.

Tea is the principal luxury, besides brandy, in which the Russian indulges, when in his power. It is common to see him on these occasions call for a samovar, or tea-urn full of water; this he continues pouring through a small teapot containing a pinch of tea, until the water is all consumed. He will actually thus imbibe eight, twelve, or fifteen pints of hot liquid at a sitting.

A POINTED BLOW.

An invalid sent for a physician, the late Dr. Whistman, and after detailing him for some time with a description of his pains, &c., he thus summed up:—"Now, doctor, you have humbugged me long enough with your goodly nothing pills and worthless syrups; they don't touch the real difficulty. I wish you to strike the cause of my ailment if it is in your power to reach it." "It shall be done," said the doctor, at the same time lifting his cane and demolishing a decanter of gin that stood upon the sideboard.

THE FIRST LOCOMOTIVE.

Just forty years ago, Mr. Trevithick, a mining engineer, constructed the first locomotive engine at Merthyr Tydfil, and applied it successfully to the traction of coal and coke.

LORD KIDON'S TASTE.

In the plainness and heartiness of his tastes, Lord Eldon resembled Sir Walter Scott, and other unadorned lovers of the olden times. His brother, Lord Stowell, on the contrary, was, according to his account, a thorough gourmet. In describing Lord Kidon's tastes, Mr. Twiss says:—"To fashion and refinement Lord Eldon made no pretence, though his right understanding and kind nature preserved him from any solemnity in good taste. He dined on fish, was frugal, but not luxurious. He liked plain port; the stronger the better. One of his favourite dishes was liver and bacon; and when he dined with George the Fourth it was one of the entrées."

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT COINS.

On Wednesday, as Mr. Pope, a farmer, residing at Kiburn, was engaged ploughing a field on his farm at Kiburn, adjoining the London and Birmingham railway, several pieces of ancient gold, silver, and copper coins were turned up, including some of the reign of Oliver Cromwell, in excellent preservation. Some centuries ago on the site of ground stood an extensive convent and walled ground.

THE SCIENCE OF WARFARE.

A society has been formed, and has located itself at Mulgrave House, Falmouth, having for its object "the advancement of science, and the establishment of universal peace," by the apparently incongruous means of teaching the art of war. The inventor of the new science of warfare is the gentleman for many years known as the Duke of Normandy. Some of his inventions are such as to reflect to those of Captain Warner, but in addition to the explosive power which he has at command, the "Duke" also has invented a cannon on the principle of non-recoil, by means of which a certain aim may be taken, and the discharges made with greater rapidity. Some experiments were made on Tuesday. Several shells exploded, and were fearfully destructive in their effects. One of the rockets was fired at a distance of two hundred yards from a bulkhead, against which a stout sheet of iron had been firmly nailed. The rocket exploded the instant it struck the object, with such tremendous force as to send away the iron, and to shiver the thick planks of wood behind.

AN EXPENSIVE GLASS OF WINE.

On the day appointed by Queen Victoria for the opening of the Royal Exchange, in 1576 (Jan. 23rd), Sir Thomas Gresham purchased a small costly pearl, which, on account of its exceedingly great value, had been refused by several persons of distinction. Sir Thomas Gresham at once agreed to give £1500 for the pearl. After he became possessed of this costly treasure, Sir Thomas immediately ordered a wine-glass to be bought, and grinding the pearl into the finest powder, he placed it in the glass, and, filling the goblet with wine, drank it off at a draught, declaring that the building and the Queen's Majesty were worthy of such a beverage.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY.

In the excavations for the improvement of the California Canal, a curious circumstance was observed at Sonoma. In removing some of the ruins a number of human bones, the teeth being remarkably fresh and entire, and some complete skeletons, were found. Some-remains of the reign of Elizabeth were also dug up; but what occasioned most surprise was the discovery of a most of nails, completely encased in the solid wall, with apparently not the slightest opening by which ingress could be imagined. In a small cavity, about three inches in diameter, were found six toads and a lizard. On their first admission to the light of day, the toads appeared insensible, but on being touched by the men they speedily revived.

A CURIOUS PRAYER BOOK.

There is in the possession of J. Biggs, Esq., of Wallbrook, a very curious old Prayer-book, which has been a sort of non-entity in his family for nearly 100 years. The title-page is as follows:—"The Psalter, or Psalms of David, after the translation of the great Bible, printed as it shall by say or song in Churches. With the Morning and Evening Prayer, and several additions of Collets, and other the orthodox services, gathered out of the books of Common Prayer." Imprinted at London, by William Stuk, Anno 1669.

A POOR MAN.

It is possible that the accumulation of wealth may add to the sorrow of the possessor. I know an individual, with whom I was very intimate when a youth, and I remember very well, at that time, whenever I wanted relief for the poor, he would give a £10 note, and say, "Richard, never pass my door; always come to me when you want assistance for any deserving object." He was then considerably poor, having perhaps a fortune of from £50,000 to £60,000; but now he is worth nearly £1,000,000. One would have thought it ought to have made his power less; but no, I know not a more miserable man than that.—Extract from a speech of Richard Oastler.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE OF LONDON.

The first stone of the first "Royal Exchange" was laid by the celebrated Sir Thomas Gresham, Knt., agent to the Queen's Highness, on the 7th day of June, A.D. 1565. On the 23rd of January, A.D. 1576 (about twelve years after her accession to the throne), the maiden Queen Elizabeth opened the building with great pomp. This Exchange endured just one century, having been destroyed by the great fire in the year 1666, after which it was rebuilt of excellent Portland stone. The then "mercy monarch," King Charles II., deigned to lay the first stone of the new edifice. The 28th of September, 1669, was the day fixed for the opening of the New Exchange. The King was expected, but he did not come. Before the building of any regular Exchange divers common councils in the reign of Henry VIII. resolved whether there should be a house or convocation place of meeting for merchants to treat of their affairs, and in the 26th year of that monarch's reign he sent royal letters to the city "for the making of a new house at Lendenhall," whereupon it being put to hands whether the new house should be removed out of Lombard-street, it was agreed that it should not; so that the merchants' meeting continued there until the Royal Exchange was opened in 1679.

A NOVEL SPECIES OF CRIME.

A person charged a man at the Devonport Town Hall on Wednesday last, with intending to commit "some sort of suicide on her."

A GOOD IDEA.

In what was formerly the Backstairs Hall, at Amsterdam, was a group which might perhaps be usually confined in America. Above is a strong money, great burst open, and rate clashing in and out; a man is falling headlong below it; and further down are sculptured the robes of some saints. The fellow fell by being too fast. On the right is a figure of Justice, with sword and scales. It would shake the nerves of the gravest of our delinquents, to stand his trial with such emblems as these, if an unscrupulous Dutch judge were on the bench before him.—Dr. Martin's Observations in Europe.

ENGLAND AND THE CONTINENT.

I will make an assertion, grounded on experience and conviction, and which may be applied as an interesting test, that an Englishman, who after a long absence from England, returns to it with feelings and sentiments partial to our country, and adhere to his own, has no real mind—in without the powers of observation and plain may comparison—and has no title to enjoy the superior moral and local advantages to which he is born, but of which he is incapable and unworthy.—Letters of the Earl of Malmesbury.

AMERICAN ORATORY.

At a late political meeting in the western part of Illinois, the orator declaimed his heaves by the following eloquent remarks:—"Every man and woman is born free and equal except niggers. They also born as in Asia, for I am a big foot and my brother Rip is only a small foot and a half and thick through in proportion. They ain't born as in point of strength, for I can double up any nigger between here and the forks of Red River. They ain't born as in point of guinnity, for I know a smart poon, while cousin Leahy was born a nigger. We ain't as in point of running, for I can run down a steam-boiler, a panther, or a railway car; nor we ain't born as in point of taking eye, for I can put the bang-hole to my mouth and swallow half a barrel. There what I was born equal in? I'll tell you how we're equal. When you go to the polls next election day, if you'll vote for me to go to Congress, I swear to you by all the eyes in my liveries pocket, that every one of you shall have a great and I'll take a great too, and then we shall be equal all round."

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH TO QUEEN VICTORIA.]

WEST FRONT OF THE UPPER WARD OF WINDSOR CASTLE—THE QUEEN AND HER ROYAL VISITORS PROCEEDING TO ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

In resuming our illustrated chronicle of this most important and interesting event, it may be as well to state, that the several Engravings of the Roy I sojourn at Windsor, have been executed by Mr. Stephen Sly, from Drawings, made by him, by Authority; so that the accuracy of the details of the splendid scenes and incidents portrayed, may be implicitly relied on; and the very handsome manner in which the means of insuring this authenticity has been granted, will ever command our most grateful remembrance. We take up our record with our Windsor Correspondent's report of the proceedings on Friday, which appeared only in part of our impression of last week.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY FROM THE CORPORATION OF WINDSOR. This morning, at nine o'clock, the members of the Corporation, with the Rev. Isaac Gossett, the vicar, in full canonicals, assembled in the Council Chamber, at the Town Hall, or the purpose of proceeding in procession to the Castle, to present the address, which had been agreed to at a numerous meeting of the Aldermen and Town Council on the preceding day.

THE SLOPES, WINDSOR CASTLE.

The civic procession left the hall at half-past nine, preceded by the mayor, who, with the whole of the members of the corporation, was in his full official robes. Upon their arrival at the Castle, they were taken to the Queen's drawing (or Zuccarelli) room, there to wait the pleasure of the King. After waiting for a few minutes, the mayor, vicar, and town councillors were ushered into the presence of his Majesty, in the King's drawing-room, where his Majesty (who was surrounded by the Duke de Montpensier, Admiral Mackau, General Ramigny, Count Dumas, General Baron Athalin, Count de Chabannes, Colonel Thierry, Baron Pain, and several others in the suite of the King) received them in the most gracious and affable manner. The address, after having been read by the town clerk in an extremely emphatic and feeling manner, was handed by him to the mayor, who presented it to his Majesty, by whom it was received very graciously.

His Majesty having handed the document to M. Guizot, who stood immediately upon the King's right, advanced somewhat nearer to the Corporation than the position he had previously occupied, and addressing himself to that body, spoke as follows:—

"Mr. Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the borough of Windsor—I feel most grateful to her Majesty Queen Victoria for having permitted you to present this address to me. I receive it with the most cordial thanks, impressed with the kind reception I have met with from all classes of her Majesty's subjects since my arrival in this country. I was most happy last year to perceive the sentiments of the French people, when her Majesty favoured me with a visit at Ex. I was most happy to entertain her Majesty under my own roof on that occasion, and rejoiced at the interchange of social feelings which then took place. The union of France and England is of great importance to both nations, not from any wish of aggrandisement, however. Our view should be peace, while we leave every other country in the possession of those blessings which it has pleased Divine Providence to bestow on them. Happy I am that you appreciate my constant endeavours, assisted by a wise government at home, to promote the most friendly and peaceful relations between the two countries. France has nothing to ask of England, and England has nothing to ask of France, but cordial union. I thank you for this very kind address, and I consider it a privilege that I have had the good fortune to express before you the sentiments with which my heart is filled."

Thirty of the Yeomen of the Queen's Guard also arrived at Windsor this morning, their services having been commanded by the Queen this afternoon, at the Palace. They were accompanied by the Earl of Beverley, Captain; Sir Samuel Hancock, and Thomas Seymour Sadler, Esq., Escons; and Jonathan Ellisthorpe, Esq., Clerk of the Cheque and Secretary.

VISIT TO THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

Her Majesty, accompanied by the King of the French, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, left the Castle this day at noon, in an open pony carriage and four, and proceeded across the Home Park, to Frogmore House, to pay a morning visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. Three other pony carriages and four, containing Prince Albert, the Duc de Montpensier, M. Guizot, Admiral Mackau, and several others of the illustrious guests, followed the Queen and the King of the French.

The royal and distinguished party, after alighting for a short time at the mansion, again entered the carriages, driving along the Frogmore road, and entering the Home Park at the iron gates opposite the Long Walk. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent returned to the Castle to luncheon, in the carriage with the Queen and his Majesty Louis Philippe.

Her Majesty and her august visitors lunched at half-past one o'clock, in consequence of the investiture having been appointed to take place at half-past two. Here we may describe, respectively, the three engravings at page 244, illustrating other incidents of the Royal visit.

1. West Front of the Upper Ward of Windsor Castle.

This view—the grandest in the Castle—exhibits, in the centre, the ancient British mound, crowned with the Round Tower; on the left, the Norman Gateway (through which the royal party passed on their way from the upper to the lower ward), with the Brunswick Tower, containing George IV.'s, the King's Gate, behind it, in the distance; and on the right, Clarence Tower, St. George's Gate, King Edward III.'s, Lancaster Tower, with a small projection of Victoria Tower, in the distance, beyond it. The Royal company, as they passed before this imposing range of buildings, were seen to great advantage.

2. The Grand Lawn and Drive in front of Victoria Gate—Visit to the Royal Stables.

In this view, the royal entrances to the stables and riding house are shown; and in the distance, the wooded heights of Forest Hill and Queen Anne's Walk.

3. The Slopes.—Promenade of the Queen and her Visitors.

This engraving exhibits, in the distance, a view of the east front of the Castle, in which the private apartments are situated;—also the north terrace, devoted to the service of the King and his suite;—a part of the east terrace;—the Queen's private conservatory, &c. The slopes are a series of elevated walks, on the north-east of the Castle, between the Little and the Home Parks. They are much frequented by her Majesty, being of great beauty, and perfectly secluded from the public eye.

We now proceed to the illustrations of a portion of the arrangements made specially for the Royal visit in the interior of the Castle.

The King's Closet.

Of all the rooms devoted to the use of the King, this was, perhaps, the most comfortable, but yet the most gorgeous, in its decorations. It is of small size, and consequently was not overloaded with furniture—a rich cabinet, a sofa, three or four chairs and a pillar table, being the only large articles it contained. The prevalent colour of the room was crimson, the carpet, window-hangings, walls, &c., being of varied tints of that most regal colour. The room, in this respect, seemed to focalise the colours of the other rooms of the suite, in which a variety of reds of lesser intensity prevailed. The walls of this chamber were hung with the following pictures:—"The Emperor Charles V.," by Sir Ant. More;—"Joan Van Cleve and his Wife," by himself;—"The Two Misers," by Quintin Matsys;—"Man's Head," by Parmegiano;—"A Pair," by Brughel;—"St. Catherine," by Guido;—"Holy Family," by Tintoretto;—"A Madonna," by Carlo Delfi;—"Portrait of a Warrior," by Spagnoletto;—"St. Sebastian," by Guido;—"An Antiquary," by Mieris;—"St. Catherine," by Domenichino;—"The Supper," by Rubens;—"Guercino Painting," by himself;—"Captain of the Papal Guard," by Parmegiano;—"Holy Family," by Julia Romano; and others of great beauty chiefly by the Dutch masters, Jan Steen, Peter Neefs, Wouvermans, and Steenwyck. The ceiling of this unique apartment is covered with insigila of royalty, having reference to the reign of William IV., who hung the pictures. A fine bronze statue of Frederick the Great held a prominent place among the smaller ornaments of the room. The whole is lighted by two windows on the north side, between, and on each side of which, massive pier glasses were placed; it is approached on the west by the King's bedchamber; and on the east by the King's council chamber. Our cut gives an excellent idea of the room as it appears.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- "Ignoramus," Bromley, who asks the origin of the Reculver, off Margate.—The name of Reculver, or Regulbrom, is derived by Baxter, from the British words Reg (a lion), signifying "the point against the waves," and was thus descriptive of its situation. It is concluded, by existing remains, to have been one of the very earliest stations occupied by the Romans in this country; and was as a light-house, to guide sailors, by fires kindled every night. Reculver subsequently became a principal seat of the Saxon kings, and near the site of a Benedictine Monastery, the ruins of the church of which (temp. Edward I.) remained till a few years since, when they were in a ruinous condition, principally by a view of keeping up the two towers and spire at the west end, as a land mark. The story of their having been built by two sisters is a popular tradition, whereas they have been called "the sister-towers."
- "W. C.," We believe Orkney to have been the county town of Rutland from the time of John, when it is first mentioned as a county. Our correspondent wishes to receive some account of "the old cross at Barrow, now and for many years past, a chapel to Colchester, in the county aforementioned."
- "An Architect's Clerk."—Our illustrations of the New Royal Exchange will be so numerous, that we shall not be able to include any of the unaccepted designs.
- "A. Y. Z." City.—We do not understand the inscription in Graceland church.
- "Alfred," Tunbridge Wells.—Taylor's System of Short-hand, improved by Gold.
- "Debra," should write to a manager of one of the London theatres.
- "A Subscriber," Naresfield.—Cheshire is a county palatine, Coventry is a county situated in the hundred of Knightlow, in the county of Warwick, of which, however, it forms no constituent portion; having been made, with several adjacent villages, a separate county, by an act of Henry IV., in 1411, and entitled the County of the City of Coventry.
- "Miss Dora,"—The bright polished sides and back of a fireplace give out much more heat than surfaces in the opposite condition, on account of the increased radiation.
- "Glad,"—The Emperor of Austria did not accompany "the Allied Sovereigns" to England in 1814.
- "A Constant Subscriber," is thanked for the hints as to the Portsmouth illustrations.
- "A Disappointed Subscriber."—The distance between the supporting pyramids, or points of suspension, of the New Bridge, is 564 feet. The two roadways are each 12 feet wide, with a footpath, a foot wide, between them. It will bear 7334 tons, besides its own weight.
- "W. R.," Green, Devon.—The volume on Dogs, in the Naturalist's Library (Edinburgh), is a sound work. The agent will supply the Print, &c.
- "H. P.," We have not room for the verse.
- "S. K. B.," a Constant Reader, wishes to know the weekly allowance to each of the inmates of the Lord's City-road Luncheon.
- "J. H. W.,"—The Church shall appear.
- "C. W.," Unbridge, is cautioned against foreign forgeries.
- "An Old Sub," has mistaken for just the clever troop of Punch's Complete Letter-writer.
- "Archer," Evesham.—The Sovereign had as free choice of marriage as either of her subjects.
- "A Loyal Subject,"—Prince Albert's surname is Bavaria.
- "Charles," should write to an Arrangement.
- "A Bolton Subscriber," should write to the Secretary to the Metropolitan Loan Society.
- "J. X. G.," Nuttall-lane.—The Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital are the Great Officers of State (Her Majesty's Ministers).
- "Edgewood of the Bee,"—We have not room for the long letter.
- "L. K.," "Green," Stamford, "G. C.," East-street.—See future announcements of the Large Friend.
- "J. P. D.," Liverpool, should consult a Nargant.
- "Julius," may learn the price of the newly-invented Zinc, not Tin, Churns at the corner of Wind-up-street, Oxford-street.
- "G. H. P.," Dublin.—Charles has already been engraved in our Journal.
- "A New Subscriber," Liverpool, should order the Census Supplement, price 6d., of his newspaper. The subject obligingly suggested, is in hand. The Carnival of Paris is engraved in No. 41 of our Journal.
- "H. M.," Curdleigh, Suffolk, should apply to Messrs. Duns and Co., Soho-square.
- "Pina,"—The history of the Death-watch is too well known for reprinting. We have not room for Lives, by De la; Music, by De la; Lines, by J. H. T.; Lines to Lord Napier; Death of an Old Sailor.
- "K. W. J.," Twickenham.—The resident clergyman is legally the Chairman of the Vestry.
- "O. P.," should apply at Doctors' Commons.
- "N. W.,"—The creditor may strike the balance.
- "A Subscriber," Liverpool.—The Trustees may be used.
- "E. . .,"—Lancashire and funded property left by a person dying intestate is divided equally among the children.
- "E. P.,"—There are two descriptions of Marriage Licenses.
- "L. L.,"—Letters and newspapers are forwarded to India the 1st day of every month, via Southampton. Those sent by Overland Mail are forwarded on the 4th.
- "T. W.," Guernsey, should consult the "History of Hampshire" for genealogical details.
- "S. D.," should consult the memoirs of Dr. Wolf, in one of our late numbers.
- "De la,"—The address is the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Worcester.
- "G. S.,"—The chief magistrates of London, York, and Dublin, are styled Lord Mayors. In the case of Dublin, the title of Lord Mayor was granted by the King in 1815, in consideration of the leading part taken by the city at the Restoration.
- "A Constant Reader," Herefordshire.—The subject of the Anti-Union plate for 1843, was Mr. J. P. Knight's picture. The print for 1842—"Raphael and the Paragon"—is from Sir A. Colcott's picture.
- "L. S. B.,"—The Parliamentary interference regarding railway charges extends only to the third class carriages, which is 1s. per mile.
- "F. T. G.," Gloucester, will find a minute account of a recent Spanish bull fight in No. 83, vol. 3, of our Journal.
- "A Constant Subscriber," Salisbury.—"Farmer's Violin Preceptor," lately published.
- "G. H.,"—Any person may dramatize the incidents of a novel, without infringing the copyright Act.
- "J. N.,"—The friends are declined.
- "J. S.," Rochester, is thanked for correcting our misstatement: the Prince of Wales was not born Bishop of Herebury, but Duke of Cornwall.
- "A. L.,"—The subjects have usually been engraved in our Journal.
- "An Interested Subscriber,"—The last Treatise on What is that illustrated by Kenny Newcomb, and published by Bell, Fleet-street.
- "C. W.,"—A Subscriber from the beginning.—There are at present no good authorities for the rules quoted: get Mr. B. after the facts, and adopt them.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1844.

Lord Ellenborough has been created an Earl; the patent of his higher grade of nobility almost met him on his landing. This looks as if the Government were determined to support the ex-Governor-General to the full extent of their powers against the company of kings in Leadenhall-street. The unanimity with which he was deposed by this last body, and the zeal with which he is, and no doubt will be, "in another place," defended by the Ministry, alike stimulate public curiosity as to what could have been the nature of the act which was so deadly a sin at the India House, and so decided a merit in Downing-street. But nothing beyond guess and surmise has been offered to the public. All that seems certain is, that his lordship made himself exceedingly popular with the army in India, and equally disliked by the civil service; the probability being that some flagrant want of respect to this branch of the Indian Government is at the root of the matter. At present the quarrel remains as it was before—a mystery, which must be left to time and the meeting of Parliament to develop.

The only names of any political note whatever that have appeared in the arena of public discussion during the recess, are those of that section of the Conservatives known as "Young England." All other party men seem to have deserted the public, and are alive only to their mere official duties, or their personal recreation. The Whigs are doing nothing, though a slight suspicion is abroad that they are coquetting with O'Connell; Sir R. Peel has been diplomatising with Guizot, and we hear of no more agricultural dinners at Tamworth. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is rubbing his hands gleefully at the very satisfactory state of the public coffers, but we hear nothing else respecting him. There has scarcely ever been a recess in which our public men gave so few indications of their existence. "Young England" has had all the stage to itself; and it must be acknowledged that the manner in which they have come forward, and the objects they avow, do them infinite credit. Twice almost in the space of a week they have met assemblies of their countrymen, not for the purpose usually visible in these interseasonal gatherings, of self and party laudations, defence of past votes, and biddings for future political support, but for a higher object, that of ameliorating the intellectual and physical condition of the people. And they bring to their task many qualities that already fix attention upon them, and must, in the course of time, create a large amount of public opinion. They are few in number, but they have energy, eloquence, and what is equally valuable, heart and earnestness. At Manchester they met the members of a society, established to promote the cultivation of intellectual tastes and habits in the people; the speech of Mr. Smythe may be taken as the exposition of their principles on this important point, and those who think that "Young England" are mere sentimental deplorers of a past, which all their exertions are intended to restore, will do well to read his eloquent appreciation of the wants of the present, his estimate of the importance of commerce, and its connection with, and influence on, literature and the arts. In every branch of his subject he exhibits a spirit far superior to that of the mere laudator temporis acti. The meeting at Bingley, which followed that at Manchester, had more of the character of a rural fête, and possessed an interest of another kind; the class by whom it was attended was also a very different one. The occasion was trifling enough in itself—the extension of the allotment system to the cottiers of a village in Yorkshire, and the establishment among them of a cricket-club, are not events that attract "the eyes of Europe," or rivet the attention of a people. But, both in the large sphere and the smaller one, the same amiable wish really to effect something for the improvement of the many, was visible; and because the good they can yet do must of necessity be limited in amount, that is no reason why it should excite a sneer. Many, we believe, still ask what are the principles of "Young England?" We question if, in the mere infancy of a party, and in the first steps of a movement, the party themselves could accurately define them; they must be developed by action; at present their course seems to be directed as much by a few generous impulses, as by any distinct or settled code of opinion. But the following eloquent estimate of the tendency of those opinions, as far as facts have yet exhibited them—a tribute to the party, which we borrow from the Times—may throw some light on a much debated question:—

If we might resolve their secret acts into any one principle, we should say it is an acknowledgment of the great but neglected truth, that man is the masterpiece of the creation, and that for him all earthly things are made and should be administered. He is better than money, or house, or land, or rank, or learning, or any work, or quality, or institution of men. As far as the bulk of our fellow-creatures does not partake of these, or of the benefits flowing from them, so far are they a disgrace and a burden to the possessors. The gifts of Heaven live and flow. Favoured men and classes are their channel, and the many their most rightful recipients. Monopoly, selfishness, and negligence, are as against the divine disposition. Wealth is the midst of misery, literature dwelling contentedly by the thick of ignorance, thousands of acres for the sale use of one, while thousands never tread the native turf or know the shade of a tree—these are all blots in the work of Heaven, and make a nation old—in weakness, old in misery, and old in crime.

Active steps are being taken in the metropolis for improving the sanitary condition of the Poor. It was high time for stirring in the matter, for the march of improvement has driven new streets through many of those neighbourhoods in which poverty, filth, and disease congregated in heaps; and hundreds have been hunted forth from their wretched homes to find others equally wretched elsewhere, or to deteriorate some locality not yet sunk to the worst—to the level of the spot they had just forsaken. Nothing can exceed the pictures of the dirt, profligacy, and misery, that were centred in these "Rookeries." Disease was a constant dweller among them, and it has often been a matter of surprise that the fevers and contagious disorders with which they abounded, did not spread into the districts inhabited by the wealthy, often in close proximity. Most true is the statement of the Bishop of London, made at the meeting for the purpose of Establishing Baths and Washing-houses for the Poor, held at the Mansion-house, on Wednesday:—

The crowds who throng the streets of this great and rich metropolis, surrounded as they are on every side by the evidences of its wealth and grandeur, are little aware of the fearful mass of wretchedness and misery which is to be found behind the wealth of these gay streets—in the shades of the poor; or that within a few yards of those splendid shops, which are filled with the richest productions of all parts of the world—within so short a distance of the counting houses of merchants whose fortunes are reckoned by millions, are to be found masses of human wretchedness, suffering and degradation.

On the fact that for the vilest accommodation the poor are obliged to pay an exorbitant price, is founded the plan that is proposed as a remedy for the evils. It is believed that for the same rent, or less, the poor and honest man may command a decent dwelling, and the speculators clear a fair interest on the capital invested in the experiment. The plan is not a new one; it has often been proposed in various forms, but there seems some chance of its now being carried out. Another plan before the public is supplementary to this, but still conducive to the same object, the improvement of the physical condition of the poor. This is the establishment of baths and washing-houses, to enable the humblest classes to secure to themselves cleanliness both of person and clothes, neither of which is at present within their reach. Among the middle classes, the name of "washing day" has long been a sort of synonym for the most extreme domestic discomfort; but in every respect its inconvenience is increased when the process has to be carried on in a room which is the only dwelling of a whole family. The details given by the Bishop of London in the speech we have already quoted, are absolutely frightful. If it be possible, then, to provide places where hot water and drainage can be provided at a very low price, and a constantly recurring evil can be thus removed from the dwellings of the poor, an immense benefit will be conferred on that large class of society. The improvement of their dwellings is the larger and most comprehensive project; but there is no reason why the two plans should not work together.

LAUNCH OF THE GLADIATOR WAR STEAMER.—On Monday afternoon this splendid sea-bent was launched from Her Majesty's dockyard, Woolwich, in the presence of about 1000 persons. The following are the correct dimensions and tonnage of this fine vessel:—Length between the perpendiculars, 190 ft.; length of keel for tonnage, 164 ft. 8 in.; breadth extreme, 27 ft. 8 in.; breadth for tonnage, 27 ft. 2 in.; breadth moulded, 26 ft. 6 in.; depth in the engine-room, 23 ft.; breadth in tons, 1210, 22-94 old measurement; date, 1847; new date.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINCHESTER, THURSDAY EVENING.—[From our own Correspondent.]—The infant royal family, who are in excellent health, have been taken out for their usual airing both this morning and in the afternoon. In the morning the Prince and Princess rode out on their favourite black pony, in the private grounds in the Horse Park. The Princess Lady Louisa was in attendance upon her Royal Highness—Her Majesty, accompanied by a notification which reached Windsor this morning from the late of Wight, will return to the Castle on Saturday; it is expected, to lunch on, as the arrangements were for the Court to leave Osborne House at nine o'clock on that morning. It is fully expected that her Majesty and her Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by a portion of the infant royal family, will again pay a visit to the Isle of Wight for a week or ten days, after the opening of the New Royal Exchange.—There has been a report during the past week that her Majesty will honour her Irish subjects with a visit before the close of the autumn; but we have the best authority for stating that there is not the least truth in the rumour.—The Hon. C. A. Murray, the respected Master of the Household, who has been usually indisposed at the Pavilion at Brighton for some weeks past, is, I am happy to state, so much improved in health as to be expected to resume his duties at Windsor Castle in the course of the ensuing week.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Monday at St. George's, Hanover-square, Anna Harriet Cardist, only daughter of the Rev. J. and Mrs. Sanderson, was married to the Hon. Frederick Paul Methuen, eldest son of Lord Methuen. The newly-married pair are passing the honeymoon at Grosvenor Park, Wiltshire.

Lord Ellenborough.—The late Governor-General of India arrived in London on Sunday last. The Government has conferred an earldom upon the noble Ex-Governor, and he has been granted by the title of Earl of Kentborough and Viscount Somerton. On Tuesday the noble earl visited the Duke of Wellington, at Apsley House, and was engaged for a lengthened period with the noble and gallant Duke. On leaving the Duke of Wellington's residence went to Sir Robert Peel in Whitehall gardens, and had a protracted audience.

DEATH OF THE DUCHESS OF MANTUANO.—We are sorry to state that the Duchess of Mantuano died suddenly at Blenheim Palace, on Saturday last. Her grace had only returned home the preceding evening, from a long visit to her sister, Lady Farnham, in Yorkshire. Her grace is known to have been long in a feeble state of health, but not the slightest apprehension was entertained by her medical advisers of her being quite equal to the journey. A sudden and unexpected change occurred on the Saturday; Dr. Wootton, of Oxford, was immediately called in, but her grace expired in the presence of the Duke and Lady Louisa Churchill the same evening. The Duchess was the eldest daughter of George, the eighth Earl of Galloway.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—Sir Robert Peel is expected to return to Whitehall-gardens on Monday next, from Brighton, and will remain some days in town before he rejoins his family at that watering place.

DEATH OF SIR SAMUEL HIGGINS.—Sir Samuel Higgins, who was secretary to the Royal Highness the late Duke of Gloucester, died at his residence, Chapel-street, Grosvenor-square, at five o'clock on Monday morning. Although Sir Samuel had been suffering some weeks from indifferent health, yet it was not supposed he was in anything like a critical state, for on the previous Wednesday he was at the Birmingham Railway terminus at Edgborough, to receive her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester. He was born in 1773.

The Earl and Countess of Essex have left Grosvenor Hall, the seat of Lord Brougham, where they had been paying a visit for nearly a fortnight. Lord and Lady Brougham are still at Grosvenor Hall, but the noble and learned baron is expected in Grafton-street, in the course of the ensuing week, on his way to the south of France.

FUNERAL OF LADY HEYTESBURY.

The mortal remains of her Excellency the late Baroness Heytesbury were conveyed on Friday evening from the Victoria Lodge, Phoenix Park, Dublin, to the Northwick-quay, where her Majesty's valet Mr. Metcalf, Esq., Butler, R.N., was in waiting to convey them to Dover.

The funeral procession consisted of a hearse, drawn by six horses. A mourning coach, drawn by four horses, in which were the Hon. Captain A'Court, brother to her Excellency; the Hon. William A'Court Holmes, M.P., son of the Lord Lieutenant; Colonel Bowles, Controller of the Household; and Mr. A'Court, Private Secretary. The procession left the Victoria Lodge at eight o'clock, and advanced along the North Circular-road in the most private manner to the place of interment. The hearse, on the coffin bore a casket, with the following inscription:—

 wife of
 The Right Honourable WILLIAM A' COURT,
 Baron Heytesbury, G.C.B., &c.
 Died
 October the Ninth, 1844, in her Sixty-first year.

The coffin was lowered by pulleys into the state cabin, the glazed roof of the cabin having been removed for the purpose, and all the mourners accompanied the remains on board, where they stopped for a short period.

The Hon. Captain A'Court and the son of the late Baroness were alone to accompany the body to Bristol, and soon after ten the hearse got under way, and sailed for her destination.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE OPENING OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—We are enabled to state, that the Queen has positively appointed Monday, the 26th inst., for the opening of the New Royal Exchange. Her Majesty will enter the City at Temple-bar at twelve o'clock. The Commissioners of the City for the metropolis have caused notices to be distributed, stating that no platforms or projections will be erected on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to the City, for the purpose of opening the New Royal Exchange.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—Deaths from all causes registered in the week ending Saturday, Oct. 12:—Males, 107; females, 111—total, 218. Weekly average:—Males, 483; females, 481—total, 964.

POSTPONED WARDS.—Two candidates have announced their intention of contesting the vacant aldermanic gown, viz., Mr. F. G. Moon, and Mr. Thomas Housfield. Mr. Salomons declined asking coming forward, as it is his intention to petition against the decision of the Court of Aldermen. Mr. Michael Seales was also solicited to stand, but has declined, expressing his intention to use his interest in behalf of Mr. Moon.

THE CORPORATION OF LONDON AND MR. DAVID SALOMONS.—A meeting of the Corporation of London took place on Monday, when the Town-clerk placed before Mr. Salomons the copy of the declaration, the omission to subscribe which was fatal to the election of Mr. Salomons for the ward of Aldgate nine years ago. Mr. Salomons requested the Court to postpone the matter, to allow him to take advice upon the subject. This the Court declined to do, and Mr. Salomons having thus formally refused, on conscientious grounds, to take the required oath, his election as Alderman of the Ward of Portsoken, was declared null and void by a majority of ten to six. Mr. Salomons protested against the proceedings, and declared his intention to appeal to the laws of the country in such way as he might be advised.

FIRE AT BLACKWALL.—On Thursday morning, between three and four o'clock, a fire, involving considerable destruction of property, broke out at the Britannia Tavern, Blackwall-stairs, which was not put under until the Britannia had been entirely consumed, and the Phoenix at East India Tavern, had been considerably damaged. Nothing is known of the origin of the calamity. The following is the official account of the damage done:—The Britannia Tavern, occupied by Mr. Taver, the whole contents destroyed; insured in the Phoenix Fire office. The Phoenix Tavern (Mr. Birchen), upper part of house destroyed, furniture damaged; insured in the Phoenix and Commercial offices. The Anchor Tavern (Mrs. Birchen), roof and furniture of upper floors consumed; insured in the Sun Fire-office. The India House Tavern (Damage), all destroyed; insured in the Hand-in-Hand office. The King's Arms Tavern (Mrs. Allen), building damaged, also furniture by removal; insured in the Union Fire-office. The George public-house (Mr. Emerson), furniture damaged by removal, and also building; insured in the Union Fire-office. The house of Mrs. Russell, front damaged, furniture also by removal; not insured. Next house, name unknown, like damage; not insured.

EXTRAORDINARY FRACAS IN THE COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—On Thursday, John Radden, of Chatham, came before Mr. Commissioner Evans for his interim order, which was opposed on the ground that he had fraudulently made away with his property, and remained upwards of six months in the Queen's Bench prison, but obtained his liberation by petitioning that Court. It was proved that his debts were more than £300, and that he was a trader at the time. Mr. Commissioner Evans said he had no jurisdiction in the case, and dismissed the petition. The solicitor said that the insolvent must go back to prison. A scene of indescribable uproar now took place, the insolvent, surrounded by several of his friends, insisted that the Commissioner had discharged him, and a regular fight ensued between the parties. The solicitor ran into the Court to ask for the Commissioner's advice, while Mr. Radden, the house registrar, called in several of the City police, and gave them instructions to clear the avenues of the Court. Mr. Commissioner Evans said, under the sixth section of the Act, the insolvent could be again arrested upon the judgment; but, as the solicitor was unprepared with a Sheriff's officer, or the necessary warrant, the Court could not assist him. Eventually the insolvent escaped, amidst the shouts of his party.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Letters from St. Petersburg of the 27th ult. announce the death of Count Alexander de Benckendorff, first vice-chancellor of the Emperor of Russia, and former Minister of Police, on board the war steamer Berislav, on his way back from Germany.

We learn from Parma that the theatre of the ancient city has just been discovered at a considerable depth in the earth, and in a remarkable state of preservation. The government has ordered researches to be made, and has purchased several houses which stand in the way of the operation.

The King of Prussia gave a superb fête on the 6th inst., at the Palace of Sans Souci, to which most of the distinguished foreigners, as well as the various delegates from the Zollverein now at Berlin, and the principal exhibitors at the national exposition, had the honour of receiving an invitation. On arriving at the palace the visitors were received with much affability by the King and Queen and Prince and Princess Wilhelm of Prussia.

A Berlin journal gives an account of an extensive robbery at Stockholm on the 27th ult. The office of the General Insurance Company were broken into, and private bills to the amount of 200,000 rix-dollars, and bank-notes to the amount of 117,000 rix-dollars, carried off.

Five tenders were presented for the contract for the rails of the first section of the Paris and Northern Railroad. These works were estimated at the maximum of 245,000*l.*, and the contract was awarded to M. Barthelemy St. Ange, at 8 per cent. below the sum.

An extraordinary trial for swindling took place last week before the Court of Assize for Paris. A person, named Rue de Maisey, and his wife, were charged with having obtained, by fraudulent means, more than 500,000 francs from different persons, of which, however, 450,000 francs were from a M. Goussier. Maisey was originally a captain in the army. The various persons swindled gave evidence on the trial, which lasted four days, and the prisoners being found guilty, Maisey was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment, with hard labour, and his wife to five years of the same punishment, and both to stand in the pillory.

In the borough of Finsbury Registration Court, on Wednesday, the revising barrister, Mr. Moylan, imposed a fine of 10*l.* upon the overseers of the parish of St. Luke, for omitting the names of two persons from the list of voters for the borough of Finsbury.

We have already stated that Mrs. Nesbitt was about to be married to Sir William Boothby, Bart., Receiver-General of Customs. The ceremony took place at St. Mary's chapel, Fulham, on Monday. Sir William, who is in his 70th year, in addition to holding a very lucrative situation under Government, possesses estates in Derbyshire and other counties, and also, it is stated, in Ireland. The bride is but in her 30th year, and has scarcely attained the age of some of Sir William's daughters by a former marriage. The ceremony excited much interest in the neighbourhood. Sir William is a remarkably fine looking man for his age.

A woman, named Leclerc, has just expired at Harinnes, (Belgium) aged 101. She was three years old when the famous battle of Fontenoy took place.

The New Orleans Courier of the 16th confirms the news of the death of Madame Lopez Santa Anna, wife of the President of Mexico, on the 22nd ult., of a heart complaint. Her remains, in compliance with her dying wish, were taken to Alarado, the place of her birth, for interment.

A letter from Orléans, in the Emancipation of Toulouse, gives the following account of the affair of Lieut. Rose:—"The commandant of the guardship sent a midshipman to invite the English officer to come on board. At first he refused, but afterwards said he should yield to superior force, and offered his sword to the midshipman, who received it without having any orders, and the officer came as a prisoner. After explanations, the English officer was sent to his own ship, and the midshipman put under arrest for having exceeded his orders. The chief of the staff afterwards went on board the English sloop to make apologies."

The Cadiz Eco del Comercio states that an attempt has been made at Seville to assassinate General Schelly, the Captain General of the province. General Schelly was entering his own house, at midnight, when a pistol was fired at him. Fortunately the shot missed both him and the aide-de-camp who accompanied him. The assassin escaped.

The enraged woman seized a knife and stabbed him to the heart. He had just time to say to his murderers—"You have for a long time threatened to kill me, and you have done it at last." Charrier then fell dead, leaving four unprotected orphans. The woman was immediately arrested.

The feeling lately evinced to reduce the hours of business of breadstuffs and other trades, to enable the assistants to obtain some relaxation, is becoming pretty general, and has extended itself to many of the principal towns in the country.

IRELAND.

O'CONNELL'S MANIFESTO.—Another very lengthy letter from Mr. O'Connell was read at the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday. The letter commences with congratulations on the recent decision of the House of Lords, and Mr. O'Connell then argues in favour of Repeal. Considerable space is then devoted to an argument to prove that the Catholics do not desire any undue ascendancy. A comparison is then drawn between simple Repeal and Federalism, and this is the most remarkable part of the document, as it appears from it, that in spite of Mr. O'Connell's declarations in support of Repeal, he prefers Federalism. Mr. O'Connell says:—"For my own part, I will own, that since I have come to contemplate the specific differences, such as they are, between 'simple Repeal' and 'Federalism,' I do at present feel a preference for the federal plan, as tending more to the utility of Ireland and to the maintenance of the connexion with England than the mode of simple Repeal. But I must either deliberately propose or deliberately adopt from some other person a plan of federal union, before I bind myself to the opinion I now entertain." Mr. O'Connell, having made this declaration, invites his countrymen of all classes to propound their plans, and amicably and candidly discuss the respective points of a "Federalist" or "simple Repeal" connexion with Great Britain. The letter was ordered to be entered on the minutes. The rent for the week did not exceed 2400*l.*

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF MR. HAMPTON'S BALLOON.—Mr. Hampton, the celebrated aeronaut, made an ascent on Monday afternoon from the Portobello-park, Dublin, the balloon passing over the city in a north-easterly direction. When in the neighbourhood of the North Strand, it was observed descending with great rapidity, and notwithstanding all Mr. Hampton's exertions, it continued to do so, until it came into collision with the top of a house, and struck the chimney, which was thrown down; the balloon, at the same time, exploding, by some sparks from the fire, he was thrown to the ground with great violence, but happily was not much hurt. He was removed on a car as soon as possible. The balloon was totally destroyed. A description of Mr. Hampton's balloon, with three engravings, appeared in No. 131 of our Journal.

ANOTHER SHOCKING MURDER.—A man named James Dunne, of Seaford, three miles from Carriek-on-Shannon, was waylaid and most barbarously murdered on Monday night last, within a few yards of his own house, and robbed of 27*l.* part of which he had that day received for butter in the town of Boyle, county of Roscommon. His throat was cut in three places; his nose, breast, and other parts of his body deeply wounded by some sharp weapon, and his teeth broken, so that from the mangled condition of the remains it was frightful to look at him. An inquest was held on Tuesday, and a verdict of Wilful Murder returned against some persons whose names are unknown.

ATROCIOUS MURDER IN CON.—On Sunday night, the 6th inst., a most diabolical outrage was committed on the lands of Kishelton, in the vicinity of Mitchelstown, on a family of the name of M'Eligot. James M'Eligot, the head of this family, is caretaker to William Johnson, Esq., formerly of Mitchelstown. About a year and a half ago Mr. Johnson found it necessary to evict one of his tenants for non-payment of rent, and as he knew M'Eligot to be honest and industrious, he gave him this small farm. The former tenant, some short time since, threatened M'Eligot for taking the land. It is said likewise that Mr. Johnson found it necessary to serve ejectment processes upon some of his tenants, and that M'Eligot was to be his principal witness at the Fermoy sessions, where they were to be tried. A gang of armed ruffians entered his dwelling on Sunday night about seven o'clock, and without giving him the slightest notice, fell upon him and fractured his skull, and not only left him apparently dead, but likewise used every member of his family, six in number, as the most brutal manner, beating them with the butt-ends of their guns. The son died from the effects of the wounds he received about four o'clock next morning. M'Eligot's wife and three daughters were likewise apparently dead. However, it is hoped that himself and two of the girls will recover, but little hopes are entertained of his wife, and none of one of his daughters.

MURDER IN KILKENNY.—A man, named Matthew Brennan, was murdered a few days ago at Colcullen, in the county Kilkenny. His throat was cut, several wounds inflicted upon his body, and his hands lacerated as if a knife had been drawn through them while trying to defend himself. The supposed cause of his murder is that Brennan rented a farm for the past year and a half, from which the former tenants were ejected. A verdict of "Wilful Murder" against persons unknown was returned by the coroner's jury.

TWO BRUTAL MURDERS IN TIPPERARY.

In our last we briefly mentioned the murder of a man named Maxwell, a driver or care-taker on the property of Mr. Lonsdale, near Banbury. Another murder has since been committed on the person of a man named Cleary, the wood-ranger of Mr. Carden, of the same locality.

Maxwell, it appears, was engaged in prayer on his knees, in his own house, and about retiring to rest, when he was shot through the body and killed. This poor man, it appears, was murdered because he had been in the habit of serving law processes.

Maxwell had seized upon a defaulting tenant, named Tierney, whose effects were to be sold on last Thursday for non-payment of rent. The deceased was also bound to prosecute a man named Tracer, at the next Thurles quarter sessions, for assaulting a person named Patrick Doyle.

The Dublin Gazette contains a proclamation from the Lord Lieutenant, offering a reward of 200*l.* for the discovery of the murderers of David Maxwell. The reward to be paid by Sir William Lytton, resident magistrate at Shinrone.

Cleary had been engaged in serving law processes on the tenants on the Harrold estate, and had accompanied Mr. Carden, on one of his recent visits to the tenantry. He was shot, it appears, on Tuesday week, having been missing since then—but nothing was known of his most wretched fate till Wednesday, when he was discovered dead near the wood of Harrold. He must have been engaged in his usual business at the moment selected for depriving him of life—going through the wood, unattended and alone. It appears he was speaking to Mr. Carden's gardener about two or three o'clock, on Tuesday, after which he was not heard of till found as above stated. He served notices to quit on some of the tenants a few days before. The tenants, we are informed, owed no rent, nor would any of them till the 1st of November. To show the apprehensions of danger under which the wretched man laboured, we may mention that he carried a double-barrelled gun and a case of pistols; he was deprived of these arms by the persons or persons by whom he was murdered. His head was shockingly mutilated, broken in both in front and behind. The greatest discontent has prevailed for a considerable time amongst the tenantry on this property. Nothing can equal the dissatisfaction they entertained at the prospect of being dispossessed of their holdings, and to this it is said the murder is attributed.

POLICE.

APPRAIL IN REGENT-STREET.—On Saturday afternoon a riot of a somewhat violent description took place in Regent-street, during which several of the police were assaulted, and a soldier rescued who had been given into their custody. The police succeeded in taking three persons into custody who were alleged to have been amongst the most active in creating the disturbance, and in assaulting the constables. On Monday the defendants were charged with the offence at Marlborough-street police-office. The first person gave his name John Conway, law student, 35, George-street, Regent-square; but this description is presumed not to be exactly correct. He was hailed out by the Earl of Cardigan and the Hon. Charles Greville, captains in the Guards. The other defendants were Edward Skinner, butler, 25, Nidmouthe-street, and William Hibell, constable, 4, Great Russell-street. From the evidence of police constables Boyce, C 161, Skinner, C 137, Ward, C 183, and Adams, C 52, it appeared that a soldier went into the White Horse Tavern, Regent-street, on Saturday afternoon, in a state of intoxication, and on being refused to be served with more drink, he became very disorderly, assaulted the servants, damaged the landlord's property, and when ejected from the house, broke a window pane. The police were sent for to take the soldier into custody, but when constable Boyce came to the spot the soldier refused to go to the station house, and swore he would "smash" any policeman who should attempt to take him. A mob by this time had collected, and when more constables made their appearance the mob took the part of the soldier, and urged him to resist the lawful authorities. The police, however, proceeded to do their duty by laying hold of the soldier; but they were not only prevented from taking him into custody by the mob, but were assaulted by several persons, and ultimately the soldier was rescued from them. The police pursued the soldier, and again laid hold of him, but the constables were again buffed, and ultimately some gentlemen, who were actively opposing the police, got the soldier into a cab, and caused him to be driven away to his barracks. During the affray, police-constables Boyce and Ward proved that they were struck by Conway with a stick case, and that Conway excited the mob to rescue the soldier, and also encouraged the soldier to resist the police. All the constables deposed to the fact of hearing Conway make use of expressions calculated to excite the mob against them. The constables further said, there were above five or six hundred persons at one period collected together. Skinner pushed against the police and attempted to obstruct them in the execution of their duty. The defendant Hibell also obstructed the constables as they were in pursuit of their rescued prisoner. Three witnesses were called to corroborate the evidence of the police. The defence of Conway was, that he saw a mob of persons in Regent-street, and so going to the spot he perceived a soldier struggling with several of the police. As the police appeared to use more than necessary violence, he interfered in the soldier's behalf; but he declared that he neither struck a police constable, nor did he use language to the mob calculated to incite them to ill-use the police or to attempt the rescue of the soldier.—Skinner, in defence, said he saw the soldier enter the tavern, and witnessed his bad conduct afterwards. He went out to look for a constable, and so far from obstructing or assaulting the police, he rendered them all the aid in his power. The soldier, however, resisted, and when the police seized him by the stick and attempted to strangle him, he certainly did resist. Another constable, C 52, also drew his staff, and struck the soldier over the head and body.—Hibell denied having either obstructed or assaulted the police in any way.—Mr. Malby was of opinion that the defendants had more or less assaulted the constables and obstructed them in the execution of their duty, and that they had further assisted in completely rescuing the soldier from the constables. For the two assaults committed by Conway on the constables he should incur a fine of 25*l.* each, and of 25*l.* additional for assisting to rescue the soldier. He should fine Skinner 25*l.* for the assault on the police, and Hibell 40*l.* The fines, it is said, were all paid by the defendant Conway.—On Tuesday the individual whose conduct originally led to the assault was examined at the above office; his name is Benjamin Cox, a private in the second battalion of Coldstream Guards. He was charged with having wilfully broken a square of glass at the White Horse Tavern, Regent-street; with having assaulted the waiter and the cook; and also with having resisted and assaulted the police in the execution of their duty. The prisoner had entered the house drunk, and in attempting to eject him he committed the assaults. He was fined 25*l.* for the assaults on the servants, and 25*l.* for assaults on the police, or two months' hard labour. [We are unwilling to blame magisterial decisions upon slight grounds, but some suspicion must always attach to cases where the defendants appear to be gentlemen, and are allowed to expiate an offence by a fine. Daily instances occur where poor men are sent to prison or the treadmill for committing assaults, and if the upper classes will offend against the laws, or commit breaches of the peace, we do not see why a distinction should be made. Indeed, if there be a difference, they should be visited with more severity, for men of education and good position in society ought to set an example to those beneath them.]

A FATHER CHARGED WITH ROBBERY BY HIS SON.—At Union Hall, on Wednesday, William Brockopp, formerly an extensive grocer and tea-dealer, in Blackman-street, was brought before Mr. Trill, on the extraordinary charge of stealing a gold pin, a gold ring, and a portfolio, the property of William Brockopp, his son. The complainant, a young man, stated that the prisoner was his father, and that about six months ago the latter had a box in his possession belonging to him (the son) containing, amongst other articles, a gold pin, a ring, and a portfolio; that on a recent occasion he (the son) had the box delivered up to him, from which he missed the jewellery articles above specified, and that the prisoner having refused to give him an account of what had become of them, he made inquiries at the pawnbrokers' shops, and found that they were pledged at Mr. Palmer's shop by the prisoner, who, however, refused to restore them, and that in consequence of the refusal he gave him into custody that day. The complainant added that he had purchased the articles with money that he had earned himself while in a situation. The accused said, that he had been at considerable expense in his son's education; that he had also advanced him some of money from time to time, and that the articles he now charged him with stealing were purchased with part of the money. He admitted having pledged the gold pin, and appealed to the magistrate whether, his son being a minor, he was justified in giving him into custody, putting out of the question his being his parent?—Mr. Trill said that although the accused was the father of the complainant, still he had no right to convert the articles to his use without his consent. The magistrate then inquired if the portfolio was also pledged without his sanction?—The complainant replied in the affirmative.—The accused, however, denied that the portfolio belonged to his son, the latter having made it a present to his sister; and that, if he (the prisoner) was not mistaken, the magistrate would perceive the fact inscribed in writing in the portfolio.—Mr. Trill examined the inside of the portfolio, and found it written down that it was presented by William Brockopp, jun., to his sister, as reported by the accused. The magistrate, exhibiting the writing to the complainant, asked him if it was his?—The complainant having examined the characters, after a great deal of hesitation, said that he had every reason to believe it was not his handwriting.—The accused said, that he was ready to make oath it was his son's writing, although he now denied it.—The complainant, however, still declared it was not, and added that he was willing to put the portfolio out of the charge altogether, and proceed on those of the gold pin and the ring. He, however, was not desirous of pressing too hard against the accused, if he restored him the property.—The accused said that the complainant had disgraced himself by the harsh step he had adopted towards him, his parent, and that his mother was in attendance to prove the fact of the portfolio being given by the complainant to his sister.—Mr. Trill could not help remarking, that it was an extraordinary proceeding altogether for a son to give his father into custody, and have him brought up to the bar of a police-court under such circumstances. The charge, however, of illegally pledging the ring and pin by the accused being made out, by the production of the articles by the pawnbroker, and his identity as the pawnbroker being proved, he should call on the accused to enter into his recognisance to appear on a future day. The accused having entered into the requisite surety was then set at large, and he left the court accompanied by his wife, a lady-like looking woman, who appeared to be absorbed in grief at the circumstance of her son giving his father into custody on such a charge.

A MAN CHARGED WITH DROWNING HIS WIFE.—At Marlborough-street on Tuesday, Michael Lee, alias Molliey, a labourer, between 40 and 50 years of age, was charged with having murdered his wife, Ann Lee, by drowning her in the Paddington Canal. Constable Rose, 15 D: At three o'clock on Monday, as I was passing Northumberland-street, I saw a great crowd round the workhouse door, and on inquiring what was the matter, I was informed that there was a man there who had been making away with his wife. I went inside, and the prisoner was given into my custody. He told me that he had not spoken to her (his wife) for the last three months, during which time they had lived apart. Rose added that the deceased had not been near her home since last Sunday night week, and he had not, as yet, had time to get his wife together, who, would, he believed, be able to prove that she and the prisoner were, on the evening of the day in question, seen drinking together, and afterwards quaffing at Maria Hill, a short distance from where the body was found. Mr. Russell remarked that he had heard quite enough to justify him in detaining the prisoner, and desired the officers to get to get all the evidence they could for the coroner's inquest. The prisoner, on being asked if he wished to say anything on the charge of having murdered his wife by drowning her, replied, "I know nothing about it; I have seen nothing of her." The prisoner was remanded. (On Wednesday Mr. Mills held an inquest at the Ivy Tree Arms, on the body of the deceased woman Lee. The accused was brought from the station-house to the inquest-room, in order that he might hear the evidence adduced. After several witnesses had been examined, the coroner adjourned the inquiry for a post mortem examination, and for further evidence. On Thursday afternoon this protracted investigation was resumed. The jury returned a verdict, "That deceased was found drowned; but how she came into the water there was no evidence to show;" with a request, however, that the police would renew their inquiries.)

HIGHWAY ROBBERY NEAR THE VICTORIA THEATRE.—At Union Hall on Wednesday two powerful-looking young fellows, named Charles Byford and George Williams, alias Lardon, were charged with robbing Mr. Charles Powrie, a grocer and cheese-monger, of Cambridge, of a knife and comb. Powrie stated that about eleven o'clock on the previous night he was passing the Victoria Theatre, in the Waterloo-road, and when near the Victoria Tavern he was accosted by Byford, who asked him whether his name was Jones. He replied in the affirmative, thinking that it was merely a lark, when, to his surprise, Byford seized his hands, while Williams put his hand in his belt and pocket, which fortunately contained only his comb and knife. They then wanted him to enter the public-house and partake of a pot of beer, which he declined. They then attempted to have a dip in his other pockets, when he broke away from them and went in search of a policeman. He met 140 L in Welbeck-street, to whom he related the circumstances; they then returned to the public-house, when he gave the prisoners into custody. He informed the magistrates that if they had succeeded in emptying his right hand pocket, they would have had a good haul, as he had twenty sovereigns deposited there.—Byford denied ever seeing the prisoner before. Williams said that he was in the public-house, waiting for a gentleman, when the policeman entered and took him into custody.—Mr. Powrie said that the latter prisoner was the man that put his hand in his pocket, and Byford held his hands. He was quite certain they were the men. The prisoners were remanded to enable the officer to make enquiries about them.

ALLEGED MURDER.—On Tuesday a young man, respectfully called, who gave his name as Thomas Slides, but which is supposed not to be his real name, was charged at Bow-st. with the murder of Othello Garratt. It appeared that on the 1st of last month a scuffle took place between the prisoner and the deceased on the steps leading to the Salisbury Arms, Durham-street, Strand. The prisoner seized the deceased with both hands by the collar, and threw him violently down backwards, and fell on the top of him. The deceased fell with his head on the steps. The prisoner said to the deceased, "There, what do you think of that?" and he went into the Salisbury Arms. The deceased was then lying on the ground. He was quite insensible. He died on Wednesday afternoon from concussion of the brain. The prisoner was fully committed to Newgate for the wilful murder.

POSTSCRIPT.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE CITY.

The following are the arrangements made up to the present time for the reception of her Majesty at the Royal Exchange, on the 25th instant.

As the day approaches, the work of the interior has been proceeded with with increased activity, so that the entire range of apartments at Lloyd's, and the Royal Exchange and London Assurance Companies, may be in as forward a state of completion as possible by that period.

The subscription-room belonging to Lloyd's is completed, all but fitting up those places where decoration is required, and for that purpose workmen have commenced the embellishments, which are to be of a superb description. It is in this room that the grand entertainment is to be held out; a cross table is to be placed on a raised flooring on the south end of the room, at which her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the principal guests, are to be seated. These extended tables are to be formed from north to south, and the leading visitors having the honour of an invitation, are the Lord Mayor, the members of the Royal Exchange and Graham Trust Companies, the Aldermen and Common Councilmen of the City, and chief civil officers, are there to be accommodated.

We understand that their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, are invited to grace the ceremony by their presence at the entertainment. The Duke of Wellington has engaged to meet the Queen and Sir Robert Peel, and several other members of the Government are likewise to attend. The Earl of Jersey, as Master of the Horse; the Lord Chamberlain, Karl Delavay; and Lord Steward, the Earl of Liverpool, are to be amongst the officers of the royal household who will attend on the Sovereign in their official capacity. Most of the foreign ministers are to be invited, also the Lord Chancellor and Judges.

It is ascertained that sufficient space can be afforded at these tables for 250 persons.

In the commercial room, a spacious and noble apartment ranging the whole extent east to west of the north side of the merchants' area, an entertainment is to be supplied for four hundred, and in the quadrangle or quadrangle of merchants' area a hundred are to be accommodated.

The Lord Mayor and civic dignitaries are to be in waiting at Temple-bar, at twelve o'clock precisely, so that due homage may be paid to the Queen on her Majesty's entrance of the City of London. On the rise and royal procession reaching the portico of the Exchange, the members of the committee, headed by the chairman, are to await her Majesty, who, on descending from the royal carriage, will be formally received by these gentlemen.

At the announcement of the banquet, appointed, we understand, for two o'clock, her Majesty passes from that private room, by a temporary doorway, to the Reading and Map Room of Lloyd's, at the south-east corner, which communicates with the Subscription Room, as the apartment devoted to the use of the banquet.

The Honourable Artillery Company have received orders from Sir James Graham to attend at the Royal Exchange to join the guard of honour to her Majesty.

A Court of Common Council was held yesterday, at which it was agreed, by acclamation, to present an address to her Majesty upon her auspicious visit to the city, to be presented at the opening of the New Royal Exchange. It was understood, that as the Mercers' Company were joined with the corporation in raising that magnificent building, they should be duly recognised in the address. At the same Court it was also agreed, that the names of Louis Philippe to the address recently presented to him by the Corporation, should be inserted upon the records of the Court, and that steps should be taken by the committee to embody in and otherwise record the answer, and that a copy, executed in such manner as to the committee appeared to be most eligible, should be transmitted to every member of the Court.

On the occasion of her Majesty's visit to the City, the Mansion-house, East India House, the Halls of the several Companies, Clubs, &c., will be brilliantly illuminated.

WESTMINSTER REGISTRATION.—The proceedings at the Westminster Registration Court terminated yesterday. The result is a majority of 34 for the Conservatives.

PURSESNIP OF FRAUDULENT BANKRUPTS.—At the Exeter Bankruptcy Court on Thursday, the Commissioners committed to prison a bankrupt named Hutton, a lime burner, for giving prevaricating answers. A henchman, named Goodenough, late of Newgate, had the consideration of his application for a certificate adjourned for four years, from the date of the fiat, in consequence of attempted fraud.

ATTEMPTED ROBBERY OF JEWELS AT BRISTOL.—A German named Gust Shulte-Johnson, has been committed by the magistrates of Bristol, on a charge of attempting to swindle Mr. Cochrane, a jeweller, of a diamond brooch, value 225*l.* guineas, and some other value in articles of jewellery. He pretended they were ordered by the Countess Revoltzki, who was staying at the York Hotel. When Mr. Cochrane took them home, the prisoner requested him to wait while he went to write to the Countess, who was ill, but Mr. Cochrane becoming suspicious, after waiting a few minutes, opened the room door and saw the prisoner attempting to escape. Mr. Cochrane seized him, and the result was as above stated.

DEATH FROM DRINKING.—Mr. Walker held yesterday an inquest on the body of a lady who had been found dead in her house at Hammer-smith, where, while lived by herself. Her husband, a surgeon, said, that soon after their marriage he had found her dreadfully addicted to drinking, and they had in consequence separated. A girl, who had been her only attendant for some time, said she was constantly drinking spirits, and would send out for a quinine perhaps a dozen times a day! The verdict was, "Died from excessive drinking of ardent spirits."

FOREIGN.

ACCIDENT TO THE PRINCE OF PRUSSIA.—The Prussian Gazette says, that the Prince of Prussia, while inspecting some buildings at Bismarck, fell, and broke both the bones of his right arm, two inches above the wrist. The fracture was immediately reduced, and his royal highness was, at the date of this account, October 16th, doing well.

THE BRAZILIAN TREATY.—The Minister has arrived from Rio Janeiro, which she left on the 15th of August, with the long-looked-for Brazil treaty. The reduction of duties is not so much an act as the advocates of free trade desire; but the amount of the duties to be charged on the various articles of import has attracted much less notice amongst the merchants in the city than the following clauses, giving certain powers to the executive:—"The Government is authorized to impose upon the merchandise of any country in which the produce of Brazil is liable to a higher duty than similar produce of other countries, an additional duty, so as to neutralize the ill effects of the difference of duty upon Brazil produce. Such additional duty to cease when the increased duty upon Brazil produce shall be abolished. Again, a similar differential duty will be charged upon the merchandise of any country in which the produce of Brazil is charged with a higher duty, if imported in foreign vessels, than in national bottoms."

The King's Bed Chamber.

This room, better known to visitors of the Castle as the Queen's closet, presented a beautiful specimen of appropriate embellishment. The prevailing colour in the room was light blue, with the picture frames silvered instead of gilded, to harmonize with the general tone. This we think to have been in excellent taste; but the effect was somewhat marred by a carpet, of a pattern too large and florid, both in colour and design, to accord with the rest of the arrangements. The mantle piece is of white marble; the fire place, fenders, &c., of polished steel, with massive standards of bright chased brass, having a most elegant effect. But, as we last week gave some detail of the furniture of this room, we shall not do more now, than enumerate the principal pictures of the precious collection which adorn the walls, and which, we believe, were a source of much and constant gratification to his Majesty. Holbein's "Henry VIII.," "Edward VI.," and the "Duke of Norfolk," bearing his double wands of office, as Lord Treasurer and Lord Steward; "A Man's Head," by Leonardo da Vinci; "Titian and Ariadne," by Titian; "Infant Christ," by Carlo Maratti; "St. John," by Gerardino; "Virgin and Child," by Vandyke (placed on the left of the King's pillow); "Holy Family," by Sebastian del Pombio (on the right of the King's pillow); two splendid "Landscapes," by Claude; "Portrait of Erasmus," by George Peck; "A Head," by Gerard Douw; and others by Dutch masters, of great interest and value.

The smaller decorations of the room consisted of vases of Lapis Lazuli, magnificent pieces of floral porcelain, and various costly bronzes, amongst which one of Henry IV. was conspicuous.

INVESTITURE OF THE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

On Friday afternoon, at two o'clock, a guard of honour, commanded by Lieut.-Colonel Moncreiff, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, marched into the Quadrangle, and took up its station beneath the window of the Guard Chamber, and directly opposite to the Grand Entrance to the State Apartments.

The following members of the Hon. Corps of Gentlemen at Arms were stationed as a guard of honour at the door of the King of the French's apartments:—T. G. Wright, A. Perkins, H. L. Ewart, and K. C. Murray, Esquires. The remainder of the Honourable Corps were stationed in the Blue Chamber, forming a double line through which the Knights proceeded to the Throne-room, in which were stationed G. Platt and G. Denne, Esqrs., two of the Gentlemen at Arms.

The Queen, being seated on a chair of state, and the Knights Companions having taken their respective places at the table, the Chancellor of the Order, the Bishop of Oxford, signified, by her Majesty's command, the Sovereign's royal will and pleasure, that Louis Philippe, the King of the French, should be elected into the Most Noble Order.

The Knight Companions then proceeded to the election, and the suffrages having been collected by the Chancellor, were by the Lord Bishop presented to the Sovereign, who commanded his lordship to declare that his Majesty Louis Philippe, King of the French, had been elected a Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

The King of the French was then conducted from an adjoining apartment into the Chapter-room by their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge.

The ceremony represented in the cut takes place immediately before the opening of the Chapter, when the Garter, with the Knight Companions, attend the door of the chamber, and pray to be admitted. Prince Albert, as the Senior Cambridge, preceded by Garter King of Arms, Sir Charles Young, bearing the ensigns of the Order upon a crimson velvet cushion, and by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Sir Augustus Clifford. Upon entering the Chapter-room, his Majesty was received by the Sovereign and the Knight Companions, standing, and placed in a chair of state on the right hand of the Sovereign. Her Majesty then announced to the King of the French that his Majesty had been duly elected a Knight of the Most Noble Order.

Garter, upon his knee, then presented the garter to her Majesty. The Sovereign, who was assisted by Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge, buckled it on the left knee of the King, the Chancellor pronouncing the usual admonition.

Garter next presented, in like manner, the Riband and George, when her Majesty, assisted as before, placed these ensigns over the left shoulder of the King, the Chancellor pronouncing the admonition. The Sovereign then gave the accolade to the King of the French, when his Majesty received the congratulations of the Knight Companions present.

The Chapter being ended, Garter, by her Majesty's command, again called over the Knight Companions, who with the Officers of the Order, then retired from the presence of the Sovereign with the usual reverence.

Her Majesty, on retiring from the chapter-room, took the arm of the King of the French (paying his Majesty the highest compliment ever conferred upon a newly-created Knight of the Order), and proceeded with the King to the door of his apartment, and there left his Majesty, proceeding thence, attended by the lady, maids of honour, &c., in waiting, to her own room on the south side of the palace.

See, and at the conclusion of the investiture, the band of the Scots Fusilier Guards, stationed in the Quadrangle, played several favourite airs from the compositions of Rossini, Beethoven, Weber, &c.

The jewellery worn by the Marquis of Westminster was of the most superb character. In the centre of his lordship's badge was the celebrated Arcot diamond. His lordship's sword also displayed a massive diamond, one of the largest in the world, weighing 66 carats.

The Engraving in this page represents

The Chapter of the Garter—Enthronization of the Queen, as the Sovereign of the Order.

The Throne is of comparatively small size, and of simple structure and decoration; the hangings are of blue velvet, decked with gold; it stands on the dais of the Garter-chamber, and is regarded, formally, as "The Throne of Edward III.," the founder of the Order. The view from it is very imposing, as it looks across the length of the chamber into the Grand Reception-room

HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL AT COWES.

Her Majesty and her Royal Consort arrived at Cowes at eleven o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, accompanied by Lady Gainsborough, the Lady in Waiting, and Lord Liverpool, the Lord Steward, and immediately departed for Osborne House, distant nearly two miles from the landing place. The royal yacht, conveying Her Majesty and her Royal Consort to the Isle of Wight, anchored in the Cowes roads at a quarter before eleven o'clock, but a heavy shower of rain coming on at the moment, Her Majesty took shelter in the saloon on the quarter-deck. After a delay of twenty minutes, the sun shone out again brightly, when Her Majesty descended into the royal barge, accompanied by her Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the noble persons already mentioned, with Lord Adolphus Fitz-Clarence, who acted as steersman. Her Majesty was saluted with a discharge of artillery from the Solent battery and from several of the yachts anchored in the road, and on her descent on opposite the Medina Hotel, where a royal carriage was in waiting to convey her Majesty to her new home, she was received by an immense multitude of people who had assembled to greet her arrival, with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of loyalty. Her Majesty and her Royal Highness looked perfectly free from fatigue or anxiety, and graciously acknowledged the greetings with which they were hailed.

Shortly after the departure of the King of the French from Gosport on Monday, her Majesty and Prince Albert stepped on board the royal yacht from the state barge, which conveyed her Majesty and the Prince from the Clarence yard. At this moment the scene was truly beautiful and picturesque, every portion of the royal yacht having suddenly shot forth, as if by magic, into one dazzling blaze of blue sails.

Amongst the most distinguished of the private facilities was the dinner given by the Lieutenant Governor of the garrison, Major-General Sir Hercules Pakenham, and Lady Pakenham, who had for a guest Sir Henry Pottinger. This gallant personage arrived at the George Hotel, Portsmouth, on Sunday afternoon, accompanied by Colonel Malcolm, from China, and has been since waited on by the principal officers of the garrison, and several of the nobility.

After Sir Henry's return to his hotel, from Sir Hercules and Lady Pakenham's dinner-party, he was waited on, about twelve o'clock, by the French Admiral, Baron de la Suse. The interview between the gallant officers lasted for nearly half an hour, and at its conclusion the French Admiral departed from the George, in a coach, accompanied by Lieutenant Chamberlain, commander of her Majesty's steamer, the Dwarf, and the English pilot. In a few minutes more Monsieur de la Suse had taken farewell of Portsmouth, and, seated in his barge, was seen flying towards the Gomer, at Spithead, as fast as sixteen lusty oars could speed him on his way.

Never, perhaps, was there a more sublime spectacle presented to the human eye than at the moment of her Majesty's arrival, when the guns of the French and English men-of-war at Spithead opened their brazen throats to bid her welcome. For some time previously a dense mass of clouds had descended, and hovered over the scene as far as the eye could reach, shutting out completely all trace of the horizon, and investing the shipping with a dense funeral gloom, in which their outlines were entirely lost, and nothing was seen but the angry foam dashing against their sides. At this moment the French men-of-war poured forth whole broadsides (their usual manner of saluting) with startling effect. For an instant the flashes from the guns gave a brilliant sparkle to the scene; but, in a moment more, the heavens sent forth their forked lightnings, followed by a dreadful peal of thunder. During the storm her Majesty preserved her usual equanimity. The passing of the two sovereigns a few hours afterwards was exceedingly affectionate, her Majesty evincing considerable distress at the prolonged fatigue which her Majesty the King of the French would be obliged to undergo by his journey to Dover. Shortly before midnight it was known that it was her Majesty's intention to visit the Gomer French steamer, at Spithead, on her way to the Isle of Wight, and this no doubt accelerated Admiral La Suse's departure from shore. At a quarter to seven o'clock a number of signal flags were hoisted on the Royal yacht, evidently communicating with the fleet at Spithead. Immediately afterwards her Majesty's steamer the Comet left her moorings, and took up a position right ahead of the Royal yacht, and in the twinkling of an eye all the vessels in the harbour, which a moment before showed nothing but bare ropes and poles, were suddenly decorated with flags. At eight o'clock the Royal yacht cast off her moorings, and as she got weigh upon her the Victory manned her yards and saluted. Previously to the yacht getting under weigh the Admiralty barge, with the Lords of the Admiralty, Sir George Cockburn, Admiral Howden, and the Hon. Mr. Greville, went on board to pay their respects to her Majesty, and remained on board when the yacht proceeded to Spithead.

When her Majesty's yacht neared that of his Majesty the King of the French, the engines were stopped, and notwithstanding the wind had freshened since her departure from the harbour, her Majesty and Prince Albert went on board La Gomer, accompanied by Lady Gainsborough, and Lord Liverpool and the Lords of the Admiralty. Her Majesty was received on board by Vice-Admiral Baron de la Suse, Captain Goulin, and other officers of the ship, who were assembled on the quarter deck. The royal standard was hoisted on board the Gomer, and saluted by the French ships. Her Majesty, during her progress through the magnificent apartments, repeatedly expressed her delight in the French admiral as delighted in the highest degree with the admirable tact displayed in their arrangement, with the splendour of the salon ennoblé, and the exquisite taste which pervaded the details, as well as those of the minutest description. But her Majesty did not confine her visit to the state apartments and those of the officers, for returning to the deck, she went right "forward," and appeared to feel scarcely less interest in inspecting the part of the vessel occupied by the common sailors. Her Majesty also stood some time at one end of the vessel, and examined with much interest its spacious deck, and the extreme cleanliness and order which prevailed upon it. Her Majesty, leaning on the arm of the French admiral, with Prince Albert and suite, paced up and down the deck for some time, while the band played our National Anthem, and several of their own favourite tunes, and then descended to the state cabin, where a déjeuner à la fourchette was provided for her by the French admiral, of the most recherché description. Her Majesty sat at the head of the table, supported on her right by Prince Albert, and on the left by the French admiral. The four senior captains of the French squadron—namely, Commander Laurencie, chef d'état-major; Captain Grab, of the Infatigable; Captain Hérois, of the Belle Poule; and Commander Goulin, of the Gomer. The Duc d'Yarouct, who came over on board La Reine Amélie, which is commanded by his son, and also Lady Gainsborough and the officers in her Majesty's suite, were likewise honoured by an invitation to partake of the déjeuner with her Majesty. On rising to leave the table, her Majesty, speaking in French, proposed "The Health of his Majesty King Louis Philippe," which was drunk the toast being previously acknowledged by a profound inclination of the head by all present. Shortly afterwards her Majesty ordered her barge, and the same honours being rendered to her on deck and aloft as upon her arrival, descended to it, accompanied to the bottom of the ladder by the French admiral.

When the Queen left the Gomer, the French men-of-war thundered forth their broadside salutes; and as soon as the standard was hoisted on board the Victoria and Albert, the English ships commenced their salutes. The yacht then proceeded with her Majesty on her course to the Cowes Roads.

Cowes, Wednesday.—At one o'clock this afternoon, her Majesty the Queen, accompanied by Lady Gainsborough, took a carriage driving to the grounds around Osborne House.

Thursday.—This morning her Majesty was stirring by daybreak, and shortly afterwards was seen, with her Royal Highness the Prince, crossing the lawn of Osborne House towards the sea beach, where the royal pair continued to promenade for a considerable time. Her Majesty afterwards went round the grounds, and frequently expressed the liveliest satisfaction at the splendour of the scenery. This afternoon, at one o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert, with several members of the royal suite, embarked on board the royal yacht, for the purpose of enjoying a short excursion. It is her Majesty's intention, during her short stay here, to visit nearly the various points of interest with which the Isle of Wight abounds.

This afternoon, at one o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert, with several members of the royal suite, embarked on board the royal yacht, for the purpose of enjoying a short excursion. It is her Majesty's intention, during her short stay here, to visit nearly the various points of interest with which the Isle of Wight abounds.

VISIT OF THE DUKE DE MONTPEISIER TO WOOLWICH.

On Saturday last the Duke de Montpensier, accompanied by several military officers of distinction, paid a visit to Woolwich Arsenal, and was received with a royal salute.

His Royal Highness on leaving the stocker's department, mounted on horseback, and proceeded past the pom-pom batteries, to the Marshes, where he witnessed practice from four 24-pounder guns at 600 yards distant from the target. A number of rockets were fired from the same range from Lieutenant Rogers's tubes, and afterwards at 1200 yards' range. The practice was very good.

Subsequently one round was fired from General Miller's gun of 10-inch bore, and at a distance from the target of 1250 yards; one round from one of Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas's 68-pounder, or 8-inch guns, at the same range. The rocket practice was under the command of Lord Williams.

The duke then rode to Woolwich Common, where the Royal Horse Artillery had assembled in review order, under the command of Colonel Dyerley, C.B. On arriving opposite the troops, his Royal Highness was received with the usual salute, the brass band playing the National Anthem. His Grace then rode along the front and rear of the troops, and on returning to the flag-staff, the rocket service troops, under the command of Lieutenant Wallis, and the troops H and F, under Captain Ward and Captain Duncan, marched past, and afterwards at trot and full gallop; and the Duke de Montpensier appeared evidently greatly pleased with the celebrity and regularity of the movements.

DINNER TO THE OFFICERS OF THE FRENCH SQUADRON AT PORTSEA.

On Saturday a dinner was given by the inhabitants of Portsmouth and its vicinity to the officers of the French squadron, at the Queen's Rooms, Portsea, which deserves notice on account of the perfect cordiality which prevailed, and the strong manifestation exhibited of a desire to perpetuate amicable feelings between France and England. Edward Casper, Esq., the Mayor, was the chairman. After the accustomed compliments to our royal family, the chairman proposed, with a suitable preface, "The health of his Majesty Louis Philippe, the first King of the French." This toast was received with very great applause.

Mr. Vandenberg (the French Consul) returned thanks for the toast of the Queen of the French, and in doing so, said he was quite certain that when the proceedings of the evening were communicated to her Majesty, she would be much pleased with the compliment paid to her by so respectable a body as that which he had then the honour to address—in fact that day would be looked upon in France as one of the greatest in the history of the two countries. (Cheers.)

Admiral Parker briefly proposed the next toast, "The Baron Marku and the French navy, particularly those officers who did them the honour of dining with them that day." (Great cheering.)

Commodore Hemois, of the Belle Poule (aide-de-camp to Prince Joinville, and a member of the Chamber of Deputies), briefly returned thanks, and proposed "Lord Haddington and the British navy." (This toast was drunk with peculiar enthusiasm by the French officers.)

Admiral Sir Hyde Parker said it devolved upon him to return thanks for the honour done to the British navy by his friend Captain Hemois and the company, in drinking to its success and to the health of the Earl of Haddington. He only trusted that the English navy and the French would long remain friends, as they were at that moment. (Tremendous cheering.)

Major-General Sir Hercules Pakenham proposed "Marshal Surt and the French army, which was also responded to enthusiastically, "with one cheer more."

Captain Grech returned thanks, and, after paying a high compliment to British valour, proposed "The Duke of Wellington and the British army." (Prolonged cheers.)

Sir Hercules Pakenham returned thanks, and expressed a hope for the continuance of peace between France and England, for the sake of the world in general, and the promotion of the fine arts.

Several other speeches were made in a similar spirit.

The Recorder of the Borough, Mr. Rowlandson, proposed "May the present friendly relations between France and England continue for ever." This gentleman alluded in forcible terms to the sentiments uttered by Louis Philippe. He declared that his heart was touched when the King said, in speaking in the warmth of his soul of the necessity of peace between two powerful nations like France and England—"I look upon the cordial union of these two nations as the key-stone of the arch which supports the peace of the world." (Loud and continued cheering.) Was there ever a truer or a finer sentiment spoken by man? The language was beautiful, the metaphor was perfect, and he believed with the King of the French, that the union of these two nations, the first in civilization as in attachment to liberty, was necessary for the advancement of science and the welfare of the entire habitable globe.

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

Knight, attends by the side of her Majesty, and assists her in all the duties of the day.

The Investiture of the King.

The details have been already copiously related. After the investiture her Majesty, accompanied by the King of the French, left the Quadrangle in a pony carriage and four by George IV.'s gateway, crossing the Frogmore road (which was crowded at this point by an immense number of persons who had arrived in Windsor during the day, and by whom their Majesties were received with loud acclamations) into the Long Walk, through which they drove into the Great Park.

Their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, the Duc de Montpensier, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strilintz, and several of her Majesty's visitors and royal suite were on horseback.

In the second carriage were their Royal Highnesses the Duchesses of Kent and Cambridge.

Several other carriages and four, filled with her Majesty's distinguished guests, followed.

The royal and illustrious party returned to the Castle through the Long Walk, after being absent for about an hour.

THE GARDEN BANQUET, &c.

Covers were laid in the evening in St. George's Hall, for 130. The banquetting table was ornamented, if possible, in a still more gorgeous and magnificent manner, with gold plate, epigrams, candelabra, vases, wine coolers, &c., than upon the two former occasions of the banquet in St. George's Hall, during her Majesty's visit.

The band of the Scots Fusilier Guards performed during the dinner in the Western Gallery.

The upper engraving at page 249 shows

Or rather, the central portion of the table, with the Queen, the King, the Duchess of Kent, the Duc de Montpensier, &c., in their several positions at the banquet. The plate seen, are portions of the Prince of Wales's Plate, a service entirely of solid gold. In the centre is the famous St. George's Candelabrum; on each side are smaller ones of the Heppides and other classical subjects, the whole resting on massive slabs of plate glass, bound with gold.

SATURDAY.

In the morning, at ten o'clock, the King of the French received a deputation from the committee of the "Société Française de Bienfaisance," who waited on his Majesty to present an address of congratulation on his visit to England. In this address the society tendered their thanks to the King for his patronage and generous gifts to this charitable institution, and invoked blessings upon his Majesty and his illustrious family.

The King, who received the deputation with the utmost courtesy and respect, replied in the French language to the following effect:—His Majesty said he was most happy to be surrounded by those of his countrymen who devoted their time and attention to the relief of unfortunate Frenchmen who happened to be in England, and felt grateful to them for the expression of their kind feeling towards himself and the various members of his family. His Majesty added that he was in hopes his present visit would contribute to the peaceful and friendly feelings which ought to exist between two such powerful nations as France and Great Britain, and concluded by observing that if ever he returned to England, he should be most happy to see the deputation again, still engaged in their good work of alleviating the sufferings of their distressed fellow-countrymen.

His Majesty then addressed a few words to M. André, the French Consul in London, and the deputation were about to retire, when it was suggested that as Frenchmen only were present, they should first express their feelings in a truly national spirit, by giving three cheers for his Majesty, and as the King withdrew the walls of the reception chamber echoed with the shouts of "Vive le Roi!"

The address of the Corporation of London.

A deputation from the Corporation of the City of London arrived at the Castle at two o'clock in the afternoon, having travelled from town by the Great Western Railway, to present an address of congratulation to his Majesty the King of the French upon his arrival in this country. The Lord Mayor and the members of the deputation alighted at the grand entrance, and were conducted to the querries' room, where a déjeuner was served to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and members of the Common Council, together with the officers.

The King having expressed his pleasure to receive the address immediately, the Corporation were conducted by the Hon. Captain Dancombe, Groom-in-Waiting, to the presence of his Majesty in the King's Reception Room.

The King's station was near the window of the apartment. His Majesty was habited in a dark blue uniform with gold appointments, being that of a Lieutenant-General, and wore the sash, with the George appended, of the most noble Order of the Garter over his left shoulder, and the star on his breast. The King had also the garter bearing the motto, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," buckled on the left leg.

All the gentlemen of the King's suite were in uniform. The Count de St. Aulaire, M. Guizot, and Admiral de Mackau, were on the left of the King, M. Guizot and his Excellency Count de St. Aulaire both wearing the Grand Cord of the Legion of Honour.

Vicount Sydney and the Hon. Captain Dancombe both appeared in the official costume of the Royal Household, as the Lord and Groom-in-Waiting. Lord Charles Wellesley, Esquire in Waiting, appeared in his full regimentals as Esquire in Waiting.

The members of the Corporation present were—the Lord Mayor, Aldermen Sir Claudius Hunter, Sir Peter Laurie, Farnborough, Sir Chapman Mashall, Humphrey, Sir George Carroll, Farnborough, and Chaslin.

The Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, Messrs. Hunter and Sydney, Mr. Moon, master of the address; Mr. Lawrence, recorder of the address.

Common Councilmen—Mr. Deputy Leaze, Mr. Deputy Stevens, Mr. Deputy Pearce, Mr. Deputy Evans, Mr. Deputy Hicks, Mr. Deputy Orbyard, Mr. Deputy Mitchell, Mr. Deputy Wright, Messrs. Norris, R. L. Jones, Hutton, Bower, Cape, Hickson, Hall, Nott, Harrison, Hoole, Hall, Hartley, R. Taylor, J. Dixon, Secker, Sisson, Marden, and Eggleston.

Officers of the Corporation—The Recorder, the Hon. C. E. Law; the Chamberlain, Mr. Brown; the Remembrancer, Mr. Tyrrell; the Town Clerk, and Mr. Laurie, Common Pleader.

The Lord Mayor wore his gold robe and his splendid collar, the Aldermen and the Recorder wore their scarlet robes, and the Common Councilmen and officers their respective mantles.

The deputation having been introduced generally by Lord Sydney to the King, his Majesty bowed cordially to the Lord Mayor and the rest, and the Recorder then read, with much impressiveness of manner, the following address:—

"TO HIS MAJESTY LOUIS PHILIPPE, KING OF THE FRENCH, THE ADDRESS OF THE LORD MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND COMMONS OF THE CITY OF LONDON, IN COMMON COUNCIL ASSEMBLED."

"May it please your Majesty.—We, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the city of London, in Common Council assembled, approach your Majesty to offer our sincere congratulations on your Majesty's auspicious visit to our beloved and Gracious Sovereign Queen Victoria."

"Deeply interested in every event which is calculated to influence the welfare of Europe and of mankind, we hail with peculiar satisfaction your Majesty's presence in this country as a sure and certain indication of the mutual good will and the reciprocal sentiments of respect and confidence which subsist between two mighty nations, capable by their happy union and combined efforts, under divine Providence, of preserving the blessings of peace to the nations of the earth."

"We desire to convey to your Majesty these sentiments towards the free, gallant, and enlightened nation over whom you reign, and we fervently trust that your Majesty's valuable life may long be spared to your people to continue to promote their best interests, and with them to advance the general happiness of mankind. And, you visit a scene where the highest domestic enjoyment is found to be associated with the highest functions of sovereignty; to return after a brief space into the bosom of an illustrious and united family, to dispense the blessings of paternal government, and to communicate and experience the inestimable endearments of social life."

"The King, on the Recorder having been introduced to him, before reading the address, had bowed most courteously to the right hon. gentleman. When the Recorder had concluded, Lord Sydney stepped forward and introduced the Lord Mayor to his Majesty, who bowed most courteously to his lordship. The Lord Mayor handed to his Majesty a copy of the address."

In receiving the address from his lordship the King said:—"I well remember your father, Mr. Maynard. I had the happiness of seeing him in the Egyptian hall of the Mansion-house, when he filled the high situation which you now hold. I remember him with much pleasure, and the hospitable manner in which he received me. It affords me great pleasure to receive such an address at your hands."

His Majesty then read, from a paper he held in his hand, the following reply:—

"My Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the city of London—I receive with heartfelt satisfaction the address of congratulation which you have just presented to me by the gracious authorisation of your beloved Sovereign. In coming to offer to the Queen of these realms a proof of the sincere and unalterable friendship I bear to her Majesty I am happy to find that the city of London—that illustrious city which holds so prominent a place in the world, and which represents interests of such magnitude—are come to the royal residence to manifest to me sentiments so perfectly congenial to my own feelings and to the sense I entertain of my duties towards my country, towards Europe, and towards mankind."

"I am convinced, as you are, that peace and friendly relations between France and England are, for two nations made to assist and honour each other, a source of innumerable and equal advantage. The preservation of that good understanding is, at the same time, a pledge of peace to the world at large, and secures the tranquil and regular progress of civilization for the benefit of all nations. I consider my co-operation in this holy work, under the protection of Divine Providence, as the mission and the honour of my reign. Such has been the aim and the object of all my efforts, and I trust that the Almighty will crown them with success."

"I thank you in the name of France and in my own for this manifestation of your sentiments. They will be fully appreciated in my country, coupled, as they are, with the many tokens of friendship which I have received from your gracious Sovereign."

"I thank you most cordially for your kind feeling towards myself and my family. The impression produced upon me by the presentation of your address will never be effaced from my heart."

His Majesty read the reply with marked emphasis, dwelling impressively upon the portion which inculcated the advantages of peace. The last two paragraphs of the reply his Majesty spoke without looking at the paper, which he had previously folded up. When he had concluded, he handed the copy of the answer to the Lord Mayor, with whom his Majesty shook hands with great cordiality, again entering into conversation with him.

The Lord Mayor having expressed a wish that his Majesty could have visited the citizens of London before his departure, the King replied:—"I assure you, that if I had time, etiquette should not interfere with my hearty wish, but my time is limited. I should wish very much to visit Guildhall, the Mansion House, and Falmington's Hall."

The Lord Mayor then presented to the King Mr. Alderman Humphrey, the Mayor, and Sir Peter Laurie, the recorder, of the address in the Court of Aldermen; and Mr. Moon and Mr. Lawrence, the mover and seconder of the address in the Court of Common Council.

His Majesty conversed with them all. Previously, on Sir C. Hunter being presented to him, his Majesty mistook him for Sir Peter Laurie, and addressed him by that name. This caused some laughter, in which the King joined. He observed to Sir Claudius Hunter that he remembered to have seen him abroad. On Sir Peter Laurie being presented by the Lord Mayor, his Majesty said that the name of Sir Peter was quite familiar to him. He added, addressing Sir Peter, "Ah! Sir Peter, you are an old acquaintance of mine. I remember dining with you at Falmington's Hall many years ago. It is a great pleasure to me to meet you again." To Mr. Moon his Majesty said, taking him by the hand, "Ah! Mr. Moon, I have heard of you; I know you well from your connection with the finance, and I have derived great pleasure from the examination of your admirable engravings. I find, too, that you have an excellent way of making speeches." This was, probably, an allusion to Mr. Moon having moved the address.

The deputation at this period was about to withdraw, when his Majesty again shook hands with the Lord Mayor, and said—"I assure you, my lord, that I feel the highest possible gratification at this evidence of the feeling of respect and appreciation from you and your fellow-citizens."

The Corporation then withdrew.

VISIT TO ETON COLLEGE.

The King, at the royal dinner-party at the Castle, yesterday evening, expressed a very warm desire to the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, the Head Master of Eton, who was one of her Majesty's guests, to pay that ancient seat of learning a visit before his departure from Windsor.

The royal and august party honoured Eton College with a visit on Saturday afternoon. The Queen, the King of the French, and Prince Albert left the Castle in an open carriage and four. The Countess of Gainsborough, the Countess de St. Aulaire, the Viscountess Canning, and the French Ambassador, were in the next royal carriage.

On passing through George IV.'s gateway, the spectators who thronged the south terrace of the Castle, received their Majesties and the Prince in the most enthusiastic manner.

On arriving at the college, the royal party were met by the Dukes of Wellington and Rutland on horseback.

On the cortège entering the Quadrangle the boys were discovered drawn up on each side of the path, and as the cortège passed to the private lodge the illustrious visitors were greeted with loud cheers from the pupils.

At the lodge, her Majesty and her illustrious guests were received by Dr. Hodgson, the provost, Mr. Grover, the vice-provost, and Dr. Hawtrey, the head master of the school, who conducted the august party into the interior of the building.

Their Majesties proceeded first to the Election Chamber, where all the assistant masters were assembled, and from the principal window of this apartment the King and Queen looked out into the quadrangle below. Their presence in so conspicuous a situation was the signal for tumultuous cheering, which was continued for several minutes.

Her Majesty repeatedly acknowledged the same, by bowing to the spectators, and the King of the French, who stood with his head uncovered, after bowing several times, put his slight hand on his heart, and displayed in the most expressive manner his gratitude for the enthusiastic reception which greeted him on every side.

In the Library there is a book where distinguished visitors are accustomed to write their names. Prince Albert's name was already in the book, and Her Majesty was requested to write hers. She wrote "Victoria R., October 12, 1844." The Duke of Wellington wrote his name under the Queen's, and the King of the French, who had of course been requested to write his, filled the opposite page. His Majesty had expressed his delight at the enthusiastic reception given him by the boys, and with their shouts ringing in his ears, he wrote, "Louis Philippe, empereur des Français qui lui ont fait les honneurs de cette illustre collége."

The royal visitors were then shown into the Provost's Lodge and into his Drawing-room, where there are some very fine pictures, and they then returned down through the cloisters to the entrance of the Clock Tower. From this point to the entrance to the chapel, across the quadrangle, in a diagonal direction, the boys had again formed in line along the pathway, and the royal party walked across. Her Majesty leant on the arm of the King of the French, and Prince Albert walked behind; the suite and visitors followed. Again the King and the Queen were vociferously cheered by the boys. They bowed repeatedly in acknowledgment of the reception given them. They entered the chapel, where they remained a few minutes, and they were then conducted into the upper school. Here they remained for a few minutes, Prince Albert taking particular pains to point out to the King the names cut by boys in the walls. The Prince requested on a form the better to point them out. He particularly drew the King's attention to the name of Charles James Fox. The statue of this Duke of Newcastle was shown to the King, and the circumstances connected with the Newcastle Scholarship explained to him, as also the names of those who had obtained it. Leaving the upper school, the royal visitors were conducted through Dr. Hawtrey's rooms down to the quadrangle, where the carriages were in waiting. Her Majesty stepped first into the carriage, and took the left hand seat facing the horse, which was not the seat she had before. A small foot-mat was at the bottom of the carriage under the seat she had before occupied. The King of the French was about to get into the carriage, but seeing that the Queen had changed her seat he stood for a few moments at the door, leaning forward and pressing Her Majesty to resume her original seat. Her Majesty, however, continued where she was, and the King laughing, at last got in and occupied the vacant seat. Prince Albert occupied the seat opposite.

The engraving at page 252 represents the reception in the Quadrangle; a right loyal scene of enthusiasm.

As the royal carriage drove off the cheers of the boys and visitors in the quadrangle were renewed with redoubled vigour, and the people on the way back to the castle also repeated their enthusiastic reception, which the King of the French acknowledged by repeatedly taking off his hat and bowing.

The Duke of Wellington was also a prominent object of the cheers of the boys. As his Grace came in he had nearly met with an accident. He came in on foot, and mingled among the boys, who scarcely knew him at first. Walking forward towards the Clock Tower, the Duke was remounted by one of the carriage horses and very nearly knocked down. The boys, however, rallied round him, and he met with no further annoyance. In a few minutes after, on his being very much cheered, Prince Albert said to the Duke, "You must remember you were an Eton boy yourself."

In the evening, dinner was served in St. George's Hall, in the usual style of magnificence and splendour. Covers were laid for eighty-eight.

The august circle, followed by the numerous and distinguished guests, entered the hall at a quarter past seven o'clock, the band of the Royal Horse Guards, stationed in the west gallery, playing "God save the Queen."

Prince Albert sat opposite to her Majesty, having on his right her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Countess de Aulais, the Duke of Rutland, and the Countess of Vornham. On his Majesty's left were the Barons de Gendard, the Duke of Devonshire, the Countess of Lincoln, and the Count St. Aulaire.

The band of the Royal Horse Guards performed a number of favourite pieces during dinner.

ATTENDANCE AT THE CATHOLIC CHAPEL AT CLEWER.

On Sunday morning the King of the French, accompanied by the Duke de Montpensier, and attended by some of his suite, attended divine service at the Roman Catholic Chapel, at Clewer.

The chapel in question is a remarkably small edifice, affording comfortable accommodation for only about 150 persons. It was built by Mr. Kelly, a Catholic gentleman of some considerable property residing at Forest-hill, in the vicinity.

Preparations had been taken against overcrowding the building, and the ordinary congregation being of course allowed to retain their seats, very few strangers were admitted.

On entering the royal pew, his Majesty knelt for some moments, and after performing his devotions took his seat near the centre, having the Duke de Montpensier on his right hand, Count de St. Aulaire, and the other members of his suite occupying positions behind his Majesty.

The service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson, who was assisted by many other clergymen. After the prayers, before mass, Mr. Wilkinson mounted the pulpit, and preached an excellent sermon from the parable of the unjust steward, selecting the words, "Render an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward." The only allusion to the royal presence, throughout the sermon, was at its commencement, Mr. Wilkinson pronouncing the opening sentence in the following words:—"May it please your Majesty and Christian brethren."

After the sermon high mass was performed, and, this solemn ceremony concluded, his Majesty returned from the chapel, having first left a handsome donation to the funds in the vestry, besides presenting to the chaplain a magnificent piece of altar plate, in which the holy water is preserved.

On the Gospel side of the altar was placed a very magnificent remembrance of silver gilt, of exquisite workmanship, which had been presented by the King to the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson. On the base is inscribed "Donné à la Chapelle Catholique de Clewer, par Louis Philippe, Roi des Français, 1844." It is surrounded by a cross, and the pedestal is formed of the figure of an angel pointing upwards. Around the base is sculptured, in alto relievo, a serpent with the apple, the lamb, and other typical figures.

His Majesty was attired in a plain suit of black clothes, and wore the blue ribbon of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

On his Majesty entering the royal carriage at the chapel door two persons, the one a female, and the other a respectable-looking man, endeavoured to throw papers into it, but the officers in attendance quickly prevented the intrusion and returned them to their several owners.

A dense crowd of persons met his Majesty on returning from the chapel to the Castle, by all of whom he was loyally received.

After their return from Clewer, the Duke de Montpensier, accompanied by M. Guizot, and suite, visited St. George's Chapel. While they were inspecting the beautiful choir, the gates were closed; and the crowd of persons in the nave was very considerable. His Royal Highness and M. Guizot then left by the cloister passage between the Chapel and the Tomb House, and crossing the lower Ward, returned to the Castle, the Duke to his apartment on the north side of the Quadrangle, and M. Guizot to the south. His Royal Highness repeatedly acknowledged the respects of the visitors; and upon the west side of the Quadrangle, and up the mound of the Round Tower, the number of spectators was very considerable. Our artist has sketched the Prince and the distinguished statesman.

M. GUIZOT

The august company lunched together at the Castle at two o'clock.

During the afternoon the east terrace and ornamental gardens were thrown open to the public, and a very large number of persons availed themselves of the opportunity of commencing their visit. Towards three o'clock, her Majesty, the King of the French, the Duke de Montpensier, and the Duchess of Kent, appeared at one of the large drawing-room windows; and were seen in occasional conversation, by the spectators in the garden; the appearance of the youthful Prince of Wales at this window also excited very considerable interest.

At half-past three, the pony phaetons were ordered to Adelaide Lodge, her Majesty having determined to accompany the King across the park on foot, and return by the road.

At four o'clock, the band of the Royal Horse Guards (Blues) took up their station in the centre of the garden, and commenced playing one of their favourite marches. The next moment her Majesty was observed to leave the Castle by a private doorway, leading on to the east terrace. Her Majesty varied on the arm of the King of the French, and was followed by Prince Albert and the Duke de Montpensier. The royal pair were preceded by the Lords in Waiting and Equerries in attendance, attired in the Windsor uniform, and succeeded by a party of ladies and gentlemen, most of whom belonged to the suite of the French King.

The two most conspicuous in the latter group were Sir Robert Peel and M. Guizot, who walked for some time together.

The presence of the royal party on the terrace was the signal for most enthusiastic cheering from the crowd in the gardens—a circumstance, he it observed, wholly unprecedented on the Sabbath, but excusable on an occasion of such surpassing interest.

The King appeared overjoyed at his reception, and took off his hat repeatedly, while her Majesty was evidently much gratified by the exhibition of loyalty and affection made by her faithful subjects.

After pausing to and for several times, the illustrious party were compelled to seek shelter from a shower, by returning to the Castle. Many of the crowd retired. A momentary cessation of the rain, however, brought out the august party again, who, on this occasion, cheered as before by the remaining spectators, proceeded through the greenhouse to the slopes, and thence across the park to Adelaide Lodge, where, after remaining a short period, they entered the carriage which were in waiting, and drove back to the Castle.

The Queen and Prince Albert and the ladies and gentlemen of the suite and the household attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle.

A dinner took place, as usual, in St. George's Hall. The Queen had on her right her Majesty Louis Philippe, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, and his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar. On the left of her Majesty were his Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier, the Lady in Waiting, the Countess of Gismborough, his Excellency Count de St. Aulaire, and Lady Georgiana Russell.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert sat opposite to the Queen, having on his right her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, M. Guizot, Lady John Russell, and the Marquis of Exeter. On the Prince's left were Madame la Comtesse de St. Aulaire, Admiral de Mackau, and Lady Beauchamp.

After dinner the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward of her Majesty's Household, gave the health of "His Majesty the King of the French." Also the health of "The Queen."

Throughout the day, Windsor was thronged with visitors, several of whom proceeded on the Clewer road, to meet the King, on his return from chapel. The demand for accommodation at the inns was very pressing; and we suspect that many an unlucky wight returned to town disappointed. The rush to the omnibuses in the evening (more especially on account of the heavy rain), was very great. The view of the Castle, from the Eton road, was truly striking; the principal windows in the northern front presenting a flood of light, projected through the entire eastern front. We rarely remember seeing the stately pile to such advantage; it was, even from without, a scene of right royal hospitality, carrying the mind's-eye back to the chivalric glories of the feudal age in which the palace was founded, and assuring us that in the lapse of ages—the long vista of seven centuries—Windsor has lost not a ray of its splendour and magnificence.

DEPARTURE FROM WINDSOR, AND CHANGE OF ROUTE.

Precisely at twelve o'clock, the Queen and his Majesty the King of the French descended the Grand Staircase, preceded by the Earl Delawar, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's household, in the Windsor uniform, and wearing his gold key, or badge of office. The King was attired in a suit of black, and wore the ribbon, with the George appended, and also the Star of the most noble Order of the Garter.

Their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the Duke de Montpensier, accompanied their Majesties.

The King's suite followed—M. Guizot, Count de St. Aulaire, Count de Jarnac, M. Fauquier, M. Paquis, and M. Herbet, wearing their respective official costumes, and the two first-named wearing the decoration of the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour.

Admiral de Mackau, General Baron Athalia, General de Rumigny, Colonel Dumas, Count de Chabannes, M. Thierry, Le Capitaine Page, and Le Capitaine Fillion, appeared in military and naval regiments.

The Duchess of Kent accompanied the royal party to the door of the grand entrance, and there took leave of his Majesty and the Duke de Montpensier.

Sir R. Peel and the Earl of Aberdeen also paid their respects to the French Monarch, and took leave of his Majesty at the grand entrance.

His Majesty, before leaving the Castle, presented six magnificent gold snuff-boxes, with his portrait set in brilliants, to the principal officers of the household who had been appointed to attend him. He also presented a number of brilliant rings and brooches to the ladies and other attendants of her Majesty, and a sum of £1000 to be distributed among the domestics generally. The King also presented to M. Guizot, the vice French Consul, who had waited upon him on Saturday, a sum of 10,000 francs, in aid of the French charitable institution already alluded to, of which his Majesty is the patron. He also left a sum of 4000 francs to be distributed to the poor of Windsor, and a number of other equally magnificent donations.

A party of the Royal Horse Guards formed the escort of the royal party down the Long-walk and through the park to Blackness. The illustrious party afterwards proceeded by way of Bagshot to the Farnborough station of the South Western Railway.

At Farnborough, every preparation had been made to receive their Majesties. The fittings up at the station were most elegant. A private carriage-road leading to the chief entrance-door, at the back of the station, had been set apart for their Majesties' sole use; and from the entrance-door to the door which leads to the platform, a costly and beautiful crimson carpet with an elegant border of gold colour, was laid down. On either side of the passage-way were reception-rooms, the one on the left being for the use of the four royal personages, the Queen, the King, the Duke de Montpensier, and Prince Albert; while the opposite room was for the use of their suites. Our engraving at page 254 represents the exterior of the Reception-rooms, the Railway-platform, and the arrival of the Royal State Carriage; the former provided with an awning, and decorated with the British and French flags.

The room prepared for her Majesty was fitted up in a style of remarkable elegance and taste. The gold filigree work traced on the ceiling was particularly beautiful, and the furniture of the room was also unostentatiously and appropriately rich and splendid.

At the station, the directors and officers of the railway were assembled to receive their Majesties.

Owing to some slight delays on the road, the royal carriage did not reach the station till a quarter to two o'clock, the special train having been ordered to be in readiness at one o'clock. Arrived at the door of the station her Majesty alighted, and was escorted by the King of the French into her reception-room, followed by the Prince and the Duke de Montpensier. The directors were at the entrance and received her Majesty.

During the interval that elapsed while the train was being finally prepared for starting, the royal party remained in the reception-room. At a few minutes to two o'clock they came out, and entered the state carriage amidst the loud cheers of the people. It was still raining heavily when the train started, at five minutes to two o'clock. Upon the engine there was the tri-colour flag, and on the tender the royal standard.

The royal carriage itself is a beautiful structure. Externally it is plain, but light and elegant, and the interior is fitted up with much taste. It is lined with a light drab silk damask, richly trimmed with crimson and white silk lace; the ceiling is formed of white watered silk, exquisitely embroidered with crimson velvet and silver in relief, forming the national emblem of the rose, shamrock, and thistle, with the royal crown at each corner. The carriage is entirely surrounded by light and tasteful draperies of crimson and white satin damask, and lined with crimson satin, richly trimmed with fringes, &c. The blinds are of a delicate peach colour, with silver tassels. The carpet is of Axminster manufacture, in colours to harmonise with the rest of the interior decorations. (Next week, we shall present to our readers an engraving of this costly specimen of coach-fitting.)

The train proceeded at a very rapid pace towards Gosport. Owing to the state of the weather there were not many persons assembled at the different points of the road. At several places on the line the tri-colour flag was set up on the way-side. At Basingstoke, the tri-colour flag from the station, where a considerable number of people were assembled, who cheered lustily as the train came up. There was also a rustic band, and the National Anthem was played right loyally. At Bishopstoke, where the rail branches off to Gosport, there was a considerable number of people, who cheered loudly as the train passed; and at Botley, a small intermediate station, there was much preparation. Besides the tri-colour flag there was a band of music, and a great crowd of persons. As the train shot by the hand played the National Anthem, and the people cheered. At Farnham, the last station before Gosport, there were also many people. There was also a party of foot soldiers, who presented arms as the royal carriages passed.

ARRIVAL AT GOSPORT AND DEPARTURE FOR LONDON.

At Gosport, the station presented a most animated appearance as the train came up. The decorations were nearly the same as those which were prepared for the reception of the King of the French. On the triumphal triple arch at the place of exit, however, there was a fresh inscription, "Long Live Louis Philippe, Victoria, Albert." The arch was flanked with an immense royal standard and tri-colour; shown in the illustration at page 255. The station was filled with well-dressed persons, chiefly ladies; and there was a party of foot soldiers, who presented arms as the royal carriages came up, the band playing the National Anthem. The directors had come on in the train, and were ready to receive their Majesties as they alighted. The spectators cheered most enthusiastically. The train entered the station at thirty-five minutes past three o'clock, having left Farnborough at five minutes to two.

Their Majesties, with the Prince and the Duke de Montpensier, alighted immediately after their arrival at the station, and proceeded at once to the carriage, followed by their respective suites. They drove off towards the Victroling-yard (the place of the intended embarkation) amidst the cheers of the multitudes of people, who, notwithstanding the rain, had assembled on the way-side. The road was lined on either side with foot soldiers from the station to the yard.

As the royal carriage passed along the hands of the different regiments struck up "God save the Queen," and at a quarter to four o'clock the Admiralty flag was lowered from its staff in the centre of the yard, and the royal standard substituted, as the carriages entered the yard. The Victory and the other vessels in the harbour were at this time dressed out in their gayest colours, and the yards manned.

The rain, which had all along fallen heavily, soon increased to a perfect torrent; the wind blew a hurricane, and the rumbling of thunder in the distance succeeded faint flashes of lightning, which gave promise of a stormy night. To cross from Spithead to Troop, under any circumstances, would be attended with immense loss of time in the then state of the weather, and his Grace the Duke of Wellington having joined the consultation, it was instantly determined to despatch a special train to London, in order to secure the necessary accommodation for his Majesty's departure for France via Dover.

Colonel Houverie was entrusted with this important duty, and his Grace the Duke of Wellington accompanied the gallant colonel to town.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, it was understood, endeavoured to prevail upon their illustrious guest to return with them to Windsor Castle and extend his sojourn in this country for a day or two; but his Majesty, feeling it necessary to return to Paris, was reluctantly compelled to carry out the idea of proceeding via Dover.

The Queen and the Prince Consort then determined to pass the night on board the Royal yacht, which fortunately remained at her moorings opposite the Victroling-yard; but as it was necessary that the express train conveying Colonel Houverie should precede the King of the French by three hours, in order to allow that officer time to make the arrangements for the route, the august circle determined to spend the interval in the residence of Mr. Thomas Grant, the storekeeper, who occupies a house on the left of the entrance yard.

The rain still pouring down in torrents, the Royal party entered their carriage, and proceeded across the yard to Mr. Grant's residence, where they were received in the best manner which the absence of all preparation on the part of the worthy host would allow. Her Majesty and the Prince, with the King of the French and the Duke de Montpensier, occupied a small parlour looking into the dockyard, where they partook of a hasty repast, the attendants on the Royal party occupying an adjoining apartment; and here the august circle remained until half-past seven o'clock, when the Queen and her illustrious consort took leave of their Royal guests in the most affectionate manner, the King entering one of the carriages in attendance and proceeding direct to the railway station.

It should be here mentioned, that at a quarter to seven o'clock Lieutenant Prevost, R.N., flag lieutenant to Sir Charles Rowley, left Gosport by a special train for the Farnborough station of the South Western Railway, bearing despatches from her Majesty to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, acquainting her Royal parent with the unfortunate train of circumstances which had succeeded the departure from Windsor Castle. Lieutenant Prevost was directed to return to Gosport by the same special train.

All these arrangements made, the royal party took dinner, as already mentioned, in Mr. Grant's house, which, as may be supposed, was completely crowded with gentlemen and ladies, and with the officers of the King's suite. Notwithstanding the extreme inconvenience to which they were all put, it was satisfactory to hear every now and then a hearty laugh amongst the party, especially from the room where the illustrious travellers themselves were. The royal party remained nearly three hours at Mr. Grant's, until the hour at which the special train was ordered.

At a quarter past seven the King of the French and the Duke de Montpensier took leave of the Queen and the Prince, and proceeded, accompanied by M. Guizot, Count de St. Aulaire, and all of his suite who had not gone on board the steamer, to the station. His Majesty arrived there at half-past seven o'clock, and was saluted with hearty cheers. His Majesty acknowledged the compliment, and entered the carriage, followed by all the chief members of the suite, so that the royal carriage was nearly filled. General Wemyss accompanied his Majesty.

After a short delay, the train started at a quarter to eight o'clock, and reached the Nine Elms station at thirty-five minutes past ten o'clock.

At Nine-Elms, Sir John Roehampton, Mr. Chapin, Mr. Boothby, and some others of the directors were in waiting to receive the King.

Sir James Graham was also in waiting at the station, and as soon as the train stopped, the right honourable baronet entered the carriage where the King was, and, conducting him out, handed him to a carriage, which, with servants in the royal livery and outriders, was in waiting to receive him. Sir James Graham rode in the carriage with the King, as did also the Duke de Montpensier. The rest of his Majesty's suite followed in other carriages, and the party drove off immediately to the Dover Railway.

DEPARTURE OF HIS MAJESTY FROM THE NEW-CROSS STATION FOR DOWRY.

The information that his Majesty intended to take his departure from this station did not reach the authorities until about eight o'clock in the evening. The utmost activity was, however, displayed on the instant, and one special train having been got ready with the greatest possible despatch, was sent on to Dover to prepare for his Majesty's reception there, and to give the necessary directions at all the intermediate stations. A second train was soon after sent on, conveying six of his Majesty's carriages. The preparations then set on foot for the third special train, destined for his Majesty himself and his suite, were not interrupted by the fire at New-Cross station. (We give elsewhere the particulars of this unfortunate occurrence.)

The fire was at its height when his Majesty drove up, escorted by a troop of Horse Guards. The preparations for his departure, however, had been proceeding uninterruptedly, a circumstance highly creditable to the energy and presence of mind of all the parties concerned, and they were just completed as his Majesty arrived—at eleven o'clock. His Majesty was received at the station by Mr. Gregory, superintendent of the Croydon line; Mr. Howell, superintendent of the Brighton line; and by Captain Clerkwood, superintendent of the South-Eastern and Dover line; by whom he was ushered into the waiting-room; and thence, in the course of less than five minutes, to the special train which was in readiness, and which immediately started for Dover, as though nothing unusual had taken place.

One of the gentlemen connected with the London and Dover Railway expressed his regret that the late hour at which the notice for the special train had arrived rendered it impossible for the directors to be in attendance to receive his

THE DUKE DE MONTPENSIER.

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH AND QUEEN VICTORIA TO ETON COLLEGE.

His Majesty, in reply, expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the arrangements, and expressed in strong terms his regret at the unfortunate fire then raging on the premises, and concluded by hoping that the company were well insured.

The illustration at page 253 represents the arrival of the King, when, to get to the platform, the royal carriage had to pass over several lengths of hose whilst the engines were at work. The scene at that moment was one of intense interest. The appearance of the troops who formed the royal escort, the reflection of the flames upon their bright helmets and accoutrements, the roaring of the engines working, the shouting of the firemen, and the huzzas of the crowd in honour of the French monarch, excited a feeling that can with difficulty be described. For some minutes the carriage remained stationary, and his Majesty viewed from the window the progress of the flames, which, were within one hundred feet of him, it is said at that time being very great.

ARRIVAL AND EMBARKATION AT DOVER FOR FRANCE.

His Majesty the King of the French, the Duke de Montpensier, and suite, arrived at Dover on Tuesday, at half-past two in the morning, by special train from New Cross.

His Majesty and suite were received at the station by the Hon. Colonel Bouverie, one of her Majesty's Equerries, and the Count de Chabannes. The proprietors of the Ship Hotel had hastily prepared every available apartment, and a kind of state bed-room, very handsomely fitted up, with a carved head of oak bedstead, and furniture en suite (a royal crown cut out of the solid wood ornamenting the foot-board of the bed), was made ready for his Majesty.

The King rose at nine o'clock, and transacted business with M. Guizot, in his private apartments. His Majesty did not appear at all to be fatigued after his recent journeyings and adventures, but looked quite hale and hearty. Although the King did not retire to rest until past five o'clock in the morning, at day-light he was roused from his slumbers by the roaring of a royal salute from the Castle.

At half-past ten the King partook of his frugal breakfast, and shortly afterwards the Mayor and civic functionaries of the borough of Dover, preceded by their march-bearers, arrived at the hotel, in their official robes, to present a congratulatory address to the King on his visit. They were introduced to his Majesty by General de Ramigny, and were received by the King with the greatest kindness and affability. The King wore a plain black dress, with a white neckcloth, and by his side stood the young Duc de Montpensier in a plain morning dress.

The congratulatory address, which was appropriate to the occasion, was read by the Town Clerk, and immediately his Majesty, in a clear and impressive manner, gave the following reply to it:—

"Mr. Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the ancient town of Dover—I leave this country with my heart impressed with feelings of the warmest nature. But particularly as regards the general greeting and gratifications which have been extended to me by all classes of her Majesty's subjects, and all the many tokens of friendship and affection which I have received at the hands of her Majesty. They give me a favourable opportunity of manifesting towards England those sentiments of amity, peace, friendship, and union, which have ever been uppermost in my heart; and I am most happy to find those sentiments congenial to the wishes of the British nation; and I have no doubt but that they will be appreciated in my country. Two such nations, mutually calculated to be of so much advantage to each other, will, I trust, equally appreciate those earnest desires which I have so deeply at heart—sentiments which I have ever so deeply felt."

After the delivery of this speech his Majesty turned to a gentleman representing one of the London papers, who was taking a note of it, and said to him, "If you are taking down what I say, I am very happy to tell you that I am speaking my sentiments, and I am very glad you are taking them down," at the same time placing his hand upon his heart. His Majesty then turned to the Mayor, and said, "I know something of Dover—I am not a stranger to it; I know its localities; and I am exceedingly obliged to the Mayor and Corporation for having paid me the compliment they have done. I am sorry I cannot have time to go round the town."

The deputation then retired, and within a few minutes the King, attended by Colonel Rice Jones, Captain Mercer, and surrounded by the members of his suite, descended the staircase, and passed through a guard of honour, consisting of the depot of the 12th Regiment, and proceeded on foot to the steamer, amidst the cheers of the assembled multitude. As soon as the King and his suite were on board the Nord, the vessel got under weigh, and as she steamed out of the harbour, his Majesty appeared on the poop in a white great coat, and took off his hat in acknowledging the farewell greetings of the vast crowd who were assembled at the pier-head to take a parting glance at the Monarch who was leaving our shores for his own dominions.

As soon as the Nord cleared the harbour, she was followed by the Princess Alice, the Swallow, and the Ariel, and another royal salute was again fired from the castle.

The King remained on deck until his vessel, with her convoy, were about mid-channel, when the tremendous gale, which was blowing to the southward and westward, compelled his Majesty to go below.

THE RETURN TO THE CHATEAU D'EU.

The King of the French landed at Calais on Tuesday afternoon, from Le Nord steamer, in excellent health and spirits, having made a rapid passage from Dover, during which his Majesty felt no material inconvenience, although the swell was considerable.

ARCH AT THE RAILWAY STATION, GOSPORT.

The King had intended to land at Treport on Tuesday morning, and the Queen, early in the day, repaired to the shore to await her Royal husband's arrival.

A tent was erected for her Majesty's accommodation, troops were under arms, and the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood were on the alert to give the King an appropriate welcome home. Seeing no squadron in the offing, the Queen became somewhat alarmed. A steam-boat, Le Poste, was dispatched to the roads on the look-out. After a considerable interval, the captain of the war-steamship Elan arrived from Portsmouth, having left that place late on Monday night. He was the bearer of a letter from the King to the Queen, by which her Majesty was informed that the weather had prevented his Majesty's embarkation; that he had resolved to return to France by way of Dover and Calais or Boulogne, and calculated upon reaching the Chateau d'Eu in the course of Tuesday afternoon.

The Queen communicated the information thus received to the anxious bystanders.

Her Majesty afterwards resolved to wait at Bernal the arrival of her august husband. Apartments were immediately provided for her Majesty and suite, and a second table and dinner were prepared for the persons who had accompanied her. Seven o'clock passed without the King making his appearance, but an estafette reached at that hour with a dispatch, addressed to the Chateau d'Eu, and the Courier Wernet, recognising the King's writing, immediately carried it to the Queen. It contained only these words:—

"My dear Friend—I landed to-day at half-past two o'clock in excellent health and spirits."

Nearly three more hours elapsed, however, ere the Royal carriages drove up with his Majesty, the Duc de Montpensier, M. Guizot, and the numerous suite. His Majesty was in high spirits, very little fatigued, and much pleased with the agreeable surprise which conjugal affection had prepared for him.

In a few hours the party were safe at the Chateau d'Eu, and there, it was understood, his Majesty will remain some ten days.

THE ROYAL ARRIVAL AT THE FARNBOROUGH RAILWAY STATION.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT THE NEW-CROSS RAILWAY STATION.

One of the most fearful fires that have occurred in the neighbourhood of the metropolis for many years took place at a late hour on Monday evening, at the works attached to the station of the South Eastern, Brighton, and Croydon Railways at New-cross, resulting in the destruction of property to an enormous amount.

The New-cross station is to the above Railways what Wolverton is to the London and Birmingham line. It communicates with the metropolis by the Kent-road, on which it is situated; and with the offices adjoining the burning pile. It was near an hour before any engines arrived, and by this time the conflagration had spread to a long building, also used to keep carriages and steam-engines in. By eleven o'clock the roofs of both houses (which were boards covered with lead, and on iron rafters) fell in, and then the engines, amounting to about fourteen, were able to make an effectual resistance. The conflagration was fearfully rapid, the flames rushing up through the lanterns, whence they burnt with increased fury, until the roof and floors fell in. Attempts were then made to save the various shops beneath, but in vain. Engines from the dockyard at Deptford, and from the London fire brigade, reached the scene before ten o'clock, the fire having broken out at nine.

The firemen at first appeared to be completely bewildered; the flames were rushing out of the roofs and nearly every window in the octagon and fitting departments, and were roaring with an awful sound. At the same moment, the molten lead was running from the cornices round the and 'on' alighting,' expressed [his] great regret [at] the calamity. One very fortunate circumstance was, that the wells from which the engines worked were powerfully charged with water, the engines being supplied by a steam-engine on the works, and to this in a great measure may be attributed the saving of the remainder of the company's property.

At one o'clock, a great number of the engines were still in full operation, there remaining a great body of fire in the ruins. The hose of some were directing streams of water from the warehouses and the adjacent buildings into the burning mass beneath, whilst the firemen were stationed on all sides to prevent the flames from extending. Up to this period, and an hour subsequently, several attacks of the King of the French, who were to follow in another train, after the royal carriage, were to be seen mingled with the police and firemen. Their state dresses wonderfully contrasted with those of the fire corps, whose apparel was covered with mud, and their faces as black as sweepers. In the course of another half-hour or so the whole of the suite left the New-cross station in a special train, on their way to Dover.

The exact amount of property destroyed, as well as the extent of insurance, are as follows:—The octagonal building, as well as the fitting house, which was 120 feet long by 30 wide, were insured in the Westminster Fire Offices for £1600, and the contents in the Phoenix Office to the amount of £9000, making a total of £13,600. There ARRIVAL OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH DURING THE FIRE.

Thames by part of the old Croydon Canal. The area occupied by the station is about equal to that of Russell-square. It consists of an assemblage of vast workshops, large lathe and planing machine rooms, furnace rooms, carpenters' and painters' rooms, carriage and fire engine houses; and a grand octagonal engine house, nearly as large as the Colosseum, in the Regent's-park; in the centre is a stone shaft, surrounded by a circle of columns, supporting a roof in the manner of the Chapter-house, at Salisbury; between these columns are eight large doorways, with transoms for the engines and tenders. The height of this vast octagonal building is, or rather was, 70 feet; and with the range of carriage and workshops attached, it was part of the original station, as erected under the superintendence of Mr. Gibbs, then engineer to the Company: it was handsomely built of brick, with stone finishings.

The fire commenced in a loft of this large octagonal building, fitted up as a painter's shop, upwards of eighty feet in breadth, having in its centre a lantern roof, to the extreme height of the structure, seventy feet. The works were all shut up, and the interior of the station was in a state of animation in consequence of the approaching arrival of the King of the French, he having signified his intention of proceeding to Dover by this route. There were present Captain Charlewood, superintendent of the Dover Railway; Mr. Howell, deputy-superintendent of the same line; Mr. Cubitt, the engineer; with several others. While the workpeople were engaged erecting the tent on the platform, for his Majesty's reception, they were startled by cries of "Fire." The engine repository was then found to be burning in the upper part, among the paint stores, and the flames made such rapid progress, that in less than a quarter of an hour the whole building was in a blaze. The fire was greatly assisted by a quantity of oil and turpentine, as well as paint, that had been laid aside in a part of the engine-room. The police force hastened to the spot, and were most active in maintaining order, and saving the property, and books, from the blazing property, thereby exposing every one to great danger. Nevertheless every man exerted himself with the greatest intrepidity, and by that means a long range of premises used for the erection of carriages was saved. There was a spacious tank between the two buildings, but the fire was so fierce, that it completely reached over the tank, and almost set the roof in a blaze. It was indeed truly distressing to see the valuable lathes and splendid machinery in the fitting-house falling a sacrifice. There was no alternative, the whole was quickly destroyed or rendered useless. For two hours and upwards the fire continued to rage with awful violence, although its progress had, to a certain extent, been stopped. The immense mass of inflammable materials that the two buildings contained, with the heavy floors and roofs, caused the fire to be of frightful extent, the flames rising to such a great altitude as to be seen for many miles distant, attracting some thousands of persons to the spot.

His Majesty the King of the French arrived at the station at about eleven o'clock,

PUBLIC MEETING AT THE MANSION HOUSE.—THE LORD MAYOR IN THE CHAIR.

BATHS FOR THE LABOURING CLASSES.

On Wednesday a very numerous meeting was held in the Egyptian-hall of the Mansion-house, for the purpose of forming an association to furnish the labouring poor with baths and wash-houses. Several ladies were present, and on the platform we observed Lord Dudley Stuart; Mr. Byng, M.P.; Mr. Colquhoun, M.P.; Sir W. Clay, M.P.; Alderman Sir J. Pirie, Alderman W. Hunter, Alderman Sidney, Mr. Moon (late sheriff), Mr. Wors, Mr. D. Salomons, Mr. Cotton (Governor of the Bank), Mr. Seely, Archdeacon Wilberforce, Archdeacon Hale, the Rev. Dr. Russell, and a large number of other clergymen and gentlemen.

At two o'clock, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, who was accompanied by the Bishop of London, ascended the platform, and was warmly applauded on taking the chair as president of the meeting. The Lord Mayor having opened the proceedings in a brief address explanatory of the objects of the meeting, the Bishop of London, in moving the first resolution, expressive of the advantage which would be conferred upon the working classes, by providing baths and wash-houses, quoted authorities to prove the improvement of health arising from frequent ablutions. The Right Reverend Prelate went into details respecting the public baths and wash-houses at Liverpool, in which it appeared, that although the baths were on a contracted scale, 320 labourers bathed in one day. One man told him, after he had a bath on a Saturday, that he felt himself able to do another week's work.—Mr. Byng, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.—Mr. Gregg stated that he had erected baths for the use of the poor, in St. Luke's parish, at an expense of £1000. The Rev. Archdeacon Wilberforce moved the second resolution, the effect of which was, that it was desirable to extend the benefits of the institution to all parts of the metropolis.—Lord D. G. Stuart seconded the resolution, which was carried.—On the motion of the Rev. Archdeacon Hale, seconded by Sir G. Larpent, a committee was appointed to carry the resolutions into effect.

SCENE FROM "THE CONFEDERACY."

Our illustration shows the opening of the last scene of Vanbrugh's admirable comedy, lately revived with well-merited success at the Haymarket Theatre. Araminta, Corinna, Gripe, and Moneytrap, are discovered at a tea-table, very gay and laughing.

AN.—Ha! ha! ha! ha!

Mon.—Mighty well, O mighty well indeed!

ENTER CLARISSA.

Clar.—Save you, save you, good folks! you are all in rare humour methinks.

The precise incident of the sketch is, however, Moneytrap's (Farren's) attentions to Clarissa, (Miss F. Horton): the other characters are Gripe, (Strickland); Araminta, (Mrs. E. Yarnold); Corinna, (Miss J. Bennett); a veritable group from the tea-table society of the early part of the last century, when a set of tea-cups or a fan were considered a pretty New Year's Gift.

What is characterised in the admirable criticism in the Times, as the anxious, earnest, and senile appearance" of Farren, has been caught by our artist.

Leigh Hunt, speaking of the "Confederacy," says: "Dick Amlet, Mrs. Amlet, and Brass, are all perfection, after their kind—the unfeeling son, whose legs are doted on by his mother; the peddling mother, hobbling about, with fine ladies in her debt; and Brass, exquisite Brass, whom one can hardly help fancying made of the metal that christens him, and with a voice that rings accordingly. We know of no better comic writing in the world than the earlier scenes of Lord Foppington, in the 'Relapse,' and those between Dick Amlet and his mother, and of Brass securing his bargain with Dick, in the play before us."

SCENE FROM "DON CÉSAR DE BAZAN."

In our journal of last week we sketched the plot of this very effective drama, first produced, in English, at the Princess' Theatre, on Tuesday week. We now present our readers with the best "situation" in the piece, cleverly sketched by Mr. Kenny Meadows. The scene is in the third act, in which the licentious King is detected by Don Cesar. We quote the passage from the drama, with the early part of the context.

King.—Impudent! I desire you quit the room.
Don Cesar.—What! after the trouble I have had to get here. Are you—
King.—The master of this house.
Don Cesar.—The master of this house!—hem!—this house, where I have just seen the Countess de Bazan?
King.—You know her, then?
Don Cesar.—Very slightly. I've only seen her for about ten minutes. But she resides here—may I ask your name?
King.—I am—
Don Cesar.—Fh! Don Cesar de Bazan! Egad, I excel the Phoenix! for two Don Cesars have arisen from my ashes!
King.—Now that I have satisfied you, I demand to know your name?
Don Cesar.—The unflattering royal!
[Lazarillo, the page, steals behind Don Cesar, and whispers.]
Lazarillo.—It is the King!
Don Cesar.—Eh, Lazarillo!
King.—You hesitate, Sir!
Don Cesar.—The King here!—I understand it all.
King.—My question embarrasses you—I demand an answer!
Don Cesar.—Certainly.—If you are Don Cesar de Bazan, I AM THE KING OF SPAIN!
King.—What!—the King!
Don Cesar.—THE KING OF SPAIN!

The performance never fails to be received with an enthusiastic burst of applause, which it well deserves; for it is one of the finest coups de théâtre we ever remember to have witnessed.

THE QUEEN AT THE EXCHANGE.

PLATO is said to have held it as a doctrine that the revolution of ages brings the affairs of the world, and of the men who dwell therein, at the end of a certain, or rather uncertain time, round to the same condition as that in which they stood at the commencement of the cycle. Thus, could the hero of Eugene Sue's very wandering romance give us the benefit of his extended experience in an authentic form (we cannot accept Eugene as a faithful chronicler), we should hear from him that on several separate occasions, though at long intervals, he has found mankind going through the same details of war, and trading, and other earthly occupations, precisely in the same mode and manner as at the beginning of the term of centuries—provided always that Plato's theory is a true one.

We are by no means prepared to give in our adhesion to the opinion of the old philosopher. Neither can we deny that certain events become almost repetitions of others that have long preceded them in the order of time, which in its course is perpetually adding to the number of "Historical Parallels."

Some three centuries ago, when the City of London was increasing in wealth, numbers and power, and the usual place of mercantile resort had become inconvenient, a "Royal Merchant," possessed of the necessary means and munificence, did, at his own proper cost and charges, build an Exchange, for the use and accommodation of his fellow citizens. The building, when completed, was opened by a Queen, and received the name of "Royal," and great was the pomp and ceremony of the opening. That edifice saw the bargain-making, and the cautious chafferings "about their monies and their usances" of the merchants of the time of the first James; its walls re-echoed their groans over the frequent "subsidies" demanded by that King, whose pedant's learning left him both unwise and unthrifty. They heard the discontents of the merchants of this reign grow into disaffection in that of James's successor, Charles, of unhappy memory. As years wore on, and royal necessities made the royal will less scrupulous, that disaffection grew deeper and deeper; but many a substantial merchant had grown up in the principles of the Puritans—careful men with a keen eye to the things of this world, and esteeming but lightly your feathered courtier. Shakespeare foreshadows them in the "Master Dumbleton," who "liked not the security" that Falstaff offered for the price of the third yards "of satin for his short cloak and slops." And to this chariness in trade, they added a stubborn way of thinking of their own on higher matters than merchandise, such for instance as politics and religion, deeply hating both prerogative and prelacy. And as they thought so they acted; the King himself coming for loans was met by that distrust of the "security" for which Falstaff so reviles the "rascally yea-forsooth knaves;" and when he would take their money by "right divine," they demurred to the title and would not be plundered otherwise than by Act of Parliament. Then ensued war of the worst kind, the fall of Monarchy, the rise of a Cromwell, and a revival of commerce with the restoration of peace. All this the old Royal Exchange saw, but it was approaching its end. The sober citizens had scarcely shaken their heads over the profligacy and excesses of the Court—which were again sending Royalty city-ward for cash—when its busy walks became silent, and its halls of traffic void, beneath the dreary breath of the Plague. That passed over, and it was beginning to awake again to life almost with a new generation, so many had there perished of the old one, when the Great Fire swept over the city like a flaming deluge, and the centre of the City's commerce, with many a "temple and tower" beside, went to the ground.

Of its successor less can be said. Its history brings us down to our own times, through an uninteresting age, when the Lombards had degenerated into mere bankers—handling copper shovels, and wrinkling their brows over bills and cheques—all the picturesqueness and romance of money-lending in the olden time gone from them. The gown and cap of the merchant, as we see them in old engravings, or in the dress of the Blue-coat Boy, had given place to broad-skirted coats and deep-flipped waistcoats, and wigs and shoe-buckles! Could anything individually great or magnificent come from men so appalled? Yet did our old grasshopper-crowned acquaintance witness many things, and some of them not unworthy. It saw the end of the Stuarts, and the beginning of the National Debt, with the rapid and altogether frightful growth and development thereof; it saw both the beginning and end of that gigantic folly, so fatally infectious then, so utterly inexplicable now,—the South Sea Scheme, and other bubble-like speculations, needless and tedious here to name. But those who congregated beneath it, did also art their parts, in their day and generation, right manfully. They extended our trade to all quarters of the world, and when assailed almost by the united strength of the nations of Europe, they with an energy nearly unparalleled, enabled successive Governments to find the funds which enabled us to "win through" a long and terribly expensive war. We speak of them, of course, as the representatives of the whole mercantile body of the empire, which, directly or indirectly, must be represented in its great centre. But the days of the existence of this mart of nations, like that of its predecessor, were numbered, and like that too it sank in flames, as we can all remember.

A few years have passed and another Exchange is standing on the old foundations. The first was opened by Queen Elizabeth with all the regal pomp of the sixteenth century. The last, within a few hours from the date of our present number, will be opened by Queen Victoria, with pomp and royal ceremony also. We could wish that the corporate and governing body of the City had retained the same place and influence, in proportion to the wealth and numbers of the City, as it did in the days of Gresham; but the greatest of our mercantile names seem to hold aloof from civic honours; it is lamentable, but the fact. This, however, is by the way.

The present ceremonial will, in many things, resemble that which was presided over by the "Virgin Queen," for state and its observances partake of the traditional, and are transmitted down with comparatively slight changes. But in all else how different! What an empire, and what a metropolis! How vast the increase in all that constitutes the strength of nations in the England of Victoria since it was the England of Elizabeth! The empire is one of many tongues and nations; the population of its chief city is counted, not by thousands, but by hundreds of thousands; and as for the commerce of the realm and City of Gresham's royal Mistress, it was, as compared with that of the England and London of to-day, but as the rivulet to the ocean; its development has been as vast as that which could bring "Dordogne's forest from an acorn cup." Between the day on which a Queen of England passed through the Temple-gate to open the first Royal Exchange, and the hour which will see another Queen of the same fair land pass along the same road on the same august errand, great has been the destiny of England among the nations of the world. At this point the mind naturally goes forward to the future, and asks itself the question, what will be the state of this "crowning city" of the traffickers of the earth, when three centuries shall have passed over the now white walls, the fair chambers, and sculptured portico of the New Exchange? What will be the condition of the Empire when the generation that gazes on the pageantry of to-day shall—with many succeeding ones—be mingled with the dust? They are solemn questions, and, happily for us, can find no answer from human intelligence. The misery of Adam, when the Angel, in Milton's immortal epic, revealed to him the doom of the future race of man, is but a type of what would be felt by all if the coming time were not, with infinite wisdom and mercy, hidden from our ken. The past we know; the present we can govern; for the future we can only hope, making our actions such as to render a cheerful hope justifiable. Let the spirit of commerce, then, when it takes up its new abode, work with the energy and activity that have always marked it. Above all, let it preserve that integrity and commercial honour which have been so long the pride of the English merchant, and then will it have done the best to secure a still further development of the wealth, extent, power, and numbers of that realm over which ELIZABETH watched, and which VICTORIA now rules, Queens who, differing in much, yet resemble each other in the extent to which they have commanded the loyalty and affection of the people, and in this also—that the commercial activity of their respective ages received the countenance of both. In its reference to our history, the opening of the New Royal Exchange by Queen Victoria, is one of the most interesting events of modern times.

THE CHAR-A-BANC PRESENTED BY THE KING OF THE FRENCH TO HER MAJESTY.

This elegant vehicle is a modification of the family jaunting van of Normandy, and may, one day, become as great a favourite in the parks of Windsor as it is in the royal forest of Enghien. It is built to accommodate eight persons; the body of the carriage being divided into four double seats. A neat canopy, supported by brass pillars, protects the company against the sun; and from a series of rollers, on the inside, screening curtains may be drawn down as shelter from dust or rain. The framework of the carriage is light, but substantial, firmly guarded with iron fittings, and suited to the traffic of rougher roads than are ordinarily found in this country. The decorations are neat and appropriate. The body is painted dark blue, with a high enamel-like polish; the seats, of plumed cane, are lined with black-coloured worsted silks; the lamps, handles, edgings, &c., of silver gilt; the hangings of buff-coloured flowered serge, bordered with fringes and tassels of Rowden white, alternating with Orleans blue. Approach to the seats is gained from the sides, by three steps, which close and shut in beneath the floor of the carriage. We wish her Majesty and her royal family—for whom, we believe, the carriage will be chiefly used—much pleasure in introducing it to a neighbourhood already Replete with art and science, taste and beauty.

FASHIONS FOR THE ENSUING MONTH.

PARIS, Wednesday.

The watering-places have yielded up their fair tenants, and the races are finished for the year. Every day Paris fills more and more. Fashions revive in all their pristine delft, and assume daily more splendour. However, the fashions you will most appreciate will be the costumes of chateaux, since all your English fashionables are at present sojourning at their country seats. A young belle, of the highest rank and fashion, arriving the other day on a visit at the chateau of the pretty Comtesse de B—, and well aware that the profound repose and solitude she was invited to enjoy would consist in an uninterrupted succession of parties of pleasure, carried with her, in deference to the assurance "that ideas of dress were out of the question," a simple collection of toilettes, each adapted, with marvellous felicity, to each hour and occupation of the day, and bearing ample testimony to the well-known taste of the Marquise de B—, as distinguished for her elegance as for her wit. The chief of these costumes, and three which obtained the greatest success, were a soi-disant robe de chambre, a pelisse for country drives, a dinner and an evening dress, of which we purpose to give a description for the benefit of your fair readers.

The robe de chambre was of sky blue cashmere, lined with pink; the sleeves à la Turque, that is, open from the fore-arm, with under sleeves of pink silk: it was fastened in front with clasp of a tressil form, trimmed with gimp. To match this charming negligé she wore Oriental slippers, embroidered in blue and pink on a black ground. Her band-dress consisted of lappets of Valenciennes lace, trimmed with pink and blue striped ribbon.

The redingote, for morning walks or drives, was of striped Pelin of two different shades of green, trimmed up the front with gimp; with small loose sleeves, coming down to a short distance of the wrist, with some mouches of lace Point de Paris.

The bonnet accompanying this pelisse was a Leghorn, with a bow of green and white sarsenet ribbon, fastening two at three fern-leaves, which fell gracefully over the front of the bonnet.

The dinner-dress, of still greater richness, was of that colour which our Parisian ancestors called Cheveux de la Reine. A trimming of fringe of apple-green colour contrasted charmingly with the delicate colour of the silk. This fringe, two rows of which ornamented the skirt, after passing beneath the waistband, formed a Van on the body of the dress. These jockys placed over the epaulettes of the half-sleeves were also trimmed with the same fringe. The evening dress was in white tulle, with a double skirt, the edge of each skirt embroidered in coloured silk; the body not so decorated as they have been worn of late, and the sleeves trimmed with three puffs of tulle, with a row of English lace at the bottom of the third. The English fashion which has universally prevailed all over Europe, that of wearing tulle pelisses, is now universally adopted by ladies, modified in form and under a different name, being called a paradeuse. Satin is frequently employed for the purpose—black the only colour; but Scotch cashmere is far more effective; when made outward, of a light colour, with a slight lining within. As to the accessory ornaments, they merely consist in braiding, or in that elegant, new, and most fascinating invention, velvet lace.

The most fashionable model of autumnal mantles is made square and topped, waisted and lined with white satin, with a wide pelisse trimmed with two founces, beneath which escape two tulle-sleeves, which remain invisible. In the trimmings figure three narrow bands of velvet (which by-the-by are now employed in every possible manner), as, for example, in collars, mixed with blonde and flowers. The Amazon dresses, the pelisses of woollen tissue and of silk are trimmed with this velvet, which produces also a fascinating effect on paypays pelisses. The latter, a novel tissue, only made of uniform colours, is highly distinguished. It has a high body, only opened in the shape of a V, narrow and prolonged down to the waist, and framed in by three or five narrow bands of the above mentioned velvet. The latter are likewise adapted to silver grey dresses of damask. That which the fashionable Russian Countess P., appeared with in the Tuileries a few days ago, had a high body, and broad turned-down collar, light whalebones inserted only near the waist. Half-sleeves, terminating in a trimming of braid, with a full under sleeve of guipure projecting beneath. The skirt with two founces, headed with bands of velvet, and trimmed with the same below. As a promenade toilette, and as the most coquettish, we may take as a model that of the Marquise d'A—, a dress in Gothic pelin, of a light shade of colour; the body rather low, and long waisted, with pleats fastened down below, and gathered on the epaulettes, sleeves à la Chambord, that is to say, half tight, and only reaching a little below the elbow, leaving room for an under sleeve, with bracelets of plumetis; round the opening of the sleeve a round fold, slashed in the style of costumes of the days of Francis I. On the body, two crossway pleats, undulating and fastened; the same on the skirt, but larger. A brooch of the choicest elegance decorated the opening of the bodice, supporting, with the aid of a porte-manteau, a marquise chain. This jewel, of novel invention, and now so sought after, is of exquisite workmanship. It is a chain, generally adorned with seven oblong beads, either of malachite, jasper or onyx. With the assistance of the double mousetail, this chain, which resembles the chaplet worn by deities, can be made to join most elegantly the brooch at the upper part of the dress, or pass from right to left, over the waistband, where, on one side, it may bear a watch, and be maintained on the other by an ornamental hook.

Ornaments for cuffs will be exceedingly varied. The feathers and shaded willow, which were so much admired at the exposition, were only forerunners of much handsomer articles. Already we have embroidered feathers, jetted plaques, hybrid willows, double branched asarhouts, peacock-scyphs, gladioli, and japed herons, tempting the dispirited in every first-rate shop. Capotes and bonnets have not as yet changed their form, but we are on the eve of a reform. Some ladies of the highest fashion show a tendency to make the collars only half bright—as the beautiful Reinesse F— does. As fancy costume, lace bonnets, mixed with ribbons and still more small Albion toques, made in chenille and gold set, will enjoy a furious vogue for the theatre and for balls. Our communications with Algeria are exerting a curious effect upon fashion—above all in the style of various and mantles. On all sides you see nothing but barbues, cabans, caftans, and Moorish capes, of most eccentric forms—and the white barbues for the crumb-rod of the opera, so exquisitely elegant, and whose attractiveness there is an additional merit, are still the perfection of bon ton. This is another instance how much costume, in all ages, is connected with the conquest and history of nations.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Paris Opposition press has not yet satisfied its appetite for slanderous accusation and insinuation in reference to the recent visit of the King, but the violence of the attacks is nevertheless diminished.

There is little news in the papers. The Duke d'Angoulême had arrived in Paris from Africa, after an absence of twelve months.

The trial of the Duke de Montmorency, Prince de Robecq, for the distribution of alleged seditious emblems, took place on Monday, before the Court of Assizes of the Seine. The Duke de Pezanos, Marquis de Larochejaquein, and several other distinguished personages of the Legitimist party, were in court. The Prince de Robecq was defended by M. Berryer. The prosecution was conducted by the Avocat-Général. It was urged that there had been said at the house of the noble defendant words of the Duke de Bordeaux, and books containing entries, showing that these emblems of sedition, as they were styled by the Avocat-Général, had been distributed and sold. The Avocat-Général stated that the defence set up was, that these books had been sold for the purpose of increasing the fund of the Society of St. Louis, whose professional object is the relief of distressed persons of the Legitimist party, but he contended that this society was more bent to conceal the political manoeuvres of that party. M. Berryer denied that there was anything political in the affair. He asserted that the society was purely one of charity, and that his client had been actuated by charitable motives alone. After a very animated appeal to the jury, to which the Avocat-Général replied, the President summed up, and the jury, after deliberating only five minutes, pronounced a verdict of acquittal.

The Monsieur Parisien contains a very significant announcement in these terms:—"It is said that Captain Breton, Governor of the Marquesas, is promoted to the rank of Commander of the Legion of Honour." We do not see any confirmation of the paragraph in the Debate, but our private letters speak of the news as positive, and anticipate a good deal of excitement in consequence of it.

A telegraphic despatch had been received in Paris from Perpignan, dated the 16th inst., at nine o'clock in the morning, with the intelligence that Generals Ametier and Santa Cruz, accompanied by other refugees, having secretly quitted Perpetua for the purpose of returning to Spain, were arrested during the night of the 15th and 16th, at Ceret, in the department of the Eastern Pyrenees, by the French custom-house officers.

The Journal des Débats has a long and mysterious article, the object of which is to prove that the translator of the treaty between England and China was bribed by the Chinese Government to suppress certain parts of the treaty, and change the meaning of others; the consequence of which, it contends, will be to ruin the recently-established commercial town of Victoria, in which the British merchants have expended vast sums of money, and to carry the monopoly of the trade back again to Canton. The Debate attempts to supply the omissions made by the translator; but although we are sure that no responsible contemporary would not knowingly lend itself to a misrepresentation, yet as the treaty was ratified many months ago, and there have been ample opportunities to verify it, we are of opinion that the Debate is the victim of some mystification.

According to the latest accounts from Algeria, Abd-el-Kader continues to be encamped at El-Aoudj, on the right bank of the Moulouya, twenty-five leagues to the east of the Morocco frontier. His Deira is composed of about three hundred tents of the tribes of Haouss, Oulad, Beni Amer, &c.; some hundred or eight hundred tents of the same tribes are dispersed amongst the Beni-Scheneas, the Moudrois, &c. The camp is composed of three hundred tents, the horses very fat; and about three hundred and fifty infantry, badly armed. Before occupying this position, the Emir was at Oued-el-Kessab, near to Aroun-Sidi-Melouit. It is only twenty-four days since he retired to El-Aoudj. This movement was made in the direction of the mountains, in all probability on learning that the treaty of peace had been signed by the Emperor. In the Deira and camp nearly everybody has been laid up with a violent fever, and many persons have fallen victims to it. Abd-el-Kader has been seriously ill.

The French war party have discovered another man's nest, on the alleged occupation by England of the north front of Prince's Island, on the western coast of Africa, belonging to the Portuguese, under the pretext, as they call it, of establishing there a depot of coal for the transatlantic steam-packets. The National de l'Ouest thus describes the motive which England has in view. It says:—"The following is the real object of England in taking forcible possession of this important point, for the making it only a depot for coal may be very well believed to be a mere pretence. France has just established a factory on the Gabon, a point essentially military for her navy in time of war. Prince's Island being at the mouth of the Gabon, the English have evidently determined to secure to themselves a point from which they could blockade the river against our ships in the event of a collision. Thus, besides the violation of a friendly territory, an excess which the English have the shameful habit of committing, their attempt on Prince's Island is directed against us. It must be confessed, after so many instances, that if the entente cordiale produce any fruits they are bitter to us."

SPAIN.

Our letters from Madrid contain the announcement of an event likely to create considerable interest in Spain, and which indeed may lead to important consequences. Queen Christina was married on the 13th inst. in her own private apartments to the Duke of Rinnar, the illustrious character who was so well known formerly as Blanca. Every one is aware that a marriage took place between these parties some years ago, but it was never recognised; but it is now asserted that the formal announcement of the marriage is made in consequence of the permission of the Court of Rome. The ceremony on this latter occasion was performed by the Patriarch of the Indies, in presence of the Ministers of the Crown. It does not appear that the young Queen was present. This avowed marriage is likely to give rise to some difficult questions, and a Council of Ministers was convened, to consider what should be done in the circumstances. The principal questions which will come before the Council are—1st. As to the form in which this great event will be published to the world. 2d. If her Majesty the Queen Mother is to be allowed to retain her title, or if she is to sink down to that of Duchess of Rinnar. 3d. As to the amount of pension to be settled upon Queen Christina out of the patrimony of Queen Isabella; and lastly, it is to be determined whether or not the Ministry should demand of the Cortes, in the name of a national remuneration and testimony of gratitude to her Majesty, an addition to the pension to be allowed to her by Queen Isabella, in the event of the sum allowed not being equal to her Majesty's dowry.

Some other existing questions arise out of this event, for instance, in regard to the legitimacy of certain children, and the mode in which Queen Christina has disposed of large sums of money left to her by the will of King Ferdinand only so long as she remained a widow. By her marriage the Queen loses her title as Queen Dowager, but another decree is to continue to her the title of Queen, and to preserve to her all her privileges at the court.

The letters by the ordinary mail are on the 15th only, but a telegraphic despatch, dated the 16th, announces the constitution of the two Chambers:—

"M. Castro y Ordoñez has been appointed President of the Congress. The four Vice-Presidents and the four Secretaries have been chosen from the different parties in the Chambers.

"The Vice-Presidents are MM. Pacheco, Gorrañe, Armero, and Perpinan.

"The bill relative to the reform of the Constitution has been presented to the Congress. The Ministry here, at the same time, demanded permission to discuss some organic laws."

The Madrid papers say that the treaty between Spain and Morocco was being executed with the last grace and faith. The affairs of the Ryo, it was said, are likely to lose all its gravity in the official investigation instituted. It appears that the officer of the Ryo had really passed the line of limitation, and that the vessel had been fired upon by the English batteries of Gibraltar without any intention of sinking it. The hope that this delicate affair will be arranged by diplomatic negotiations is openly expressed, it is said, by Mr. Balwe.

PORTUGAL.

According to our Lisbon letters of the 15th inst., the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the use made of the extraordinary powers granted to Government during the late troubles (of which committee the brother of the minister Cabral was a member) was favourable to the Government. The documents referred to in the minister's report of the use made of those powers were moved for, and their production opposed by the Government. The amount of the expenditure of the loan of 2000 contos for the suppression of the revolt were likewise moved for, and referred, but promised to be produced at some future period.

A bill has been introduced into the Chamber of Peers for the abolition of slavery in the Portuguese possessions in Asia, by the Count de Lavradio and the Viscount de Sa da Bandeira, but was opposed by Ministers, and was lost by a majority of 23 votes against 15.

The peers have likewise had an important discussion on the question of ecclesiastical education. The bill for erecting diocesan seminaries throughout the kingdom, in which the clergy, with a view to their moral perfection, are to be educated apart from lay institutions (only a small proportion going to Coimbra for a complete course of theology), passed this (deputies last session, and came now before the Upper Chamber. The Deputies had decided that the professors in these seminaries should be appointed by the Government, but the Committee of the Peers recommended that it should be vested in the diocesan prelates respectively. But the charter declares (rigorously or wrongly) that it belongs to the Executive to fill up ecclesiastical benefices as well as civil appointments; the Government remained silent, taking no part whatever in the discussion; and the peers voted, by 23 against 15, against the proposal of their committee. The ecclesiastical professors will therefore be appointed by the Government, the prelates having only the privilege of proposing.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian Chambers were opened by King Leopold on Tuesday, with rather a long speech, which, however, it is not necessary to publish, as it related chiefly to local matters. In the first part of the speech, the King alluded to commercial topics, and stated that he had concluded with the German Zollverein a treaty of navigation and commerce. His Majesty then said, that by a recent convention, the postal communications between Belgium and Great Britain have been regulated on a basis at once more extended and more favourable to commerce. The charge on letters has been reduced, and special advantages have been stipulated for the transmission of foreign correspondence. The only other point worth notice was a reference to finance. His Majesty announced that the Government had been able to effect two important financial operations. The receipts balanced the expenditure, but his Majesty recommended the adoption of some plan to create a permanent excess of revenue.

HOLLAND.

The Session of the States General was opened on Monday by the King in person, with a speech which did not present any remarkable feature. His Majesty alluded to the satisfactory state of political relations, to the improvement in some branches of manufacture, and to his desire for the increase of instruction. The King also stated, that Holland would not confine itself to bare words when improvement in commercial legislation should have to be considered; and after remarking upon a determination to effect every practicable economy, in conclusion implied the blessing of God on the country, and expressed a hope that it would continue to develop those virtues which have always characterized the Dutch people.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens of the 6th inst. give a most deplorable account of the condition of Greece. Complete division exists in the Cabinet, and a change of Ministry appears inevitable. King Otto probably, by way of dissipating his anxiety, had just departed on an excursion to Euboea and the frontier. The latter adds—"Never since that period of anarchy which succeeded the assassination of the President Count Capodistria has the country been in so deplorable and lawless a state. From every province daily reports arrive of fearful crimes. During the few last days of the session for Elia six persons were assassinated. In Maura more than fifty persons have fallen victims to political enmity or private revenge. Within the last fortnight thirty-six acts of brigandage have been committed in Acarnania, attended with six murders. Yesterday an official report was received here that a band of thirty brigands had taken possession of the narrow mountainous pass of Klisera, in Acarnania, and had detained and plundered every one that passed, bidding them to turn till their day's work was over; and in this manner more than seventy persons had been robbed and slaughtered."

THE WEST INDIES.

The Teviot steamer has arrived with the West India mails. The dates are:—Demerara, the 19th; St. Kitts, the 20th; Barbadoes, St. Vincent, and Dominica, the 21st; Jamaica, the 22nd; Antigua, the 23rd; and St. Lucia, the 25th ult. The St. Thomas dates are of the 20th. The intelligence contained in the papers is of little interest. There is a rumour of an earthquake, but it does not contain any details, in addition to those received by the last arrival.

The Demerara Legislature have voted, in accordance with the terms of Lord Stanley's despatch, £75,000, for the encouragement of Hill Coast emigration, and the revenue of the colony appears to be increasing.

The last cargo of sugar for the season had been shipped from Barbadoes, and the total quantity exported is estimated at 21,554 hhds., which is about 2000 short of the production of 1843. The weather in this island continued excessively warm and dry, so that the appearance of the young canes was scarcely so favourable as at the departure of the previous mail.

UNITED STATES.

The Cambridge, Captain Barrow, has brought New York papers to the 4th inst., four days later than those received by the Britannia, but their contents are uninteresting. The papers are almost exclusively occupied with electing news. The commercial accounts are favourable: more business was doing.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SMUGGLERS AND CONTRABANDISTS.—At the Surrey Sessions, on Tuesday, a man was indicted for having fraudulently obtained £12 from a tea dealer, who had been induced to give him that sum on account for two pretended parcels of smuggled tea, which he was to purchase from the prisoner at the low price of 3s. 6d. per lb., though the tea was declared to be worth 10s. On opening the packets, however, they were found to contain (with the exception of half a cone of tea, skillfully disposed in each at a corner, where the prisoner drew a small sample) sawdust and ashes. The prosecutor, on cross-examination, admitted that he sold contraband goods. The prisoner, having a good character, was recommended to mercy by the jury, and this, the chairman said, saved him from transportation; as it was (he having been found guilty also on another similar charge), he was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour. The prosecutor was remiss his expenses, the bench severely reproaching his dishonest design to defraud the revenue and the fair trader.

FATAL OCCURRENCE ON THE GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAY.—An inquest has been held at Altrincham, (Cheshire) on view of the body of Elizabeth Astbury, aged 39, who was killed by the early train from Crewe on Tuesday morning week, at about three o'clock. It appeared in evidence that the deceased was a native of Stoke, in the Staffordshire Potteries, and had been visiting her friends at Manchester. The footstep of the deceased were traced from Crewe to Chadderton; at the latter place she was found dead by Evan Roberts, the engine-man employed by the Grand Junction Company, who industriously saw something between the rails as he passed. Chadderton from Crewe, at the three o'clock train on Tuesday morning; on his return from Chester, shortly afterwards, he stopped the train at Chadderton, where he found the body of the deceased dreadfully mutilated, portions of the skull and brain being scattered on and about the rails. The jury returned a verdict of accidental death, and imposed a nominal death on the train.

Letters from Cordova of the 11th inst. mention that a rich landed proprietor in the neighbourhood of Fuente Ovejuna, in the Quebradas, has been carried off by a troop of robbers, who demanded 30,000 reals ransom. The smuggler Waverro, and seven other brigands, were said to be the authors of this act of violence.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The Court met again on Monday. The Recorder, in his address to the grand jury, stated that the calendar contained the names of 186 prisoners for trial, and that some of the offences were of a very serious description.

THE ATTEMPTED MURDER AT A SHOOTING GALLERY IN HOLBORN.

On Wednesday the Hon. William Ross Tuckett, aged 31, was tried before Mr. Justice Maule and Mr. Baron Rolfe, for firing a pistol at Mr. Smith, the gun-maker, of Holborn, with intent to murder him.

The prisoner looked calmly round in a perfectly indifferent manner, and then leaned forward upon the bar, as if lost in thought. He is a man of mild and prepossessing appearance, and of handsome though somewhat delicate features. On being called upon to plead to the indictment, he in a low tone of voice replied: "Not guilty."

Mr. Charnock, who appeared for the prosecution, then proceeded briefly to state the circumstances of the case to the jury.

The first witness called was Mr. Thomas Smith, who was still in a feeble condition from the effects of his wound. He deposed:—I reside at 288, High Holborn, and am a gun-maker. I was going to a shooting gallery there. On the 6th of July last the prisoner came into my premises. I had never seen him before, to my knowledge. I was in the gallery at the time. My son Alfred Smith was in the shop. On coming into the shop he asked if he could be accommodated with a pair of duelling pistols. I got him a brace, and loaded them myself. He took one of them and fired it off, but complained that it pulled too hard, saying he should like one that would go off more easily. I told him I could set the hair-trigger, and then it would go off sufficiently easily. I did so, and he fired it off, but he then complained that it went off too easily, and said: "Let me have it as I had it at first." I loaded him a third and a fourth. At first he fired at a distance of fifteen yards, but afterwards wished to have a longer distance, and the third pistol he fired at a distance of thirty yards, and hit the mark. While I was loading the fifth pistol, the fourth was discharged, and I exclaimed: "Good God, I am shot; this gentleman has shot me!" I afterwards was removed to the hospital, but did not leave the hall until about some weeks afterwards. Some corroborative evidence was then given.

Mr. Clarkson (with whom was Mr. Bodkin) then rose to address the jury for the prisoner. The defence called the learned gentleman had to submit to that of insanity; and, having entered into a narrative of the family and circumstances of the prisoner, and the state of his mind previously to and down to the period of the unfortunate transaction, said he should prove, on the highest testimony, both medical and otherwise, that he had been in an unsound state of mind for some time past, and was so at the period when he committed the offence of which he stood charged.

Mr. Clarkson called Lord Audley, Dr. Munro, Dr. Warburton, and other witnesses, who gave evidence which left no doubt whatever as to the insane state of the prisoner's mind.

Mr. Justice Maule summed up, and the jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict of "Not Guilty, on the ground of Insanity."

The prisoner was accordingly ordered to be detained during her Majesty's pleasure.

THE SLAVE TRADING CASE.—On Wednesday morning Thomas Jennings, the captain of the Augusta, surrendered on discharge of his bail, to answer an indictment charging him with having navigated the said ship with a view to carry on the slave trade. It will be the recollection of our readers that the defendant at the last sessions of this court had put in a plea of autrefois acquit, to which a demurrer was taken on the part of the Crown, and the question was argued before the periti judges, Mr. Justice Wightman, and Mr. Justice Greenwell. Those learned individuals took time to consider their judgment, and on Wednesday Mr. Baron Rolfe read a lengthy judgment, which overruled the objections taken on behalf of the prisoner, and held that the prisoner had not been tried at Sierra Leone for the offence specifically charged in the present indictment. The case on the application of the prisoner's Counsel has since been postponed till next session.

MANSLAUGHTER.—Last week we gave an account of the examination at Bow-street, of Thomas Stokes, charged with the murder of Obadiah Garrett. On Wednesday he was placed at the bar for trial, but Mr. Clarkson, for the prisoner, begged leave to retract the plea of not guilty. His client was now anxious to plead guilty. He had been originally committed on the charge of wilful murder, but the grand jury had thrown out the bill, and sent up one for the manslaughter. Mr. Bodkin, for the prosecution, recommended the prisoner to the merciful consideration of the Court. A number of highly respectable witnesses, some of whom had come up from Exmouth, the prisoner's native place, gave him a most excellent character, and one of them produced a paper signed by several magistrates, bearing testimony to the respectability and good character of the prisoner. Mr. Baron Rolfe addressed the prisoner, and having commented upon the evil effects of intemperance, sentenced him to three months' imprisonment.

FRAUDS OF HORSE-DEALERS.—George Henry Ward, aged 30, stable-keeper; and George Ward, aged 19, groom, were indicted for obtaining, by false pretences, from Mr. W. Angerstein the sum of £115 10s., with intent to cheat and defraud him thereof. In an early report the defendants were charged with the offence of conspiracy. Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Ballantine were for the prosecution; and Messrs. Bodkin and Whinn appeared for the defendants. The charge was made against the defendants under the following circumstances:—The prosecutor, a gentleman residing at Blackheath, had been attracted by an advertisement in the Times, representing three horses for sale, with a description given of their excellent qualities, together with their sound state of health; the advertisement concluded by stating that a fair trial would be allowed to any person likely to become a purchaser. Mr. Angerstein went to Gloucester-mews, and was shown the two horses and a mare by the younger prisoner, Mr. (Mr. Angerstein) inquired whether they were the same horses that had been advertised in the Times. He was informed by the younger prisoner that they were the same, and that he had the care of them, and that they had been sent to the older prisoner, Mr. W., to be sold by commission. The older prisoner came into the stables about half an hour after, and stated that the horses had been sent to him by a person of the name of Lloyd—that he knew the family very well, and that they lived at St. Paul's-on-Avon. Mr. Angerstein gave a cheque upon Glyn and Co. for the £115 10s., receiving a warranty from the older prisoner for the soundness of the horses, and that if they should not turn out to be what had been represented, the money should be returned in seven days afterwards. Mr. Angerstein, immediately the sale was concluded, sent his servant, together with the younger prisoner, with the horses to the Veterinary College, to have them passed as sound. A very short time elapsed before Mr. Angerstein received a letter from Mr. Spooner, of the College, informing him that all the horses were unsound. He (Mr. Angerstein), upon the receipt of the above letter, ordered his servant to take the horses back, for by this time he discovered that a gross fraud had been practised upon him; and until another advertisement appeared in the paper, similar to the one which had taken him in, all trace of the prisoners was lost. This second advertisement nearly entrapped a Mr. Prior, who was anxious to purchase a horse; and seeing that the advertisement represented the descriptions of horses likely to suit him, he proceeded to the place referred to, and was only prevented from being duped by the timely arrival of the police in plain clothes, who, by some sign, put him on his guard. Several witnesses were called in support of the above evidence. The case was then argued at considerable length both for the prosecution and the defence. The Recorder having summed up in a very clear manner, the jury returned a verdict against both prisoners of guilty upon the fourth and fifth counts, wherein it states that the prisoners conspired together to cheat and defraud Mr. Angerstein. The Recorder said, to put an end to such diabolical frauds, he felt it his duty to make an example of the present case; but he should do so with a marked distinction, as he looked upon the younger prisoner as merely the servant of the older, and, therefore, should sentence him to four months' imprisonment in the new prison, Westminster Bridewell, and the older prisoner to twelve months in the same place.

POLICE.

A MAN CHARGED WITH MURDERING HIS WIFE.—At Union-hall, a Mr. Henry Benson, an apothecary, in Newport-street, Lambeth, has been examined on suspicion of causing the death of his wife soon after she had given birth to a child. Mr. Houston, a surgeon, the prisoner's father-in-law, stated, that on last Thursday or night he was informed that his daughter had received considerable injury at the hands of the prisoner, and that she used of those injuries. The witness described that an examination had taken place since his daughter's decease, and that it was pronounced that the injuries inflicted were on the lower part of the spine. He was present when his daughter was dying, and she mentioned to him that the prisoner had done her the injury. The witness added that he believed no person was in the room at the time of the alleged injury, but the witness attending on his daughter had heard a scuffle in the bed-room. The nurse (named I see) stated, that while she was attending on the deceased last Thursday or night, on leaving the room and going down stairs, she heard a scuffling noise in the bed-room, and heard the deceased complain of ill-usage on the part of her husband; that the next morning witness found her mistress insensible, and although she recovered her senses in some measure after that, yet she died within a few days, and then expired. She heard the deceased tell her father that the prisoner had ill-used her, but she did not describe the manner in which he did it. Mr. Fisher, a surgeon, stated, that he had instituted an external examination on being applied of the circumstances, and discovered that her death had arisen from injury of the lower part of the spine, which appeared to have been caused by violence. The prisoner said that the injury of which his wife died was from natural causes, and that he had done nothing to produce it. Mr. Trell remanded the prisoner until a post mortem examination of the deceased had taken place. (An inquest was held on the body of Mrs. Benson, at the George, Lambeth Walk, on Tuesday. Mr. James Laver, surgeon, of Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road, deposed to making a post mortem examination of the body, and after detailing at considerable length the wounds, he attributed death to the paralysis of the phrenic nerve. The spinal chord was affected by some shock, but whether from a fall or blow, he could not say. He had no doubt that some degree of violence had been used. The deceased and her husband had hitherto lived on very good terms. The Coroner adjourned the inquiry for further evidence.)

CONVICTS FOR MURDER.—Alfred Edwards, a young man describing himself as "a pickle manufacturer," who has been many times sentenced from Whip-street, underwent a final examination on Monday, upon a charge of having poisoned Jane Gregory, a young woman of loose character, with whom he had for some time past lived. There had been a little quarrel between them, but on the occasion out of which the present charge originated the prisoner visited the deceased at her lodgings in Spitalfields, and a reconciliation appeared to have taken place, and in the course of that evening the deceased drank several times from a bottle containing what was said to be "brandy and bitters," given to her at the time by the prisoner. She was afterwards exceedingly sick, and continued so until the following morning, when she died with the symptoms of poison, having repeatedly, and with her dying breath, declared to every one that her illness was occasioned solely by the liquid which "Alf," the prisoner, had given her. In the stomach a slight odour of hydrocyanic (prussic) acid was detected, arising no doubt from the flavouring of bitter almonds from which it is abundantly obtained. At the prisoner's residence Sergeant Leubert found a paper marked "Poison," containing a quantity of sugar of lead, and another paper containing a white powder, which Dr. Lenson said was what is called white precipitate, used sometimes for clearing plate. He, but decidedly poisonous. The Coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against the prisoner more than a fortnight since, and the Coroner's warrant was of course issued for his commitment to Newgate upon that charge; but the evidence appeared to be very unsatisfactory, and at length it was suggested that the body, which had been buried immediately after the inquest, should be exhumed and further examined. On Friday last it was accordingly taken from the grave, and such of the viscera as were required being removed from it in the presence of the coroner, the police, and other witnesses, the remains were again committed to the earth. After a good deal of evidence, Mr. Brougham informed the prisoner that he would be committed to Newgate to take his trial, and the witnesses were bound over to prosecute. The prisoner, who appeared very dejected, and looked as if he had wept a great deal, said he would reserve his defence until the trial.

TWO LEGAL WRANGLERS.—COSTS AND SHARP PRACTICE.—In general the practitioners of the law are amiable enough amongst their own class and vent their ill-humour only on those against whom they proceed. An instance, however, occurred at Guildhall, on Monday, of a dispute between the attorneys themselves; it also afforded an illustration of the tender mercies of the law, as well as the general practice of the profession in regard to legal technicalities. Mr. Guy, of the firm of Addis and Guy, solicitors, Westminster, appeared before Alderman Wilson, upon a summons charging him with having used threats to Mr. May, another solicitor, on the 16th inst., at the Judge's Chambers in Chancery-lane, whereby a breach of the peace might have been occasioned. The complainant said they were before the Judge on Wednesday, on an information in a writ, and on leaving the chambers the defendant said to him, "Unless you recall the letter you have written to me, or apologise, I will browbeat you. I will bring a stick twice as big as the one you carry." He told his clerk that he intended to assault him. Witness wrote to him, requiring him to apologise, and he replied by an abusive letter. Joseph Liddell, Mr. May's clerk, was called to prove that half an hour after the conversation with Mr. May, Mr. Guy told witness he should "slap it into him" when he saw him. Mr. Guy denied that he had used the language mentioned by the clerk, but he admitted having demanded that the letter should be recalled or apologised for. Mr. May said whatever he had written was with consideration, and he could not withdraw it. Mr. Guy then proceeded to state that a poor man at Twickenham owed a small debt of £3, and Mr. May was instructed to apply for it. He did so by letter, requiring payment by one o'clock next day, or a writ would be issued. In the course of the past this letter would not reach the poor man until the morning of the day the money was to be paid by one o'clock. Defendant was applied to, and on behalf of the poor man begged for time, but the writ was taken out, and £3 10s. costs incurred. Defendant wrote again requesting delay, or he would take advantage of a technical error to annul the proceedings. The answer was refused, unless the attorney would undertake to pay the debt and costs. Defendant then took out the summons to appear before the Judge at chambers, on the ground that it was not a proper writ or a true copy. The letter he received from Mr. May on this occasion had called forth the demand that it should be recalled. Mr. May began his letter by saying he was surprised defendant had recommended "so low tricks," and that as the Judge then in attendance set his face against "sharp practitioners," he would probably amend the error on the payment of a small fee. Upon hearing the summons, the Judge postponed his decision. As they retired, Guy said to Mr. May, "When this is over, I shall have a matter to settle with you." Mr. May replied, "I should like to catch you at it," holding up a great stick. Defendant told him he should bring a stick twice as big as that, perhaps, the next time they met. Mr. May had no right to impute low tricks and sharp practice to him. Alderman Wilson asked the complainant what had induced him to use such offensive terms to a lawyer? Mr. May said he considered it was a shabby objection. It was that he had limited to strike out a printed word in the writ, and to substitute another (the name of the new Judge for Lord Abinger's). Alderman Wilson replied, that all his experience with counsel and solicitor led him to conclude that the profession considered it perfectly fair to take every possible objection to their opponent's proceedings. He thought this had been established in a case which had recently agitated the political world. Mr. May said it was done for the sake of shrewdness, and not to obtain time for his client, for another writ could be obtained before the 24th, and no further step could be taken on the first writ till then. Mr. Guy asked which was the sharpest practice—to object to an error in a writ, or to write to a debtor to pay the amount by a certain time, and leave the writ before an answer could be received? Mr. May begged it might be understood that this was not the case. They had an answer before the writ was issued. The wife called and said the money could not be paid for two months. It was not convenient to the creditor to wait so long. Alderman Wilson said they had each done their best for their clients, and there was quite as sharp practice on one side as the other. Mr. May reminded the alderman he had not been charged with sharp practice by Mr. Guy. Alderman Wilson thought the term was nevertheless applicable, and he dismissed the defendant on paying a fine of five guineas for using threatening language.

DANCE CONTRABAND.—At Union Hall on Thursday Thomas Mitchell, was charged before Mr. Trell with sending two bushels of oysters, belonging to William Smith, a green-grocer at Clerkenwell. The prisoner was employed by the complainant to carry home two bushels of oysters. Instead, however, of taking the oysters home the prisoner absconded, and was taken into custody the preceding night. In reply to Mr. Trell, the prisoner said that being hungry he ate the oysters. Mr. Trell (with surprise):—What two bushels of oysters? What you have delivered greater wonders in testimony than the man Dando, who was notorious for consuming large quantities of the same description of shell-fish. Prisoner:—It's a fact, Sir, I ate them all. Mr. Trell:—Then I shall commit you for trial.

A WOMAN CHARGED WITH STABBING HER HUSBAND.—At Clerkenwell Police-office on Wednesday, Mrs. Elizabeth Lewis, a fierce-looking woman, of lofty stature, was charged with stabbing Mr. James Lewis, her husband, a veterinary surgeon, residing in Long-yard, Lamb's Conduit-street. It appeared that the parties have been married for twelve years, and that the wife had been always addicted to habits of intemperance, and has, in order to support them, disposed of property belonging to the prosecutor to the amount of £150. On Sunday last the prosecutor remonstrated with her on the impropriety of her conduct, and she had example she was giving her children. The prisoner immediately seized a fork; he ran towards the door, but before he could get out she stabbed him in the back with it, and occasioned three painful, though not deep, wounds by its prongs. The prosecutor turned about to reproach her with her brutality, but, seeing another fork, she stabbed him under the right shoulder. She was then secured, and the prosecutor conveyed to the London University Hospital, where the house surgeon dressed the wounds. Those near the shoulder were considered dangerous. This was not the first time she had maltreated him, and he considered his life to be in danger from her violence. Mr. Combe (to the prisoner):—What have you to say to the charge? Prisoner: He showed me in a shameful manner. Mr. Combe: But you should not have taken up the fork. Prisoner: What made him strike me with a stick, and throw the chair at me? The prosecutor said to hold up the chair to save himself from the fork, but never touched her before she stabbed him. In answer to a question from the magistrate, he said he was still under the hands of the surgeon. The prisoner was remanded.

THE CASE OF A FATHER PROSECUTED BY HIS SON.—Last week we gave an account of the examination of William Brockopp, sen., charged by William Brockopp, his son, with stealing from him a gold ring and a portfolio. The case presented the unphilosophical and heartless spectacle of a son, not yet of age, prosecuting a father, who was stated to have been some time struggling against adversity with a large family, his business having been formerly that of a respectable grocer and tea-dealer in the Borough. At the last hearing it was very naturally supposed that an amicable arrangement would take place, but when Mr. Brockopp, sen., re-appeared upon his re-examination at Union Hall, he handed in the following note, which his son, in pursuance of his intentions, had addressed to him:—

Mr. Brockopp, sen.—If you are willing to deliver me the articles I claim, being two rings, gold pin, and portfolio, or give me the money for which they are pledged, I will drop any further prosecution. If they are not delivered up on these terms you must take the consequences. If not settled by to-morrow, by four o'clock, my solicitor has my instructions to make out the necessary writ.

To Mr. Wm. Brockopp, sen. I remain, sir, yours most respectfully, Wm. Brockopp, sen. The magistrate said he expected to have heard no more of this charge. The son immediately replied that his father had taken the box without his sanction, and pawned the things, and as he did not think proper to restore them, he should, in agreement with the notice in his letter, pursue the charge. The magistrate said, that as he was unable to produce evidence of his father's stealing the articles, illegally pawning was the utmost charge he could bring against his father. The son said he was still willing to forgo the prosecution on the articles being delivered up. Mr. Brockopp, sen., in a very terse manner, his son's harsh and unphilosophical conduct; in his unfortunate state he should be unable to restore the jewellery if so adjudged, not possessing the means of doing so. The son said that his father, unless checked, would deprive him of all his property; he would time ago prevented him from obtaining £2000. Mr. Brockopp denied this assertion. The Magistrate: Then I suppose the principle of revenge incites you to assert this charge against your father? The son denied the allegation, and complained loudly of his father's general misconduct towards him. Recrimination ensued between the parties, which the magistrate stopped by stating that Mr. Brockopp must deliver up the articles to his son, or he must issue an order to compel him. Mr. Brockopp stated his utter inability to redeem the things, and he was then informed of the consequences of his neglecting the order to be made upon him. Mr. Trell, the magistrate of Union Hall, has received the following letter in reference to this case:—

"Sir, Will you be kind enough to accept the small sum enclosed, viz. 4s.—2s. to be presented to Mr. Brockopp, sen., and the remainder to purchase a rope for his son. (Signed) R. E."

Mr. Edwin, the chief clerk, said the money should be disposed of agreeably to the request of the writer.—[We question whether the annals of the casus edidit can afford any parallel to the case of a son pursuing a father, already prostrated by misfortune, for the alleged robbery of a few trifling articles which he is utterly unable to restore. We would recommend to Mr. Brockopp, jun., a perusal of the fifth commandment, or, at all events, should be persevering in disregarding the divine precepts as well as the common dictates of humanity, there is the consolation of knowing that juries, in spite of the abuse heaped upon them, always have a fellow feeling with the oppressed and unfortunate.]

IRELAND.

DIFFICULTIES OF FATHER MATHIAS.—The celebrated Father Mathias has been arrested, while in Dublin, for the balance of a debt incurred for temperance medals. A subscription has been set on foot to relieve the reverend gentleman from his difficulties, and a very earnest appeal has been made in his favour. (Barny Temperance, like Repeal, is not to be made a pretence for drawing money from the pockets of the people.)

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The proceedings of the Repeal Association become gradually less interesting, and the attendance also decreases. On Monday last Dr. Nagle read a letter from Mr. Henry Grattan, M.P., which accompanied a presentation of 100 copies of the memoirs of his father, the late Mr. Grattan, to the association. The letter went at considerable length into the policy of establishing repeal reading-rooms throughout the country, and dwelt on the benefits to be derived from them. The writer contrasted the extensive system of education that prevailed in America, with that existing in this country, and then observed, "that it would be for the association to follow up the great example afforded by that country, and forward the establishment of libraries everywhere, and support these reading-rooms throughout the country. With that view I beg to place at the disposal of the association 100 copies of the memoirs of the late Mr. Grattan, amounting to 400 octavo volumes. They comprise the most interesting period of Irish history; they set out the proceedings of 1793, and detail the successful efforts of the glorious and immortal volunteers; they contain authentic letters of the ablest statesmen in Ireland and England, and official documents that never before appeared. They may serve to raise the character of that country which it is now the fashion to despise, and rescue from oblivion the most glorious period of her annals, when her people were strong and generous, but, alas, too credulous and too credulous; they may teach the rising generation to revere the memory of those departed patriots who struggled so nobly for their liberties; may still cherish the virtues of her people; may generate a race of patriots; and thus convert them into a race of heroes." Dr. Nagle moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Grattan for his magnificent donation, which was seconded by the Hon. Mr. Hutchinson, and passed with acclamation. A discussion arose, chiefly with reference to the state of the Repeal in Ireland, and many letters were read, announcing small subscriptions to the Repeal fund. The amount of the week's report was stated to be £391 6s.

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF A BARBARIAN.—A very afflictive occurrence took place on Saturday afternoon, in the neighbourhood of Finglass, a village about three miles on the north side of Dublin. Mr. John Walsh, a baronet, after concluding his business in the Inquest Court, walked out in the direction of Finglass, taking with him two dogs. Adjacent to Finglass there is a large quarry hole, filled with water to the depth, it is said, of thirty feet in some parts, and in which, it is thought, Mr. Walsh sent the dogs to swim. Be that, however, as it may, the lifeless body of the unfortunate gentleman was discovered in the water, about five o'clock, by a policeman. It is thought that while he was walking on the edge of the quarry a portion of the earth gave way beneath his feet, and he was precipitated into the water. Mr. Walsh, ten or twelve years ago, had been an active member and a frequent speaker at the Trades Political Union. At the election for Dublin, in 1833, he was the proposer of Mr. O'Connell. Subsequently he went to the bar, and devoted himself with diligence to the business of his profession. He has left a wife and young children. On Monday an inquest was held on the body of this lamented gentleman, when the jury returned the following verdict:—"We find that the deceased, John Walsh, accidentally came by his death by drowning in a quarry-hole, through which the river Tolka runs, in the parish of Finglass, county Dublin, on Saturday, the 19th day of October."

The entire military force now in Ireland consists of about 22,000 men of all arms.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ROBBERY AT ST. THOMAS'S CHURCH, SOUTHWARK.—On Sunday last, the church of St. Thomas, Southwark, was the scene of unusual haste and confusion, in consequence of the loss of the whole of the communion plate, consisting of several pieces of silver, which had been in the possession of the parish authorities for the last 100 years. The plate had been deposited in its usual place of safety at the commencement of the present month, and on opening the safe, on Sunday, the contents were found to have been removed. Information having been forwarded to the Southwark-bridge-road police-station, a diligent search was made by several officers, but no clue could be discovered. A small crow-bar was found, used by housebreakers, near the entrance of the church in St. Thomas's-street, and on making more minute examination, there was no doubt that the thieves had effected an entrance through a window which had been left insecure at the front part of the building.

MURDER ON THE RIVER.—On Tuesday evening, Mr. Higge concluded, at the Pine Apple, Hungerford-market, the inquest adjourned from last week, on the body of the man, name unknown, found in the river off Whitehall stairs, with four or five mortal stabs in the chest. The previous inquiry appeared in our last number. The evidence now adduced showed that the man had been stabbed first and then thrown into the river, and it also showed a probability that the deed was done on the night of Friday week, on Vauxhall-bridge. At the first inquiry it was supposed that the deceased was the captain of a coasting schooner, but a man, named Blackwell, a river pilot, who it was thought knew deceased, upon this occasion said he did not think he was a seafaring man, and that he knew no captain of a Thames trading vessel that was missing. There was nobody to identify the body or give any material evidence as to who were the murderers of deceased. In consequence the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown."

SINGULAR AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday Mr. Riggs held an inquest at the Ormond's Head, Prison-street, Westminster, on Louisa Mooney, aged ten months. The deceased was the daughter of a shoemaker, residing in Orchard-street, Westminster. On Monday the child was taken to its grandfather's house, and laid in a bed, where it shortly afterwards fell asleep. A young female named Emma Brown, not knowing that the child was there, turned up the bedstead, and nearly four hours elapsed before it was missed. When the bed was overturned the child was found dead, it having been suffocated by the bed-clothes. Verdict, "Accidental death."

CURIOUS ACCIDENT.—On Saturday a singular, but very serious accident happened to a man named Henry Pope, a butcher, residing in the New-cut, Lambeth. The poor fellow, while in the act of cutting a calf's head in two, slipped his knife, and pierced his thigh to the extent of several inches, dividing the main blood-vessels. Mr. Edward Cook, one of the principal surgeons of Guy's Hospital, was sent for immediately, and upon his arrival found it necessary to cut down upon the femoral artery, which he succeeded in tying directly, and thus prevented the further loss of blood. The man is fearfully progressing.

ATTEMPT TO BURN THE BARONET HERMES, OFF HOLBORN.—A Swede, named Henry Brown, has been examined and remanded at Liverpool, on a charge of attempting to burn the baronet's house, Captain Drough, about nine miles off Liverpool. The vessel was on her voyage to Buenos Ayres yesterday week, when the occurrence took place. The prisoner was seen to light some matches, and a fire was discovered in the fore-cabin. He also said he would either sink or burn the vessel. No motive whatever could be assigned for the attempt.

AWFUL SUDDEN DEATH.—On Thursday morning, at eleven o'clock, Mr. James Bennett, late partner to Mr. Daniel Whiteley Harvey, and now managing clerk to Messrs. Yates and Turner, solicitors, Great George-street, Westminster, came in his usual health and spirits to the office, which he has been accustomed to do for upwards of fifteen years, and whilst in the act of speaking to one of the clerks he fell on the floor, and an effort being made to raise him, he was found insensible and helpless. A messenger was immediately sent for medical aid, and Mr. McCann, surgeon, of Parliament-street, promptly attended, and pronounced him dead, but, notwithstanding, opened the temporal artery, from which blood freely flowed. Mr. McCann gave it as his opinion that the deceased died from apoplexy, being of a very sanguineous and plethoric temperament.

ATTEMPTED MURDER IN THE CITY.—Shortly after one o'clock on Monday morning, one of the most determined attempts at murder took place in St. Paul's Church-yard, that has ever been heard of. The object of attack was Collins, of the City police, whose bear has been of late a mere bag-place for bad characters. The inspection and Collins have been the means of removing some, but other persons have taken their situations. On Monday morning, about half-past one o'clock, Collins was walking on his beat, when suddenly a tall, stout fellow, about six feet high, tripped the officer up. He fell heavily, but not being at the time irretrievably, he endeavored to draw his truncheon, when his assailant, standing over him, unfortunately got possession of it, and struck him several blows over the head. Shortly afterwards the officer was found bleeding profusely from his wounds, and quite insensible. The wounded man was conveyed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where he remains without the least hope of recovery. The individual who committed the murderous assault is named Isaac Riggs, a paper stainer, at Lambeth. He was examined at Guildhall on Wednesday, before Mr. Alderman Wilson, when the facts above stated were given in evidence. Riggs accused himself on the ground of intemperance. Mr. Alderman Wilson said if he had been drinking, that would not justify such a savage assault. The police must be protected in the execution of their duty, and he should commit the prisoner for trial and instruct the City Solicitor to prosecute.

CURIOUS CHARGE OF ANTON.—An extraordinary sensation has been created in Bishopsgate, in consequence of the apprehension of Alfred, son of Mr. Yardley, pawnbroker, together with Sarah Fuller, a servant girl, who were charged, for having set fire to the dwelling-house of the father, and the latter as an accessory. The woman has been discharged, and Yardley being committed for trial at the next Hockley Assizes. On the 5th ult., the person of Mr. Yardley was found to be in flames, when a great quantity of property was destroyed, a great portion of which belonged to the poor of St. Botolph's and the neighbourhood. Young Yardley was very much respected, and would, on attaining his majority (in a few months), come into possession of very considerable property.

THE GREAT POUGHKEEPSIE CATTLE SHOW.

GREAT AMERICAN STATE FAIR AND CATTLE SHOW.

We have frequently illustrated these "monster meetings" in our own country, and it may neither be uninteresting nor useless to see how they are managed upon the other side of the Atlantic. The specimens we have chosen for representation is somewhat magniloquently termed "The Great Annual State Fair and Cattle Show of the New York State Agricultural Society, for 1844," held at Poughkeepsie, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of September, "the three glorious days dedicated to the farming and agricultural interests of this great country." The preparations are thus described in the Weekly Herald—

"The site of the fair is half a mile to the east of the town, on the summit of a slight elevation, which affords a view of the whole scene. It occupies a tract of ground of about ten acres, which is enclosed by a substantial seven foot wall of boards, which effectually excluded all but those who paid the ticket at the moderate rate of 1s. each. The whole enclosure is in the form of an oval much elongated. On one side are erected an infinity of pens for hogs, folds for sheep, stalls for oxen, stands for horses, and various other fixtures for quadrupeds, which makes it, one would think, no bad representation of the interior of Noah's ark. Other edifices there are, too, in prodigious numbers. There are tents pitched for the "Light Guards," or some other dashing company or companies expected to come from New York; there is to be a mammoth marquee, within whose ample precincts a whole host of men, women, and children can take shelter, when they like, from the sun's heat, and from the rain, if it be necessary. In different places throughout the fair ground, the committee have caused to be erected a great number of commodious booths, or, as they are termed here, shanties, which are to be appropriated to the sale of refreshments—but to the utter exclusion of that vile rogue, alcohol, who will be, on no condition, looked upon as admissible inside the walls. However, to conceal those who are familiar with this personage, John Barleycorn, alias Alcohol, it is to be observed that a numerous posse of his admirers have, not only for the benevolent purpose of providing him with quarters, but also with a view to avoid the rent of a tenement inside the wall of partition, built sundry emporiums outside, where everything, from egg nog to brandy smashers, and hot punch, may be had on moderate terms, for cash."

In the centre of the ground, and running parallel with its greatest length, stands a row of sheds for the display of horticultural and agricultural specimens, implements, ladies' work, &c.

The first day was appropriated to the choice of officers, committees, &c.; entries of stock, trial of implements, &c.; the number of premiums competed for were 500.

Wednesday was dedicated to the grand exhibition of cattle, farming products, and implements.

According to the Weekly Herald, nothing could be finer than the display of Black Cattle of every description: they occupied a strip of the field extending around the whole circumference of the oval enclosure; and it would be difficult to match the collection be held with lively satisfaction to-day, for size, weight, symmetry, breed, colour, and other leading qualities, by which the merits of stock are estimated. Horses were less numerous; but swine and sheep were in thousands.

A detailed description of the thousands of curious machines, and ingenious contrivances for curtailing, expediting, and facilitating agricultural labour, would take a good-sized volume. There were of the plough alone, hundreds of specimens; also, harrows and rakes, hoes and spades; machines for churning, reaping, threshing, winnowing, and grinding; machines for sowing, cutting straw, cornstalks, &c., and a great variety of ingenious horse-powers to set them in motion. The bells on the ground were, you may be sure, quite numerous; but we cannot forbear to mention, whilst on the topic of machinery, two bells of another description, made at Menery's foundry, West Troy, the tones of which are full of melody. One of these bells weighs 650 pounds, the other 1525 pounds, and are excellent specimens in their line. But the most wonderful exhibition was the arrival of "the Farmers' Car," from Hyde Park, drawn by ten yoke of oxen. A wagon of enormous length, height, and capacity, was attached to this famous team. Perpendicular and transverse rails were raised thereon, and ornamented with fruit, flowers, and forest foliage; whilst, through the interstices peered the smiling products of the farm, the orchard, and the granary, in every possible shape. This stupendous car is shown towards the centre of the large engraving. An exhibit on of another character was that of Colonel Chaplin, who caused to be labelled in large characters upon his tent the following:—"General Tom Thumb bent at last!—The celebrated dwarf, Colonel Chaplin, nineteen years old, twenty-seven inches high, and weighing twenty-six pounds!—The smallest man living to be seen here." There were on the ground to-day several hundreds of the Poughkeepsie and Fishkill firemen, with music, banners, and engines, in full uniform. There were, altogether, 40,000 persons present.

The great feature of Thursday was a Ploughing Match by nine teams. In the afternoon, the meeting in the marquee (shown in our Engraving), numbering nearly 1000 ladies, was addressed at great length, and most eloquently, by Mr. Bancroft, of Massachusetts. There came the award of payment of the premiums; and thus terminated the proceedings of the Great Poughkeepsie State Fair.

The larger Engraving shows the general arrangement of the Fair: in the foreground are visitors, some of them farmers, carrying umbrellas to keep off the sun; next, are the fine black cattle, and then the Floral Car; to the right are the refreshment booths; to the left, the white buildings of Poughkeepsie; and, in the distance, the Reservoir, the Marquee, and the College; the latter, a superb white marble structure, after the Parthenon, and situate two miles distant.

INCORPORATION OF BRIGHTON.—A meeting of householders of the borough of Brighton, was held on Monday to consider the propriety of petitioning the Queen to grant a charter of incorporation. Some difference of opinion prevailed, and ultimately a committee was appointed to investigate and report upon the extent of the change in local affairs which an incorporation would entail.

EFFECTS OF THE SEASON.—Miss Martha Soss ten has at present growing in her garden at Asbury, near Whitby, Yorkshire, an apple tree, which bore blossoms in Christmas again in spring, and after producing a good crop of fruit, is again to be seen in blossom.

PUBLIC WALKS IN MANCHESTER.—Sir George Phillips has subscribed £500 to the fund raising for the establishment of public walks in that town.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.—On Friday an inquest was held before Mr. Chapman, at the Atlas Hotel, Manchester, on the body of James Case, a map-maker, of Rochdale, whose death resulted from the injury received on the Oldham branch of the Manchester and Leeds Railway. It appeared, from the evidence of Elizabeth, wife of William Leigh, better of Oldham, that she and Case got into a railway train at Oldham, on Wednesday evening, and were going to Rochdale, but, on the arrival of the train at the Middleton junction, Case opened the door of the carriage, which was a third class, as the train was slackening its pace, and tried to get out, when his foot slipped, and he fell across the rail. The off-wheel of the succeeding wagon passed over his thighs, and he was removed to the Manchester Infirmary within half an hour of the accident, but he survived the injury only until Thursday night, when he died about half-past seven. The witness stated that deceased was in liquor at the time of the accident, and the fault was entirely his own. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

INTERIOR OF THE GREAT MARQUEE.

ORLEANS HOUSE, TWICKENHAM; ONCE THE RESIDENCE OF LOUIS PHILIPPE

ORLEANS HOUSE, TWICKENHAM.

Our readers will remember that his Majesty the King of the French, during his recent visit, paid a visit to the handsome mansion at Twickenham, where the King, then Duke of Orleans, took up his residence on his arrival from New York, in the year 1800. Here the royal exile had at length, an opportunity of enjoying some repose in the midst of the best English society. The duke engaged with zeal in the study of political economy, and the institutions of Great Britain; at times making excursions with his brothers into the country, and from taste and habit becoming almost an Englishman. The only pressing subject of concern was the infirm health of the Duke of Montpensier. With a somewhat weakly constitution, deranged by long and cruel confinement in prison, he had, since his first arrival in England, experienced a gradual sinking in bodily strength. Notwithstanding every effort of medicine to save him, this amiable and accomplished prince died May 18, 1807. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, where his tomb is marked by an elegant Latin epitaph, the joint composition of the Duke of Orleans and General Dumouriez.

Writing from Twickenham to the late Bishop of Landaff, in July, 1804, the duke observes—"I quitted my native land so early, that I have hardly the habits or manners of a Frenchman, and I can say with truth that I am attached to England, not only by gratitude, but by taste and inclination. In the sincerity of my heart do I pray that I may never leave this hospitable soil. But it is not from individual feeling only that I take so much interest in the success of England—it is also as a man. The safety of Europe, of the world itself, the happiness and independence of the human race, depend upon the safety and independence of England."

A correspondent has penned the following:—

ROYAL SOLILOQUY

SAID TO HAVE BEEN SPOKEN IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF TWICKENHAM ON STON.

"Ye distant spires, ye antique towers
That crown the watery glade,
Where grateful Science still adores
Her Henry's holy shade;
And ye, that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights th' expanse below,
Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey,
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among,
Wanders the hazy Thames along
His silver winding way!"—
And thou, fair Twickenham, where of old
Some thirty summers erst I stray'd,
It glads mine eyes now to behold
Each happy hill, each peaceful shade!
Time has wrought many changes since
Here in thy home as exil'd Prince
I found thy hospitality,
But time has wrought no change in me!
The circumstance of pomp and pow'r,
Attends me at the present hour—
But still in grateful heart the same,
I'll ever bless old England's name!

Orleans House was, in the reign of Queen Anne, the property of her Secretary of State, Mr. Johnson, who built the large octagon room at the extremity of the gallery, for the express purpose of entertaining Queen Anne there. The house was erected from a design by the celebrated Earl of Burlington. It afterwards became the property of G. Morton Pitt, Esq., and was purchased from him by Admiral Sir George Pocock, R.N., who left it to his son, the late baronet, by whom it was sold in 1807 to the present possessor, Alexander Murray, Esq., the member for the County of Rutlandshire. The Pocock family held the property for about a century.

SILVER TROWEL.

This superb implement was made and used for laying the first stone of the New

SILVER TROWEL.

Docks, at Rotherhead, and was used by Sir Philip Egerton, M.P., for that purpose, on Wednesday last.

The trowel was designed and executed by Mr. Joseph Mayer, jeweller and goldsmith, of Lord-street, Liverpool. It is of unique design, its several ornaments being emblematical of commerce and navigation. The form of it is that of the Greek helm, or padio. On the blade, or flat part, is chased in alto-relieve, Terra, the Goddess of Earth, and Neptune, the God of the Sea, in the act of calling into existence Commerce and Navigation, which are portrayed by a female, crowned with an antique wreath, with her arms across her bosom, and holding in her right hand a cornucopia. The goddess, with their appropriate symbols, the trident and dolphin, tarred, coronet and cornucopia, with their heads inclined, are looking approvingly on the being of their creation. The handle is composed of a dolphin, which, from the graceful form it assumes, makes an appropriate fish to the whole. Above the figures is engraved in classic letters, the following inscription:—"Presented to Sir Philip de Malpas Grey Egerton, Baronet, M.P., on his laying the Foundation-stone of the Birkenhead Dock, XXIII. day of October, M.DCCCXLIV., in the VII. year of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria." And on the back of the trowel the names of the Birkenhead Dock Commissioners, with those of the engineer and architect. The whole is surrounded by that beautiful Greek border, emblematic of the waves, so often seen on the early Etruscan vases.

Next week we hope to illustrate the grand festive proceedings at Birkenhead.

HER MAJESTY'S NEW STATE RAILWAY CARRIAGE.

This superb carriage has been constructed by the South Western Railway Company, for the conveyance of her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and the young royal family, to and from their marine residence in the Isle of Wight.

The carriage, externally, is seventeen feet in length by seven feet four inches wide: it is placed on wooden wheels (Beattie's patent), which have been successfully used on this railway, and, from their principle of construction, afford comfort and perfect security. The ground colour of the body is the same as that of her Majesty's private carriages, dark maroon; in the centre panel are emblazoned the royal arms; the commodore and door handles are massive silver, with the royal arms elaborately chased; and the windows are of superbly embossed and ground glass. A crown and cushion surmount the centre of the body, and along its entire length is an elegant scroll cornice; the carriage itself being similarly decorated.

The interior, of which we annex a view, is divided into two compartments, two-thirds of the length being assigned to that occupied by her Majesty and Prince Albert; the other compartment being for the royal children and suite, and accessible by an almost imperceptible door, opening into either compartment, and hung on a patent self-adjusting hinge. The lining is of light drab flowered silk damask, trimmed with crimson and white silk, and embossed pile figures. The roof, or ceiling, is of white damask, embroidered with crimson; and at each angle are embroidered the national emblems in silver, encircling the imperial crown of gold. In the centre of each ceiling is a crown, surrounded by the rose, shamrock, and thistle, carved, and painted after nature. Immediately over each of these crowns is placed one of the improved lamps, made by Miller and Son, of Piccadilly; each crown, by an ingenious contrivance, being removable, so as to admit into both compartments an agreeable light—for example, in passing through the railway tunnels.

The draperies throughout are of crimson and white figured satin damask, richly lined and trimmed, and surmounted by a white and gold cornice. The blinds are of peach-blossom silk, with crimson silk and silver tassels. Beneath the centre window, and near the seats for her Majesty and the Prince, are placed white marble slabs upon white and gold consoles. The carpet is of the finest Axminster manufacture; beneath it, and between the framework and body of the carriage, is a layer of the patent Kamptulic (composition of cork and Indian rubber) which entirely prevents the unpleasant vibration incident to railway travelling.

The entire carriage has been constructed from the design and under the superintendence of Mr. Joseph Beattie, of the carriage department of the Railway Company. It is, certainly, an elegant specimen of coach building, furniture, trimming, and decoration, in convenience as well as embellishment; and it has been much admired by her Majesty and Prince Albert.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1844.

THIS week has been, politically, a very quiet one. The retirement of Royalty to the privacy of Osborne House, withdrew attention from the Court; the interest awakened by the visit of the French King has, here at least, completely subsided, though in Paris the papers cannot afford to let so good a subject escape them so soon, and they are "still harping" on the enormity of the crime Louis Philippe has committed, and the endeavours of Guizot to make France, as they are pleased to phrase it, "not happy, but English." They take exception to an exclamation attributed to his Majesty during his investiture with the Order of the Garter, by which he expressed his determination never to wage an unjust war with the Sovereign of the Order and of England. An honest and just determination, we should say, but on that account so much the more likely to give offence to the peace-hating spirit of Young France. But this last breeze of passion will, we hope, blow over with as little effect on the good sense of the bulk of the French nation.

The feeling of the week has been one of anticipation; every one is looking forward to the ceremony of opening the Exchange; an event which, to a great commercial nation, is one of unusual importance, bringing with it many interesting associations, both with the past and the future. The City is on the tip-toe of expectation; and the Lord Mayor is enjoying a foretaste of greatness and dignity; and the worthy citizens—whose windows command the route—are awaiting a golden harvest from the anxious loyalty of the thousands, who, like Caleb Quotem, are determined to have "a place at the review." Every arrangement has been made to render the pageant effective; and if the skies are at all propitious the spectacle will really be a very gratifying one.

The silence of every member of the Ministry during the Recess has been at last broken by Lord Stanley, who on Tuesday last presided at the dinner of the Liverpool Agricultural Show. His lordship's speech on this occasion contains nothing political; it is simply such an address as might have been expected at an assembly of agriculturists. It is full of good advice,—recommending increased activity and exertion, and all, in fact, that is usually comprehended in the term agricultural improvement. He speaks much of the good effect of drainage, and the use of guano as a manure; and he bears the following testimony to the advance that has lately been made in the processes of cultivation:—

Everywhere I see old useless fences disappearing, fields enlarging, improved modes of cultivation adopted; and I see going on with immense rapidity that which I must again and again impress upon you who are connected with the land is the basis of all improvement—deep and thorough drainage of the land; and get here alone, but through most all England, I see most remarkably, as any one indeed may do, even though whirled through the country at the railway speed at which we are now carried, what an extent of improvement has been effected in this respect. Every out is struck with the appearance of preparation for future exertions, which are, at the same time, the tokens of well-deserved success.

But while speaking of this improvement, he makes this important declaration:—

But this I say—and, as one connected with the land, I feel myself bound to say it—that a landlord has no right to expect any great and permanent improvement of his land by the tenant, unless that tenant be secured the repayment of his outlay, not by the personal character or honour of his landlord, but by a security which no rascals can interfere with—the security granted him by the terms of a lease for years.

The granting of leases must be left to the discretion or feeling of the landlords, as the law could not make it imperative without an interference with the private affairs of individuals, that would produce more mischief than the practice so enforced would create of good. Still there can be no doubt that the increased security and confidence a tenant would gain from this certainty of tenure would make him more freely invest that capital in the land, without which improvement is impossible; and among this large class we have no doubt that Lord Stanley's unqualified opinion on the point will produce great satisfaction. With the exception of his lordship's speech, the dinner presented nothing to call for remark.

MONDAY last was the anniversary of the Battle of Trafalgar, and the Old Victory was dressed with laurels, and fired a salute on the occasion, in honour of the day, and of the memory of the Hero who fell on her deck in the moment of victory. Her Majesty was passing in the state barge to the Clarence-yard, and inquired the cause of the display. On being told, she resolved to go on board the old vessel, and in a few minutes afterwards the ship's company were alike surprised and gratified by the presence of her Majesty among them. The Queen remained some time on board—saw the tablet that marks the spot where Nelson fell—visited the cabin in which he died—read his famous signal—plucked some leaves from the laurels that for the day had been placed to shadow the spot once stained by the warrior's blood—and departed amid the hearty cheers of the crew. The visit was spontaneous—there was nothing of state about it—but it was, for that very reason, a more graceful homage to the memory of one of the bravest defenders the Crown of England ever numbered in its service.

Turn Foreign Intelligence is rather interesting; in Spain Queen Christina has had her marriage with Munoz ratified; they have been privately married for many years, but the union has not till now been recognised; nor has it at last been effected without much negotiation. It reads rather strangely to find that the young Isabella, in years little more than a child, should have given her august permission to her mother to get married! It is said Christina will lose the allowance she received as the widow of Ferdinand; and, in fact, as it was to cease in case of her second marriage, she must, for some years past, have been receiving it illegally. But all her revenues, rights, and privileges are to be secured to her by royal grant from her daughter. In the north of Europe affairs appear busy. The Kings of Belgium and of Holland have each opened the Legislatures of the respective countries: the principal subject for the attention of both these bodies will be the commercial regulations and the tariffs of the two states. The tariff promulgated by Belgium is marked, we are sorry to say, by a spirit adverse to the extended admission of English manufactures.

The ill success of the Russian army in Circassia has encouraged the tribes of Georgia, many of whom have heretofore acknowledged the authority of the Czar, to waver in their faith, and throw off their allegiance. Throughout both Georgia and Circassia, the Russians are detested, and during last year the inhabitants of the mountainous province of Daghestan revolted; they were headed by a chief named Shamil Bey, who had long previously been endeavouring to league the mountaineers against their northern rulers. This chief had been partly educated in the Russian capital, and has consequently acquired some insight into the nature of Russian policy. He was known to be a man of superior abilities and of great personal courage, and to possess a very considerable influence amongst the tribes of Daghestan. The Russian Government made a vigorous effort to suppress this outbreak, but their troops were defeated by the mountaineers with great loss, and several fortified posts fell into the hands of the rebels. In the spring of the present year another expedition was sent against Shamil Bey; the force was a strong one, and such importance was attached to success that it was at one time stated the Emperor would himself direct part of the operations in person. But by retreating into the mountains, avoiding a battle, continually harassing the flanks of the Russian army, and cutting off its supplies, the Bey has completely defeated the troops sent against him, which, thinned by losses, weakened by desertions, and distracted by the divisions, said to exist among the generals, have retreated, the campaign being altogether abandoned. It is said that by this event the power of Russia in Georgia and Circassia will be materially shaken. Those who are continually making a bugbear of the great military power of Russia, might draw consolation from these repeated failures, which do not say much either for the capacity or the spirit of these masses of serfs in uniform, when put in action before an enemy.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WEDNESDAY, Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked for some time this morning in the pleasure grounds adjacent to the Castle. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Royal Highness again promenade in the Home Park. Lady Portman has arrived at the Castle, and has succeeded the Countess of Gainsborough as the lady in waiting on the Queen. The Hon. Captain Dancow has also arrived at the Castle, and has succeeded Sir Frederick Norton as the Groom in waiting to her Majesty.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their accustomed walk this afternoon in the slopes. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice were taken their usual airing in the course of the day. The Earl and Countess of Westmoreland arrived at the Castle in the afternoon, on a visit to her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas, the Countess of Warwick, and Colonel Knollys, joined the royal dinner circle at the Castle this evening.

THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, left the Castle this morning shortly after nine o'clock, and walked across the Home-park to the dairy. After visiting the dairy and aviary, the Queen and the Prince returned to the Castle. Shortly afterwards, the Prince Consort, attended by Col. Bouverie, proceeded in a close carriage to Virginia Water, for the purpose of shooting over the royal preserves in that vicinity. The rain, however, commencing immediately upon the Prince reaching Virginia Water, with every appearance of its continuance, his Royal Highness returned to the royal residence without firing a shot. The rain continued without intermission during the remainder of the day; thus preventing any of the royal family leaving the Castle since the early part of the morning, where their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken out for their usual airings. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Countess Josephine Worslaw, and Lady Charlotte Dundas, had the honour of joining the royal dinner circle at the Castle this evening. It is expected that the Court will leave the Castle, for Clarendon, on Saturday. Nothing, however, with reference to the departure of her Majesty and the Prince has yet been finally determined upon. I regret to state that the Hon. Mr. Murray still continues at the Pavilion, at Brighton, in an ill state of health.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE CITY.—The following will be amongst the members of the royal household, who will be in attendance upon her Majesty and Prince Albert on the occasion of the opening of the Royal Exchange, on Monday next:—Lady Portman, Lady in Waiting; the Hon. Amelia Murray and the Hon. Lucy Kerr, Maids of Honour; Lord Byron, Lord in Waiting; the Hon. Captain Dancow, Groom in Waiting; Major-General Wemyss, Equerry in Waiting; Lord George Lennox, Lord in Waiting to Prince Albert; Mr. G. E. Anson, Treasurer and Private Secretary to the Prince; and Colonel Bouverie, his Royal Highness's Equerry in Waiting.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Wednesday, at St. George's, Hanover-square, was solemnized the marriage of Captain the Honourable Robert Edward Boyce, second son of the Earl of Cork and Orrery, with Miss Georgiana Roberts, youngest daughter of Abraham Roberts, the well-known banker.

The Duke of Wellington is expected to arrive at Aspley House, on Monday next, from Walmer Castle, to attend the royal banquet, on the occasion of the opening of the new Royal Exchange. His grace's party at the castle includes Countess Powlett, Lord and Lady Charles Wellesley, the Right Hon. Charles Ashurst, and Mr. Algernon Greville.

VISCOUNT MOUNTBATTEN is at Brockett Hall, Hert. Lord and Lady Beauvale are visiting the noble Viscount.

Lord and Lady John Russell have left town for Dover, and purpose to reside there until the close of the ensuing month. Her ladyship's health is quite restored.

Lord Brougham and suite left Brougham Hall on Monday for London, en route to his lordship's chateau in the south of France.

A marriage is in contemplation between the Comte de Jarnac, First Secretary to the French Embassy in London, and the Hon. Miss Foley, eldest sister of the present and daughter of the late Lord Foley.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ELECTION FOR THE WARD OF PORTOKEN.—The Court of Aldermen having declared the election of Mr. Salomons, as Alderman of Portoken Ward, null and void, a wardmote was held on Monday, at the Three Nuns Tavern, Aldgate, to elect a gentleman in his stead. The Lord Mayor having opened the proceedings, Mr. Salomons addressed the Court, and handed in a protest against the election. He said he considered himself alderman of the ward, and intended to try the question in a court of law. Mr. D. W. Wire handed in a similar protest from certain inhabitants of the ward. Mr. Wood then proposed, and Mr. Bull seconded, the nomination of Francis Graham Moon, Esq., citizen and stationer, as a fit and proper person to represent the Ward of Portoken in the Court of Aldermen. There being no other candidate nominated, the Lord Mayor declared F. G. Moon, Esq., duly elected.

STATUE OF WILLIAM THE FOURTH.—The statue to his late Majesty King William IV., designed for erection in King William-street, is in a state for advancing towards completion, and will, in the course of a short period, be removed to its final destination; thus adding another agreeable ornament to the City of London.

MOETHEAST IN THE METROPOLIS.—Deaths from all causes registered in the week ending Saturday, Oct. 19:—Males, 436; females, 437; total, 873. Weekly average—Males, 485; females, 453; total, 938.

CHRISTIANITY ASSOCIATION.—A public meeting of the Christian Association of this Association was held in the Temperance hall, Exeter-street, St. James's, a few evenings ago. Mr. Lillie in the chair. Mr. Cooper, the district secretary, read the report, from which it appeared, that though one of the smallest, it was the most flourishing district in the metropolis, and, owing to the active exertions of the committee, evening trade was very much diminished. Mr. St. Clair, a member of the Central Committee, moved the adoption of the report. In doing so, he observed, that to abridge the hours of business was not, as some imagined, the sole object of these associations; but they had an ulterior object in view, towards which this was but the stepping-stone. This object was to elevate the character of trade, and to improve the moral and intellectual welfare of the operatives, to do which it was absolutely necessary to secure a portion of time from the demands of business. Some resolutions were agreed to similar in spirit to those adopted at Exeter Hall, and deprecating late hours of business. Mr. Shipton moved, and Mr. Maron, in an eloquent and humorous speech, seconded, a resolution of thanks to the Central Committee, for their exertions in the cause, which was agreed to.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE LIVERPOOL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this Society took place on Tuesday, preceded, as usual, by the new year. Baron Stanley, of Alderbury, presided over the proceedings, except the speech of the President himself. That noble lord, after expatiating upon the advantages of such societies, adverted to the improvements which were progressing in farming. Baron Stanley, in the course of his remarks upon these improvements, said:—It was not more than four or five years ago, that he (Baron Stanley), at the meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, when it was held in Liverpool, had taken the opportunity of mentioning a new machine, guano, as applicable and valuable for land. At that time only a single cargo had arrived in Liverpool, and now, if he (Baron Stanley) was not misinformed, from the single port of Liverpool only no less than one hundred and fifty vessels were engaged in the importation of that then unknown manure. It was not merely in such matters as that that he looked for advantage from the Society, but on all sides he saw old and useless fences disappearing, fields being enlarged, and deep and thorough draining of the land taking place. (Loud cheers.) He (Baron Stanley) had heard of some old farmers who disapproved of such improvements. It had been said that it was useless growing more on the land, for if they did, the landlord would get the benefit of it. This was a very fallacious notion; for, in point of fact, by improvement they did not grow more upon the land, but a different kind of crop—wheat, instead of weeds. Baron Stanley then gave his opinion that landlords ought to grant leases to their tenants; and in reference to draining, gave an example of what had been done on his father's property. He said:—On my father's property in this neighbourhood there has been laid down at his expense, and charging 5 per cent. interest to the tenants, which, I believe, they most gladly and willingly acknowledge they have, over and over again, received the benefit of—in this last year we have laid down in deep draining somewhere about 300 miles of drains at an expense of between £1000 and £1600, and, I think, employed about 1,500,000 of draining tiles.

THE HAWWELL COLLIERIES EXPLOSION.—The Marquis of Londonderry, says the Durham Advertiser of Saturday, has written to the secretary to the fund for the survivors of the sufferers by the late accident at Hawwell Colliery, in reply to an application for a subscription. The noble lord disapproves of all such subscriptions, and contents that it is the duty of all proprietors of collieries to maintain those who are bereft of their protectors by fatal accidents in the mines. He estimates the amount of money he has paid in this way, as coal proprietor, since 1819, at £6160 17s 10d. He concludes his letter, however, by saying that, as the Lambton Colliery and the Earl of Durham have each given £100 to the fund, he will give the same sum.

GALANITOUS EXPLOSION AT HOWLEY BRIDGE.—ELEVEN LIVES LOST.—On Saturday a most calamitous explosion of fire-damp took place in a coal-pit belonging to Mr. Darby, at the Five Ways, Howley Ridge, Staffordshire. The number of persons at work in the pit at the time of the explosion was 17 or 18, and of these no less than 11 have fallen victims. Immediately after the explosion, the effects of which were perceived for some distance, the most active measures were taken to afford assistance to such of the workmen in the pit as might be alive, and six of them were as soon as possible extricated from their perilous situation. In a short time the bodies of eight workmen also were got out, those of three others being left in the pit, in consequence of the futility of the air. The six poor fellows who were got out alive are all more or less injured, but not, we are happy to state, to such a degree as to endanger their lives.

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE BRANDLING JUNCTION RAILWAY.—All the persons injured last week on the Brandling Junction Railway are in an improving condition; it is expected that in a few days most of them will be out of danger. Every attention has been paid to them by the managers of the railway.

POSTSCRIPT.

HIS MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE CITY.—Official notices have been issued, stating that on the occasion of her Majesty visiting the City, on Monday next, to open the Royal Exchange, the Treasury and the other public offices will be shut, and the day observed as a holiday. The Lord Mayor has issued various regulations, providing that the streets between Bishopsgate-street and Temple-bar be closed at seven in the morning on Monday, and that no vehicle be allowed to remain after eight o'clock. Also, that no person be allowed to pass or remain in the Poultry, Mansion-house-street, Cornhill, Bartholomew-lane, or Thread-needle-street, after seven o'clock, except inhabitants and others going to the houses in those streets, who will be permitted to pass for that purpose until nine o'clock, after which time no person whatever will be admitted into those streets. That no carriage be admitted into any of the streets between Temple-bar and Bishopsgate-street after seven o'clock, except those going to the Exchange (who must produce their tickets of invitation).

Lord Brougham left town this morning for the continent, his lordship being about to pass the winter at his residence at Cannes, in the south of France.

Sir Robert Peel returned to town this morning from his seat, Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. Miss Peel, we are happy to hear, is daily gaining strength.

MARRIAGE OF QUEEN ISABELLA OF SPAIN.—A Madrid correspondent assures us that a family compact has been entered into between Don Carlos on the one part, and Queen Christina on the other, for the marriage of Isabella of Spain to the Prince of the Asturias, eldest son of the former. The definitive arrangements were, we are informed, completed at Madrid on the 11th, and the contract has been signed at Boulogne.

ANOTHER MURDER IN IRELAND.—Accounts have been received of another murder in Ireland. It took place on the borders of Tipperary. The victim was a person named Thomas McNamara, who was employed as one of the bagpipers on the county Limerick estate of the governors of the schools founded by Erasmus Smith. He was murdered about noon on the public road leading from Cappamore to Drom, on the lands of Ballycushown; there were people passing to and from the bog, bringing out turf to the very place where he was murdered. The police were soon on the spot, and arrested some persons whom they found there.

OUTRAGE AND BURGLARY AT MANCHESTER.—An account has been received of a daring burglary in the dwelling-house of Mr. Thomas Worthington, at Manchester, near Ardwick, Warrackshire. The house was a few nights ago broken into by a gang of ruffians, wearing black masks, and their persons otherwise disguised. The burglars commenced their operations by cutting a hole in the front door, the noise of which disturbed Miss Worthington, who opened a window and inquired what they wanted, on which the burglars said the cows had escaped from the close; but Mr. Worthington, who had now joined his room, ordered them to be off about their business, or he would shoot them. Of this the burglars took no notice, but continued their operations against the door, and at last succeeded in making an opening. The inmates, consisting of Mr. Worthington, a niece, a grand niece, and a servant lad and maid, were by this time fully prepared, and Mr. Worthington, who is in his 59th year, placed himself at the door, and with a drawn sword cut and stabbed at the fellows through the hole they had made, and kept them at bay for a considerable time. The burglars battered the door to pieces; but while they were doing so, Miss Worthington brought her uncle his fowling-piece, loaded with swan shot, and desired him to shoot the villains; and seeing that his aged hands shook so that he could not take an aim, this heroic young lady pointed and held the gun while her uncle fired. The burglars, uttering the most horrid oaths and imprecations, next took up the stones and threw them at the old gentleman and his niece, who still kept their places in the hall; at length, after half an hour's fighting, and Mr. Worthington's being wounded in the temple and in various parts of the body, the niece, who stood firmly by his side during the conflict, paralyzed with the robbers, when one of them said all they wanted was money, and they did not want to hurt them. The lady then said, if they would promise not to hurt her uncle, no further resistance should be made, which the robbers promised, on which four of them made their way into the house, and after making the servant lad give up all his money, they next took from Miss Worthington a grand niece of Mr. Worthington, a young lady about fifteen years old, all the money she had, threatening to hang her if she did not keep quiet. They then forced the niece to show them where the money was kept, which they took as well as some fire arms; and, after threatening the inmates, if they made any noise about the robbery, or took any steps to discover the robbers, they would come again some night, and burn the house and murder all the inmates they took their departure, and no traces have been obtained of them. We are happy to say that neither Mr. Worthington nor any of his family are seriously injured.

At the Central Criminal Court, George Weston, John Cooper, alias Timber-Jake, and George Jackson, were tried yesterday for stealing some jewellery and other articles from the house of Mr. Blundell, in Agnes-street, Waterloo-road, under daring and heinous circumstances. The particulars recently appeared in our police reports. The jury found Cooper and Weston guilty, but acquitted Jackson. They were subsequently tried on another indictment, and all were acquitted. Mr. Justice Maule sentenced Weston and Jackson to be transported for fifteen years, and Cooper for ten years.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Notwithstanding the early commercial importance of the City of London, the merchants appear to have been unprovided with some fixed establishment where they might assemble and transact business, until long after the building of the Bourse at Antwerp, in the year 1531. Show tells us, in the picture he has left us of Lombard-street, that "The merchants and tradesmen, as well English as strangers, for their general making of bargains, contracts, and commerce.... did usually meet twice every day," at noon and in the evening. "But these meetings were unpleasant and troublesome, by reason of walking and talking in an open narrow street.... being there constrained either to endure all extremes of weather, viz., heat and cold, snow and rain; or else to shelter themselves in shops."

The King himself (Henry VIII.), however, so early as 1533, proposed that the merchants should remove to the old edifice of Leadenhall, which they declined doing; and in 1537, Sir Richard Gresham, the wealthy merchant, laid before Cromwell, then Lord Privy Seal, the plan of a Bourse for London, to which he had, no doubt, been incited by a visit to Antwerp. In this attempt he was unsuccessful; but, before retiring from his magistracy, in the following year, he succeeded in another effort to carry his design into execution in a letter which is still extant; proposing to erect the building in Lombard-street, at a cost of £3000. This application likewise failed, and the attempt was not, for some years, renewed. Thus, with Sir Richard Gresham rests the honour of having originally projected the "Goodly bourse," which his son was happily possessed of the means as well as the inclination, thirty years later, to construct.

The name of Gresham is derived from a little village in Norfolk, where the ancestors of the future civic worthies had resided, it is said, for generations. They subsequently removed to Holt, a few miles from Norwich, in the midst of a wild heathy moor, in the most northern part of Norfolk, being only four miles distant from the sea. Here James Gresham (whose letters, written between 1443 and 1484, are included in the Paston Collection) probably erected the old manor-house, which Sir John Gresham, the brother of Sir Richard, converted into a free-school, and richly endowed with his own means. The edifice, as it stands at present, is shown in the annexed engraving.

HOLT SCHOOL.

FORMERLY THE RESIDENCE OF THE GRESHAM FAMILY.

Thomas Gresham, who eventually founded the Royal Exchange, was the youngest of two sons, and is supposed to have been born in London about 1519. He was educated at Cambridge, apprenticed to his uncle, Sir John, and admitted to the Mercers' Company in 1543, being then in his 25th year. A fine Portrait of Sir Thomas hangs in the Company's Hall, in Chancery; which we shall, next week, present to our readers.

We have not space to glance at the history of Gresham—how he became a merchant in 1544; Royal Agent at Antwerp to Henry VIII. and Edward IV.; removed by Queen Mary, but restored by Elizabeth; how he became Sir Thomas on undertaking the duties of Ambassador at the Court of the Dukes of Parma. His principal English residences were in Lombard-street; Mayfield, in Essex, previously a favourite old palace of the Archbishops of Canterbury; and Osterley, in Middlesex; he had other country houses, but of less importance. Lombard-street was, in Gresham's time, the busiest and most important street in London; in short, it was as yet the only Exchange.

Like all other bankers and merchants of the day, Gresham had his shop in this street, with his grasshopper, his crest, over the door, as his sign. Those who feel any interest in so doing, may yet look upon the site of Gresham's house. It stood where now stands the banking-house of Messrs. Sme, Martin, and Co. Pennant saw the sign itself in the last century, which is understood to have remained on the spot till the erection of the present building. Mayfield and Osterley were magnificent places; and in both Gresham had the honour of a visit from his royal mistress. One of the rooms yet existing among the beautiful ruins of Mayfield is called the Queen's Chamber to this day.

As we have just mentioned the grasshopper sign, we may here state that James Gresham's letters in the Paston Collection, are sealed with a grasshopper; a sufficient refutation of a tradition accounting for the adoption of that heraldic symbol by Sir Thomas Gresham, from a grasshopper having saved his life when he was a poor famished boy, by attracting a person to the spot where he lay, in a helpless condition! Still, it was almost a pity to disturb the legend, teaching, as it simply does, reliance upon God's Providence. In four of the annexed the grasshopper is very prominent. Nor must we forget to mention, among Sir Thomas's residences, Gresham House, which stood in Fair Gardens, upon the site now occupied by the Exchequer Office, between Bishopsgate and old Broad-street. This mansion Gresham himself left as a college, richly endowed. We enter a view, from Vertue's plate, engraved in 1730. It was pulled down in 1766. The College was richly endowed; there was a fund expressly for lectures, which, after the College was taken down, were delivered at the Royal Exchange; but the trustees of the property have, at length, erected a suitable hall for the purpose, engraved in No. 60 of our journal.

To return to the more immediate subject of this sketch: in the year 1566, Sir Thomas Gresham offered to remedy the inconveniences of Lombard-street, by erecting a Bourse or Exchange, provided a site was found. A subscription was immediately set on foot for the purchase of the chosen spot in Cornhill, and in the alley at the back, which, with the houses thereon standing, were ultimately bought for £2500. The ground was then made plain, and the whole conveyed over to Sir Thomas Gresham, by certain aldermen, in the name of the citizens generally. Sir Thomas, on his part, being at the house of Mr. John Rivers, alderman, in company with other citizens, most frankly and lovingly promised that, within a month after the Bourse should be fully finished, he would present it, in equal motives to the City and the Mercers' Company. In token of his sincerity, he thereupon gave his hand to Sir William Garrard, and, in the presence of his assembled friends, drank a carouse to his kinsman, Thomas Rowe. Mr. Burgon adds to this passage the remark: "How rarely do ancient documents furnish us with such a picture of ancient manners." On the 7th of June, 1566, Sir Thomas laid the first stone of the foundation, accompanied by several aldermen, each of whom laid a piece of gold upon it for the workmen. By November, 1567, the entire building was completed.

The general aspect of the new building presented striking evidence of its in every way Flemish character. As Flemish materials, Flemish workmen, and a Flemish architect were employed in the execution, so was the design itself a colorably close imitation of a Flemish building—the great Bourse of Antwerp, engraved at page 278 of our present number. Two prints have been preserved of an interesting character, which show very completely the interior and exterior aspects of the building. They were executed in 1569, and from the date, and the inscription upon them, it appears not improbable, as Mr. Burgon suggests, (in his excellent "Life and Times of Sir Thomas Gresham") that they were engraved at Gresham's own order. The exterior is engraved upon page 164. Its principal feature is a lofty square tower, with two balconied galleries, and a grasshopper surmounting the hall at its top, which stands on the side the entrance, and formed a bell-tower, from which issued at twelve at noon, and at six in the evening, the merchants' call to "Change." The pillars of the court were of marble. All the four corners of the building were ornamented with the founder's crest, the grasshopper. The building consisted essentially of two portions—an upper and a lower; the first being laid out in shops, one hundred in number, and the other into walks and rooms for the merchants, with shops on the exterior. We likewise annex a view of the interior, copied from the above print. We may, however, observe, that the column there seen in front of the northern entrance, commanding a view of the court within, is shown in no other engravings of London. The statues of the several sovereigns of England were ranged in niches in the upper story.

Long after the opening of this Exchange, the shops remained "in a manner empty;" when Gresham, by a new "device," soon altered the cheerless aspect of the place. It was noised abroad that the Queen was going to visit it, upon the strength of which Gresham prevailed upon certain shopkeepers to stock the shops, on promise of "one year rent free." All being prepared on January 27, 1571—amidst the ringing of the bells in every part of the city—"the Queen's Majesty, attended with her nobility, came from her house at the Strand, called Somerset House, and entered the city by Temple Bar, through Fleet-street, Cheap, and so by the north side of the Bourse to Sir Thomas Gresham's house, in Bishopsgate-street, where she dined. After dinner her Majesty returning through Cornhill, entered the Bourse on the south side," and after she had viewed the whole, she caused it, by herald and trumpet, to be proclaimed the Royal Exchange. A bas-relief through which Elizabeth passed, existed down to the last, commemorative of the incident:—

MEDALLION TO COMMEMORATE THE OPENING OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE, BY QUEEN ELIZABETH.

"Proclaim through every high street of the city.

This place be no longer called a Bourse;

But since the building's stately fair, and strange,

Be it for ever called—the Royal Exchange."

Queen Elizabeth's Troubles, Part 2.—A Play, by T. Heywood, 1569.

INTERIOR OF THE FIRST EXCHANGE, 1569.

During the proclamation, leaden pieces, or medallions, were distributed among the populace. One of these medallions is in the collection of Mr. C. H. Smith, F.R.S., who has obligingly permitted our artist to engrave the same. The legend, which is very indistinct in the original, is as follows: "ANGLIÆ REGINA VIRIQUE HONORATA." From the period of the Queen's visit, the shops of the Pawn soon rose in value from forty shillings to four pounds ten, "and then," says Show, "all shops were furnished according to that time: for then the milliners or haberdashers in that place sold mouse-traps, bird-cages, stoving-horns, lanterns, and Jew's-trumpets, &c. There was, also, at that time that kept shops in the upper Pawn of the Royal Exchange—armourers, that sold both new and old armour—apothecaries, booksellers, goldsmiths, and glass-sellers." But we have in this passage only an indication of the transition period of the Exchange; for a few years later still, and the shops were filled with the richest wares that the world of commerce could produce. Not the least interesting part of the history of the old Exchange are its literary memorials, though, for the most part, their authors are unknown to fame. In the lower part of the Exchange, including the great court, jostling each other arising from the Exchange, and all the houses, buildings, &c., belonging to it, amounting to an annual income of £751 1s., besides all charges and repairs.

Immediately after the death of the Lady Graham, the Royal Exchange and its revenues reverted to the Corporation of the City of London and the Mercers' Company; a patent from the Crown, bearing date Feb. 3, 1614 (12 James I.), confirming them in their possession of the property.

The Royal Exchange was utterly destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666:—"When the fire was entered, how quickly did it run round the galleries, filling them with flames; then descending the stairs, compassed the walks, giving forth flaming volleys, and filling the court with sheets of fire. By-and-by the Kings fell all down on their faces, and the greater part of the stone building after them (the founder's statue alone remaining), with such a noise as was dreadful and astonishing." The very interesting fact recorded in the words we have marked with italics is noticed by all the historians of the Fire. The Statue is here represented; and it is a remarkable fact that the statue was again saved in the fire of 1838.

The re-edification of the Exchange became an object of prime concern after the Great Fire; and in Wren's plan for rebuilding London its reconstruction upon the ancient site formed a grand feature. Wren's project, however, was not among the crowd, were men from almost every known nation of the world, habited in their respective costumes, intermixed with the more numerous English merchants, dressed in their large puff'd breeches, long vests, short cloaks, and ruffs, appeared here the half-naturalized Fleming, with his fur-trimmed coat and hat, and tight fitting pantaloons; there the lordly Venetian, in his long robes and elegant cap, &c. On Sundays and holidays, the Exchange appears to have been the resort of boys, children, and young rogues, who played all sorts of pranks therein. The preceding engraving represents the Royal Exchange and the Tun, in Cornhill, in 1610, copied from Holiar's View. Sir Thomas Gresham died in 1579, and his wife in 1596. The latter enjoyed the rents, entertained; but within a month after the Fire estimates were prepared, and early in the following year the ground was cleared, and an order obtained from Charles II. for the Portland stone required. In April, 1667, Mr. Jermain was appointed architect, under the committee appointed by the Corporation of the City and the Mercers' Company. On October 23rd the first stone was laid by Charles II.; when a tapestried shed was set up, and a table spread with a chin of beef, grand dishes of fowl, gammons of bacon, dried tongue, anchovies, caviare, wines, &c.; and Charles gave £20 to the workmen. Similar ceremonies commenced the laying of other "free stones," by the Duke of York and Prince Rupert—these ceremonies being very pleasant things. The edifice was completed in 1850, at an expense of nearly £200,000, besides an expenditure for additional site of about £2000, or twice the cost of the entire original site; such has been the advance in the value of property here in the course of a century. The Exchange was re-opened to the merchants on the 28th of September, 1859.

STATUE OF SIR THOMAS GRESHAM.

The new building, in its essential features, greatly resembled the old, but was larger and more magnificent. A general view of it is shown in the next page. It had, like the old, its ranges of stories, sculptured on this occasion principally by Gibbs; its shops above and below, now increased in number to two hundred; its bell-tower; and its uncovered quadrangle in the centre for the merchants, where was placed a statue of Charles II., by Spiller. The grand entrance, from Cornhill, was also decorated on each side by statues of the same King and of his father.

The ascent to the shops was by spacious staircases of black marble; the colonnade beneath was paved with white and black marble; and the open area with Turkey stones of a small size, the gift, according to tradition, of a merchant trading to that country, whose heart, perhaps, was opened by some unusually fortunate venture, which he thus fitly recorded.

We reluctantly pass over the association of the name of Addison, who has not only recorded his frequent visits to the Exchange, but has commemorated it in one of his most delightful papers in the Spectator. Sir Richard Steele has also contributed to the Spectator some details of the shops, which, in his time, produced a yearly rental of £4000. By the year 1739, however, this sum had declined, especially in the upper story; but their place was supplied by other tenants. Among other offices, were the Lord Mayor's Court, the counting-house of the several attorneys, resembling small shops, with a sort of projecting sign-board to each, bearing the name of its occupier. Then, too, were the Royal Exchange Assurance and other offices; the Graham Lecture-room; and Lloyd's extensive establishment. (The Exchange and its neighbourhood, about this period, will be found engraved in No. 121 of our journal.) This Exchange was frequently repaired; as, about 1760, when Parliament voted £10,000 towards the charges; but the most extensive repairs and improvements were made between the years 1820 and 1825, by Mr. G. Smith, architect to the Mercers' Company, at a cost of about £20,000. Among these improvements was building a new stone tower, 135 feet high, on the south front, in place of a more lofty one of timber. Thus repaired, the Exchange presented the appearance depicted at page 264.

Thus the edifice remained until its entire destruction by fire, on the night of Wednesday, Jan. 16, 1838, the flames having first been seen to burst from the windows of Lloyd's Coffee-room. The conflagration was truly magnificent. Amidst the tumult of the populace, the shouts of the firemen, and the crash of the falling masonry, the chimneys of the tower began to play their popular air on this day. "There's a new luck about the house."

A second time burned out, the merchants had once more to seek a new, though temporary home. This matter was soon accomplished. The South Sea House received the members of "Lloyd's;" whilst the Court of the Exchequer Office, formerly the Court of Sir Thomas Gresham's House, and subsequently of Graham College, accommodated the several mercantile body, as it had done before, on the occasion of the similar calamity.

It was now proposed to rebuild the Exchange with an open area, as before, but upon an enlarged scale, and improved approaches thereto; the cost being defrayed by the Corporation of London and the Company of Mercers (to be re-constituted out of the Gresham estate), and by a grant from Government. Mr. Tite, F.S.A., was then chosen architect, and the materials chosen—granite for the stylobate, and the finest Portland stone for the superstructure. The first stone was laid on January 17, 1840, with great ceremony, by His Royal Highness Prince Albert, in the presence of Aldermen (now Sir John) Lubbock. It should here be explained that the ground has been cleared westward of the site by removing the two stacks of buildings in front of the Bank, so as to leave an uninterrupted area from the intersection of the streets in front of the Mansion House, in which area has been placed Chantrey's equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington.

The great work is now nearly completed. We have from time to time reported its progress, and at present we shall confine our description to the respective fronts, abridged from the Morning Herald:—

EXTENT AND SITE.

The length of the edifice is about 309 feet from east to west; or, according to Mr. Tite's plan, 325 feet 6 inches from the columns of the portico, on the west, to the pillars on the east. The general width of the building averages about 150 feet; the width of the portico is 104 feet, and the extreme width at the east end, at the broadest part, being 175 feet, and the width through the centre, from north to south, 144 feet.

THE EXCHANGE.

The Exchange is entered at each of the four sides by an arched opening placed directly in the centre of each side, the form of the archway being a paleogram, by which the area or principal court is gained.

THE EXTERNAL FACADES.

The west front, with its portico, is superior in its dimensions to any in this country. The width from outside to outside of the eight columns of the first row, the second row having six corresponding columns, is 90 feet and the height from the ground to the apex of the pediment is 75 feet and a half. The dimension of the portico is consequently 26 feet wider and 15 feet higher than that of St. Martin's Church, and 14 feet wider and 7 feet higher than that of the General Post-office. This front has been engraved in No. 161 of our journal. The general height of the order used in this building is 55 feet, the tower at the east end to the top of the vane rising to the extreme height of 170 feet. The tower will be found engraved in our No. 59. The embossed sculptures in the tympanum of the pediment of the portico, by Mr. Westmacott, have already been described and engraved in No. 54 of our journal.

We shall, next week, detail the portico more at length, when we shall engrave its interior.

THE SOUTH FRONT (engraved at page 264).

Has been much admired for the boldness of its architectural outline. The shops along the footpath are divided by pilasters with Corinthian capitals; and over the entire archway or entrance is an attic, which contributes greatly to the general architectural elegance of the facade. In the three central compartments, are sculptured figures representing the fruits and flowers of all nations, also shields, the balustrade and niche having sculptured frames of shields and foliage.

THE EAST FRONT.—(See page 264).

The corners of this facade, north and south, are rounded, and each has an arch similarly ornamented with sculpture. In the centre, or midway along this front, is the entrance to the Exchange, beneath the tower, in which the clock and chimneys are placed. The tower is, in every respect, accordant with the style of the other parts of the building; the tower has an octagonal lantern over the clock and chimneys, and is surmounted by a dome, supported by Corinthian columns, at the summit of which is the vane with the green-hopper crest of Sir Thomas Gresham. In a niche prepared in the east front above the entrance into the inner court and grand quadrangle, a statue in Portland stone of Sir Thomas Gresham is to be placed, now in the hands of Mr. Behnes, the sculptor. The keystones, apical panels, &c., are enriched by elaborate sculpture.

Is, in all its main features, the same as that of the south front, except as regards the entrance into the merchants' area or quadrangle. On each side of the archway are two niches intended for the figures of Sir Richard Whitbington and Sir Hugh Middleton. As a general observation, we must state the design of the north and south fronts are much praised, for their unbroken lines of entablature, with a repetition of arches of the same character. Mr. Tite, in his explanatory remarks to the committee on the design he submitted to that body in April, 1840, observes:—"It appears to me that a building for essentially commercial purposes should present the character of grandeur, simplicity, and usefulness. In this way the universally acknowledged good effect of the House at Paris has been obtained. In this building the lines are simple and unbroken, and the large arched windows surrounding the walls behind the columns, have all the character of shops or offices." Considering the difficulties the architect had to contend with from the shape of the ground, for the tower named in the directions issued by the committee to preserve the line of the building, were happily overcome by the position of the tower being placed at the east end of the building; for, as Mr. Tite pointed out to the committee, had the tower been erected to agree with the lines of the south front, it would have disagreed with the lines of the east and west fronts.

Next week, we shall engrave the principal portions of the interior, with the splendid ceremonial of Opening the Building; at the same time that we shall engrave upon its architectural details.

THE OPENING OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

The Fire, the Fire
Hath reared up on high,
And sent the dark column
Along the dark sky.
And show the red flames up
In passionate light,
And woke the dead City
At mid of the night!

What a rush through the black streets,
A rush and a roar,
Of thousands—all dreamers
A moment before!
How they ran from the East,
How they fled from the West,
To see the Flame-Spirit
In red ruin dress!

Ha! looks he not awful
And wrathful and grand,
As he cracketh the great temple
Under his hand?
They come, the vast people,
To gaze on his wild ire,
Still a Lord over all rules
The Spirit of Fire!

The engines pour round him
Their waters of strength,
On-stirred and on-showered
To crush him at length.
Work on!—his bright eye-balls
Are fast growing dim.
Now the Red Giant faileth
In smoke and limb!

Yes, yes, they have killed him—
Have quenched his hot breath;
But see how his grand ruin
Lords it in death!
Where, where is the sleepeth
With flame-crest run—
Is the temple that yesterday
Stood in the sun?

They say when it rose
In magnificent might,
Its proud founder, Gresham,
Half mad with delight,
Drank pearls crush'd to powder
In wine to its toast,
And vow'd such a wild draught
Was worth what it cost!

When the west-throned lady
Came forth in her grace,
To make his great palace
A regal place,
Of his spirit the proud eyes
Were piercing thro' time,
For in future before him
Gleamed vast and sublime.

He saw it, the bright home
Of Commerce and Trade;
Of might never told,
Of wealth never told,
Of Fame gathered greedily,
Fortune unfurled!
The 'Change-mart of play,
And gain of the world!

He was right!—I rose faster
Than sun-beams dash;
And still through its grand halls
Time's feet came to dash.
In the strength of its riches
Long years made it old,
Till the Flame-Spirit tore down
The Temple of Gold.

Then, where he had striven it
In ashes about,
With voice of a victor
His soul shouted out—
"Come forth now, ye merchants,
From homes where ye bide,
And build up another World's Basil of Pride."

They built up another
More rich and more gay,
Which five hundred Greshams
Shall open to-day!
But with fire-proof walls—
They thoughtfully dare
Another Flame-Spirit
Again to learn there!

Who comes to make royal
This palace? The best
Of all the fair Queens
Ever throned in the west!
When by their high temple
Her dear grace shall bide,
Oh, will not her merchants
Drink pearls in their wine?

And from where the Bar opens
His heavy old gate,
To pass the grand pageant
That brings her to state,
From millions stretched gaily
In lack of delight,
To where the fine Temple
Bursts peered on her sight!

The well-loved, worth-loving
Victoria will bear,
The City's heart-homage
In blessing and cheer;
And the first echo waking
That Palace of Shorn,
Will be loud London's greeting
Of "God save the Queen!"

OFFICIAL PROGRAMME OF THE CEREMONIAL OF HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE CITY.

We are enabled to communicate the following official outline of the ceremony to be observed on Monday. The programme has been sanctioned by her Majesty, and we have the Lord Mayor's permission to give it publicity. It was communicated to the Lord Mayor by Sir John Lubbock, accompanied by the following letter:—"Whitehall, October 21, '44. My Lord—With reference to your lordship's note of the 19th instant, I have the honour to inform your lordship that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to signify her approbation of the ceremonial proposed to be observed upon her Majesty's visit to the Corporation of London on the occasion of opening the new Exchange—I have the honour to be, my lord, your lordship's obedient servant, "J. R. G. GRAMHAM."

"To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, &c."

ORDER OF PROCESSION FROM TEMPLE-BAR ON RECEIVING HER MAJESTY IN HER PROGRESS TO THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Police officers on horseback.
The State carriages of the Sheriff.
The Lord Mayor's state coach.
The City Marshals on horseback.
Members of the Court of Common Council, in their mourning gowns, on horseback, each with an attendant.

In their scarlet gowns and chains, on horseback, each attended by a Sergeant and a Groom.
In their scarlet gowns (those past the chair in their chains), on horseback, each attended by a Herald and a Groom.

The Common Crier on horseback, carrying the City Mace.
The Lord Mayor, in a crimson velvet robe and collar of S.S., on horseback, bearing the City Sword of State immediately before HER MAJESTY.

On the Queen's arrival at Temple-bar, the Lord Mayor will present the City Sword to her Majesty and Prince Albert. At the Exchange they are to be received at the western entrance by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Recorder, and members of the Joint Graham Committee, the Sheriff, and the Remembrancer, who will form themselves into a procession to precede her Majesty, in the following order:—

Trumpeters.
Clerk of the Graham Committee.
Architect.
Twelve Members of the Graham Committee, two and two.
Remembrancer.
Sheriff.
Members of the Court of Aldermen and Recorder, two and two.
Lord Mayor.
Her Majesty the QUEEN and Prince ALBERT, followed by her Majesty's Officers of State.

The procession to enter at the western gate of the Exchange, turning to the right into the ambulatory, and round to the west end, across the open area from west to east to the entrance of Lloyd's room, up the great staircase into the round and from thence to the commercial room, preceded by the Lord Mayor, the procession waiting in the stables for her Majesty's return, and then proceed her Majesty into the subscribers' room, and from thence into the throne room prepared for the address.

The Lord Mayor, immediately preceding her Majesty and Prince Albert, will state the purposes to which the various parts of the building are to be appropriated.

The Officers of State who do not join the procession to be previously conducted into the throne room, as also the members of the Court of Aldermen, who have preceded her Majesty from Temple-bar, and the members of the Joint Graham Committee, who have not formed part of the procession, and the officers of the Corporation.

A suitable address, to be presented to her Majesty from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in the usual form, and setting forth an historical account of the original building, its subsequent destruction, and the restoration of the Exchange by the Corporation of London and the Mercers' Company, as the joint trustees of Sir Thomas Gresham's will under the superintendence of the Joint Graham Committee.

After her Majesty's answer to the address, the Lord Mayor (provided her Majesty's sanction be obtained) to present to her Majesty the mace and recorder of the address, and afterwards the Chairman of the Graham Committee and the Master of the Mercers' Company, under whose superintendence the new Exchange has been erected, and the architect.

The whole of the company in the throne-room, except the Lord Mayor and such of the Joint Graham Committee as are in attendance at the entertainment, will then retire to their seats, and her Majesty will be conducted to the private apartment.

The Lord Mayor to precede her Majesty to the Royal table, and attend upon her Majesty during the dinner.

Grace to be said by the Bishop of London.

Toasts to be given to be previously approved by her Majesty.

Proclamation of herald to be made in the centre of the merchants' area, and her Majesty in person to give her gracious permission for the Exchange to be thenceforth called the Royal Exchange.

Her Majesty to be preceded on her return in the same manner across the open area to the great western entrance.

The number of visitors to the dinner will be about 1400, beyond which number it is found that accommodation cannot possibly be afforded. Of these, about 700 will be seated in the ambulatory, and the same number will be seated in Lloyd's apartments.

In the ambulatory and merchants' area every provision is being made to protect the company from draughts, or the encroachments of bad weather. The north and south entrances will be closely boarded up, and ample protection will be provided at the east and west ends. A very thick and brightly ornamented carpet will be laid on the parts of the area and building on which her Majesty will walk, and under the tables and seats for the company, temporary flooring and drapery will be laid down, so that there will be complete security against damp.

The seats will be confined to a double row, quite round the ambulatory, which, from its ample dimensions and noble height, will admit of such a regulation, without at all being liable to be prejudiced as to the view of its architecture.

It is supposed by the Committee, that her Majesty will arrive at the Exchange at about one o'clock, and leave the building on her return to Windsor at three. Her Majesty will appear in state and in the state carriage, accompanied by her Ministers and suite. Most of the distinguished members of both houses of Parliament, and all the leading merchants and bankers, have been invited.

The procession from Temple-bar to the Exchange will be led by a certain number of the Corporation, Aldermen and Commoners, on horseback, in accordance with ancient custom.

The Lord Mayor has received from Sir James Graham a letter, stating that a communication had been made to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Captain General and Colonel Commanding the Hon. Artillery Company, informing his Royal Highness that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to signify her pleasure that the corps should attend as a guard of honour at the Exchange on the occasion of her Majesty's opening the Corporation of London by being present at the opening of that building on the 28th instant.

The Joint Graham Committee and that of the Mercers' Company, instructed with the arrangements for the reception of her Majesty, are engaged in superintending the suitable decoration and comfort of the apartments to be appropriated to the use of her Majesty, her august Consort, and their suites, within the walls of the Exchange. The grand apartment appropriated for the royal banquet is a vast and beautiful room, and will, when entirely so, present at the same time a unique and magnificent appearance. It is now under repair, in addition to the plate belonging to the Corporation, the magnificent gold plate belonging to the Goldsmiths' Company will be brought into requisition.

The coronation of her Majesty's visit will, it is understood, be observed as a holiday by the principal City establishments. The Directors of the Bank of England have already signified their intention of closing their doors to business operations; and the private bankers, we are informed, have resolved to suspend the attendance of their clerks after twelve o'clock, the previous hours being alleged as necessary for the payment of bills and other affairs which cannot be delayed. It is to be hoped that all other leading firms will follow the example so readily set, and make the day one of general holiday and recreation.

The Lord Mayor has officially recommended an abstinence from business on Monday, and also that the progress of houses on the line of procession should be made secure, in order to prevent accidents. Barricade will be fixed at the end of all the streets in the city through which the royal procession will pass. Similar measures will be adopted outside the city, under the direction of the Metropolitan Police, a considerable number from each division having been ordered to keep the line clear from Buckingham Palace to Temple-bar, assisted by the two Regiments of Horse Guards.

At the Royal Exchange there are to be four entrances for the general company, in addition to the principal entrance at the western front. They are situated, two in Cornhill, and two in Bartholomew-lane.

In the area around St. Paul's, seats capable of containing from 10,000 to 15,000 persons, as depending from the north-west to the south-east side, are in the course of erection. These are to be covered in, and lined inside with pink and white drapery, with similar decorations as those used in 1837. At some of the shops in Chancery the goods have been removed from the windows and seats fixed up in lieu of them. In the neighbourhood of the Exchange as much as five guinees is asked for a single seat, whilst throughout the whole line not one is to be obtained under 10s. 6d. The tradesmen along the line of seats are also on the alert to accommodate the sight-seers, from whom they will no doubt reap a plentiful harvest.

LATEST PARTICULARS.

The members of the Corporation who are to take part in the procession have been allotted their respective places in it, and Sir Peter Laurie is to have the control of the procession. It will be formed as follows:—

Police officers on horseback.
State carriages of the Sheriff.
Carriages of the Aldermen.
State carriage of the Lord Mayor.
The two City Marshals mounted.
12 members of the Common Council in their mourning gowns on horseback and with an attendant.
Sheriff Sidney and Butler.
In their scarlet gowns and chains, on horseback, each attended by a sergeant and a groom.

The Aldermen.
In their scarlet gowns, those past the chair in their chains, on horseback, each attended by a Herald and a groom, placed as follows:—

Mr. Alderman Hooper
Mr. Alderman Johnson
Mr. Alderman Fawcett
Mr. Alderman Fawcett
Mr. Alderman Fawcett

HER MAJESTY.

It is now intended that there shall be four tables in the Subscription Room at Lloyd's, where the entertainment is to take place. The south end of the Subscription-room has been hung with crimson draperies, festooned at the top in graceful folds. There is an enormous mirror, and the royal arms surmount it, denoting the place at which her Majesty is to preside at the festive table. On each side of the large looking-glass is a pair of seats, to have the British standard and ensigns. The royal table at the south end of the room is to be on a raised flooring, so that her Majesty and the distinguished personages selected for the honour of meeting the Sovereign at luncheon shall be so situated as to command an uninterrupted view of the room when the whole of the company has assembled, for it is determined there is not to be a throne or canopy in that room, but merely two gilt state chairs for the Queen and her Royal Consort. The dais, or raised flooring, is to be covered with rich carpeting, the room to be covered generally by a less costly material.

The library, or reading-room, is to be appropriated as an audience-chamber, or throne-room, in which her Majesty is to receive the City address. Here the decorations are on an extended scale; the walls of this apartment being hung with a crimson drapery, tastefully festooned and adorned by suitable gilt ornaments. The whole of the flooring is of inlaid woods, varied in colours, so as to resemble mosaic work, the different shades and colours being brought out in all their brilliancy from having been lightly polished.

There is to be an entire new throne, constructed for this occasion, and, according to rumour, it is to be of a superb description. It will be erected at the eastern extremity of the room, raised on a platform of three steps. There are to be two splendid chairs for the Queen and Prince Consort, beneath the canopy of the throne. The Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and the officers of the Queen's Household (see the Ministers of State), are only to be present at the ceremony of the presentation of the City address by the Remembrancer, attended by the Lord Mayor, the Sheriff, Mr. Jan Bent St. Jones, and Mr. Harrison, the mover and seconder of the address.

We hear from a well-informed source, that her Majesty has signified her gracious approbation of the arrangements submitted for her consideration and approval, and it is intimated that the noblemen and ladies, and other persons having the honour of invitations to the entertainment in the grand room, are to appear in full dress and uniform. Such desire is not, however, understood to apply to the guests to be entertained in the colonnade of the Merchants' Area.

The interior of the Quadrangle has an elegant, though too showy, an appearance for the purposes of the building. The arabesque ornaments are elaborately worked, the pedimental colours being buff and crimson, and the pavement under the arcade is inlaid with blocks of black marble and red porphyry. At the north-eastern corner is the statue of Queen Elizabeth, the founder of the original Exchange, and in a corresponding niche on the north-west is a statue of King Charles II., in whose reign it was rebuilt. A doorway left in the pavement in the central part of the open space of the Quadrangle, for the statue of her Majesty Queen Victoria, who is not yet completed, but a model of it will occupy the place on Monday. The approach to Lloyd's coffee room, where the banquet to the Queen will be given, is from the north-eastern end of the Quadrangle; the staircase being handsome, but greatly deficient of light.

The room itself is imperfectly lighted by green glass skylights and a few side windows, otherwise it is finely proportioned and well suited for its object. Of the fourteen hundred persons invited not more than three hundred and fifty will dine in the room with the Queen, and though it is expected her Majesty will preside around the other tables, the majority of the company might almost as well take their dinner comfortably at home, were it not for this anticipated passing view of the Queen, Prince Albert, and the royal suite.

On Thursday application was made to the Lord Mayor by the trustees of several of the livery companies to call out by precept the whole of those communities to erect booths in St. Paul's Churchyard, or to form themselves in line in the streets through which the procession will pass.

It is recorded that when Queen Elizabeth visited the City, the livery companies being drawn out in line from Temple-bar to the Guildhall, her Majesty thought proper to dismiss the military attendants, and that, when the Spanish Ambassador said to the Queen, "Where are your Majesty's guards?" she replied, pointing to the faithful citizens, "These are my guards!" There is no doubt that, if time had sufficed, the whole of the livery companies would, in the present day, have been anxious to testify their loyalty by a similar demonstration. The Lord Mayor, however, felt that, with the limited interval which would elapse before the Queen's entry, there would not be sufficient time to make the requisite arrangements.

SILVER CHERRY FOR THE KING OF ARABIA.—We have just inspected an elegant chest, which has been designed, and manufactured, and chased in silver by Mr. Sharp, of Barton-trenard. It contains 18 by 12 inches, is 6 inches deep, and it is computed, will hold about 200,000 worth of gold dust, as a depository for which the chest is intended to be used by his Arabian Majesty. The chest is designed as very elegant; in the centre of the lid is a magnificent head, the emblem of Arabia, in frosted silver; and around the lid is a broad border of the heads alternately, of the tiger, elephant, and lion, beautifully chased. The sides are ornamented with the heads of tigers, &c., as a burning ground; and at each end is a stout handle, formed of two crossed spears, admirably chased; the interior is highly burnished, and entirely plain. The chest is furnished with a triple lock, by which, to which there is a gold key. The precious depository is enclosed in a walnut case for protection; and one of its chief uses will be its display in state processions, filled with the precious metal. The King of Arabia has a large collection of chests for this purpose.

Adelphi. A five-act comedy by Mr. Housholt is in preparation at the Haymarket; and we hear Mr. Jerrold has been applied to, to write an original drama for the Strand. The "Prisoner of War," by the latter talented dramatist, is about to be produced at Sadler's Wells.

seasonable shelter; but on his arrival at the portico he was awfully awakened to the fact by having tendered to him her life as a blanket and a good night together with his old umbrella.

THE GRAND BUFFET, ST. GEORGE'S HALL, AT THE GARTER BANQUET, GIVEN TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE FRENCH.

STATE BUFFET, ST. GEORGE'S HALL, WINDSOR CASTLE.

The buffets at the royal banquets are neither placed nor arranged in the ordinary manner: the oriel window of the banquetting-hall, and the simple grouping of less costly collections, give way at Windsor to a bolder and more striking method for display. There, such is the size, the multitude, and precious character of the plate, that it has been found necessary, for its due display, to build it up in the form of two independent piles of gold, placed, on state occasions, at each end of the banquetting-hall. An engraving exhibits the westernmost of these gorgeous structures, as they appeared on the night of the Garter Banquet, depicted in our last week's journal.

It will be seen to consist of a square Gothic screen, with tabular supports for the various pieces of plate; the whole covered with a rich drapery of red cloth, with decorations of gold. In the centre, appears the famous shield of Achilles:

beneath it the Huma, or Peacock of Precious Stones; the Golden Tiger used by Tippeco Sah as his footstool; and two of his standards; all taken at the storming of Seringapatam. Above these, at the summit of the screen, stands the Spanish Wine-fountain, taken from a ship of the Armada; and around these, covering both sides of the buffets, are spread numerous costly specimens of English gold work, ranging from the massive acornes of Henry VIII. to the ponderous vases and salvers of Queen Anne. At the bottom, running the whole length of the buffet, appears a matchless collection of the works of Benvenuto Cellini, and his great church-working contemporaries; they consist chiefly of jewelled cups, formerly used for sacramental purposes; vases of gold and crystal; and censers, formed of ivory and gold, the former most exquisitely carved in alto-relievo, with various scriptural and historic scenes. Between these, at intervals, are placed the more choice specimens of George IV.'s plate—chimeras, grotesques, Homeric fancies, marine groups and the like, all bearing marks of the classic fancy of Flaxman, by whom they were mostly designed.

The effect of this imposing display of the finest arts, revelling, as it were, in the wealth of kingdoms, was, however, neither dazzling nor exciting—a sense of reality, of perfection, seemed to fill the mind, to the exclusion of every other feeling. On the night of her Majesty's Garter Banquet to Louis Philippe we felt, as its flood of golden reflectors fell on the wondrous company, that for that night at least it was nobly employed. On other occasions, and in many lands, it had been used in adding to the splendours of superstitious worship, in serving the pride of conquerors, or ministering to the sensuality of luxurious kings; but on this, its proud destination was to give honour to the meeting of two princes of peace.

divided by one field from the grounds of Osborne House, the marine residence of her Majesty. The ground is high, but slopes towards the sea. The house is spacious, and contains forty-seven rooms, half of which number, however, are not habitable. The drawing-room is twenty-four feet by nineteen; and the banqueting-room twenty-two feet by twenty-one. There are two principal staircases, one of which leads to the chapel.

The situation is one of delightful retirement, and has called forth the following lines from a correspondent:—

Oh! dearest Barton! sweet, secluded spot!
How happy is the tranquil, peaceful lot
Of those who 'neath thy roof-tree shelter find,
And taste of rural bliss, by Heaven's design'd
To purify the heart, and raise the soul
Above the cold world's selfish, stern control.
Although no regal pageantry be thine,
The azure skies of summer brightly shine
Upon thy lofty chimneys' tow'ring height,
Or tinge them with the evening's ruddy light;
Bright beacon to the cottager's rude home,
As to their own freerides they thronging come.
Seems shade of peace, of love, and joy,
Of pleasures which the heart can never cloy!
Thy shady walks, embowered in ancient trees,
Which were their welcome to the ocean breeze;
Thy verdant lawns, of purest emerald green,
With flow'rs bedecked, a lovely scene
Of ever-smiling happiness, disclose
Where Royalty might taste a sweet repose! M. E. R.

"WILKES'S COTTAGE," ISLE OF WIGHT.

Our second "Nook" is the cottage pointed out as once the residence of the celebrated, or rather notorious, John Wilkes. It stands contiguous to Sandown Fort, built to command the wide spreading bay of the same name. The cottage is, indeed, a charming residence, and, to Wilkes, must have been a delightful retreat from mob popularity; and would have proved so, especially after the patriot became, to use his own words, "A fire burned out."

INAUGURATION OF THE WELLINGTON STATUE, GLASGOW.

INAUGURATION OF THE EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AT GLASGOW.

This magnificent testimonial to the high deserts of the illustrious Duke well bespeaks the gratitude and liberality of the citizens of Glasgow. Its erection was decided on at an influential public meeting, in the spring of 1840; and within a few months the subscriptions amounted to nearly £10,000—several of the business firms and noblemen and gentlemen in Glasgow and the west of Scotland having contributed sums varying from £200 to £1,000 each. A deputation of the subscribers then waited upon the Duke of Wellington, at Apsley House, and communicated their intention to his Grace.

After long and most anxious deliberation, the acting committee, on the 30th of November, 1841, resolved to nominate Charles, Baron Marochetti of Vaux, in the Department of Seine-et-Oise, in France, as the artist to design and erect the statue, with the illustrative bas-reliefs, on the pedestal, representing the battles of Asper and Waterloo.

The Baron, in due course, completed the important work assigned to him; and a granite pedestal having been executed to the satisfaction of all, by Mr. Jas. Smith, architect, the statue arrived in Glasgow on Friday, the 27th ult., the noble and accomplished artist having arrived a few days previously. It was transmitted from Havre to Liverpool, and conveyed from thence to the Clyde in the Admiral steamship, which had been gratuitously placed at the disposal of the committee by Messrs. Thomson and Macdonald, the enterprising owners. Several documents and coins, contained in two large crystal bottles, constructed for the purpose, were then deposited in the pedestal, previous to the 8th inst., the day fixed for the inauguration of the statue. The bas-reliefs and other decorations were then inserted in the pedestal, upon which the statue itself was placed on Saturday, before the opening. The site has been judiciously chosen in front of the Royal Exchange.

The inauguration was fixed for two o'clock; but long before that hour all the streets in the neighbourhood of the Exchange were densely crowded, and the utmost anxiety was evinced by all to obtain what were considered the most prominent positions for observation. The ground immediately round the front of the Exchange had been staked and roped in; but these barriers were soon disregarded, and the arrangements of the Committee got so confused at the commencement that they were never afterwards retrieved. The scene was very imposing; for various banners floated in the vicinity, and every house-top and window from which a view could be obtained, was filled with anxious gazers. About two o'clock, Sheriff Alison; Sir Neil Douglas, the Commander of the Forces; the Lord Provost of Glasgow; and Colonel Fleming, ascended a temporary elevation in front of the statue; and after a brief address had been delivered by the learned Sheriff, the signal was given, and the covering which had hitherto concealed the statue of the Hero and Statesman, as lifted up by means of block and tackle affixed to the summit of the portico of the Exchange. The opening was greeted by a round of enthusiastic cheering, and succeeded by the booming of the guns of the artillery, which had been placed in Bell's Park, and which signalled the moment of the inauguration to every part of the city.

ST. MICHAEL'S NEW CHURCH, FIMLICO.—(See next page.)

Immediately after the statue stood uncovered, the Scots Greys, at present in Glasgow, passed in a marching line, preceded by their band, and saluted as they approached. The Old Highlanders followed, accompanied by their band playing "The Garb of Old Gaul," and also saluted. Then came the Artillery with their guns. The military part of the procession was closed by a fully armed and fine body of old pensioners in their new uniforms, amounting to upwards of 200. Many of them were decorated with medals, and had shared the career of the great Duke in the heady fight or the lonely bivouac. As the veterans passed, they were greeted with a most cordial cheer. Thereafter the Lord Provost ascended the temporary elevation, and pronounced three cheers for Baron Marochetti, the artist of a work which will be considered the greatest ornament that Glasgow can boast of. The cheers were given with right good will, and modestly acknowledged by the Baron, who bowed respectfully to the assembly before him. The crowd then gradually broke up.

We subjoin the details of this highly commended work of art:—

THE STATUE.

The pedestal, which is of Peterhead granite, is 35 feet high. On this, the statue is placed, resting on a floor of brass. The horse has just come to a state of repose and seems as if listening to some distant sound. The head is that of an Arab, with the broad forehead and wide nostrils, and is standing with fore foot a little in advance, in an easy posture, the reins lying slack. The position of the Duke is that of a General reviewing his troops. The likeness is taken when the Duke was in the prime of life, and been declared by his Grace's brother, Lord Cowley, to be perfect. The hero is dressed in the full uniform of a Field Marshal, with his different orders.

THE BAS RELIEFS.

These are placed on the south and north sides of the pedestal, and rep-

the first and last victories of the Duke, namely, that of Assaye, fought on 23d September, 1803, and Waterloo, on the 18th June, 1815.

The scene to the left of the relief, is the victory of Assaye, represents the submission of the native chief to Colonel Wellesley. There is likewise the figure of a Highland soldier, leading the horse of a captive Prince, and one of Wellington's staff introducing him. Colonel Wellesley is represented in the middle of the bas-relief, on a beautiful steed, and holding up his hand, in the act of receiving the submission. The right side of the picture represents the battle. In the foreground are two horses in strong relief, drawing a piece of artillery on a carriage. Behind the sun the troops are seen to advance, led on by an officer. The background is, of course, entirely Asiatic, and shows mosques, minarets, &c. In the bas-relief of the Battle of Waterloo, is seen the Church of Waterloo to the left, with Montgomerie, in flames, in the distance—broken guns and carriages, &c. The moment seemed upon it to be that when the final charge was ordered, and when the Duke is said to have exclaimed, "Up Guards and at them!" A party of the guards are in advance, with the Duke in the centre, mounted, and wearing a military cloak. The Marquis of Anglesley (a very fine likeness), Lord Hill, and another officer, all mounted, follow in a group.

The small bas-reliefs on the east and west ends of the pedestal represent the soldier's return, and the soldier at the pitch, after all his labours, and after having saved his country from the invasions of the foe.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XLIX.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. MICHAEL, PIMLICO.

This church is now in course of erection from the design of Mr. Thomas Candy, of Chester-square, Pimlico, wherein the edifice is situated. The first stone was laid by the Earl Grosvenor, on the 20th of May, in the present year. It is calculated to accommodate 1200 persons, 800 seated in pews, and 400 in free seats: the cost will be £5000, including a lofty tower and spire, of 150 feet in height. The style of architecture is that termed Decorated Gothic, such as prevailed about the middle of the 13th century. The exterior of the building is faced with Kentish rag-stone, with quays and dressings of Bath stone.

There is still a considerable deficiency in the funds to enable the committee to complete the edifice. The amount already raised has been entirely by private subscription, to which the Earl Grosvenor has munificently contributed £5000. The site is the gift of his lordship's father, the Marquis of Westminster. The incumbent of the church will be the Rev. James Gibson, late minister of the Lock Chapel.

We regret to add, that the building of the church-tower has been suspended by order of the Admiralty, until the Semaphore on Chelsea College has been altered, the working of which would otherwise have been interrupted.

THE ALBERT BRIDGE, MANCHESTER.

This handsome bridge has just been erected on the site of the late New Bailey Bridge, across the Irwell, from Bridge-street, Manchester, to New Bailey-street, Salford; the old bridge having been closed to the public on the 20th of June last year, and wholly taken down, after having stood 50 years that month.

The first stone of the new Albert Bridge was laid, we believe, in August, 1842; and the keystone of the arch was fixed, by Mr. William Garrett, with some ceremonial, on the 20th June last. The footpath on the north side of the bridge was opened to the public on Friday, the 16th of August; and the bridge was wholly opened to the public for carriages and foot passengers, on Thursday, the 10th ult., having occupied about thirteen months in its erection. The bridge, from the level of the water, has been erected under the superintendence of Mr. C. Garington, bridge-master of the hundred of Salford, and the structure is generally admired for its massive and substantial character, and spacious carriage and footways. It is a fine stone structure of a single arch (the segment of a circle), the span of which is 110 feet 2½ inches on the skew, but on the square, 105 feet. The arch springs from about the level of the water, and has a rise thence to the inner centre of the arch, of 30 feet; that centre being about 30 feet higher than the bed of the river. The thickness of the arch in masonry is about 3 feet. The arch (which was completed in the short space of six weeks, from the first stone to the keystone) is built of Bolton stone, and the keystone measures 5½ ft. by 3 ft. 6 in., and 1½ ft. 8 in.; it weighs about 3 tons. The width of the bridge within the battlements is 60 feet, of which 40 feet is occupied by the carriage way, and the remainder by a spacious footpath on each side, 10 feet in width. Messrs. Sugden and Bateman were the sub-contractors, under Messrs. Howes and Murray, of Liverpool, for the whole of the stonework. The cost of the erection of this bridge is said to defrayed from the funds of the county, and we believe it has cost nearly £5000. Besides this, the approaches in Manchester have been greatly improved, at a cost to the township of upwards of £2000; and its approaches on the Salford side will probably amount to upwards of £1000.

The bridge is certainly a noble and spacious structure, of plain but massive character: in the centre of each battlement, a large and neat cast-iron lamp-pillar is placed, the cross-piece of which contains, in gilt letters, the words "Albert Bridge." The lamps are eight-light burners, fitted, under the direction of Mr. Ross, superintendent of the Manchester fire-brigade, with six admirable Ross's lights.

The ceremonial of opening the bridge was an interesting spectacle; the street was decorated with the national flag, and in the centre of the north footpath was placed a table furnished with refreshments, and in front, two chairs for the speakers of the day. The Salford authorities first crossed the bridge; then, the Manchester authorities advanced, and the two municipal processions met and passed on the centre of the bridge, the Mayors of Manchester and Salford met, for the first time on any public occasion, and saluted each other, the military bands playing. On their way to the table, they shook hands with each other, and with the aldermen and councillors of the neighbouring borough, and also with the county magistrates, the third public body assembled on the bridge. William Garrett, esq., the chairman of the bridge-committee of magistrates, then opened the proceedings, and at the close of a most speech, drank "Success to the Albert Bridge." Mr. Garington, the bridge-master, then dashed a wine-glass, full of wine, against the parapet; and thus the bridge was christened. The toast was drunk with three times three cheers, both military bands playing "God save the Queen." Several other toasts were proposed, in excellent speeches by the Mayors of Manchester and Salford, &c., and drunk with enthusiasm, and the proceedings terminated.

It was stated that some gentleman had offered £2 to the owner of any cart which should pass first over the bridge after the Mayors' carriages. In consequence of this invitation, a long line of carts laden with people, were in waiting on the Salford side of the bridge; but a donkey cart, the only one that started from the Manchester side, got clear over before the heavier carts had gained the centre of the bridge, amidst the loud laughter and cheering of a great concourse of people, amongst whom it was greatly discussed whether a donkey cart was a cart.

In the evening, the bridge was, for the first time, illuminated by the "Rose light." The effect was exceedingly good.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

We are glad to hear that Sir William Follett, who is now at Naples, has received much benefit from the climate of Italy; so much so, that he has dispensed with the attendance of his medical adviser, Dr. Haight. It is however deemed necessary for the entire restoration of Sir William's health that he should remain some months longer in the genial climate of the south, so it is probable that he will not come to England before February.

The celebrated Spanish historian Don Martin Fernandez Navarrete died on the 24th inst., at Madrid.

At the last sitting of the States of Hungary, the proposition of extending the land-tax to the nobles was rejected by a majority of 33 to 15.

A fire broke out at Clancha, a mining town in the Harz Forest in Hanover, on the 16th of last month, which in the short space of a few hours destroyed a church and several public offices, swept away 218 dwelling-houses and a great number of stables and barns, and left 3980 of the inhabitants without a roof to shelter them from the rigour of a northern winter, to which the town of Clancha, owing to its situation on the top of a mountain, is particularly exposed.

News has been received from Vienna of the death of Alma, the only grand-daughter left by the distinguished poet Goethe. The young lady was in her 17th year, and her premature decease is very much lamented, not only by her own relations and acquaintances, but also by those numerous admirers of her distinguished ancestor, who take a deep interest in everybody bearing his great name.

In the first days of the present month, an attempt at revolt was made in Berlin. A band crossed the Sava into the district of Chabaz, took possession of that town and its town-house, but troops arriving they were dispersed. The attempt was made in favour of Prince Milosch.

The Paris papers state that the marriage of the Duke d'Angoulême will certainly take place in November at Naples. On his return to Paris, the Duke and Duchess d'Angoulême will occupy apartments at the Tuileries. M. Fontaine, the architect, had suggested the idea of placing the Palais-Royal at the disposal of their Royal Highnesses; but as the King holds to having all his children near him he refused to assent to such a project.

On the 25th ult. an experimental trip was made on the first line of railroad which is completed from Warsaw to Vienna. Prince and Princess Paskewitch, and a distinguished circle, proceeded by the train. The trial was perfectly successful.

A large and influential Conservative firm in Manchester have announced a voluntary intention of advancing the wages of their workpeople 10 per cent.

Accounts from Leipzig, of the 12th inst., announce the conclusion of the principal wholesale business of the great fair. Russia and France do not appear to have been in very brisk demand, few of the foreign buyers taking largely. Soap's wool was in much request; cotton manufactures sold well in regard to those of the Zollverein, but English were in less favour. The supply was large. Woolen fabrics were best supported in value. Linens had a satisfactory sale, and hosiery was sought to a large amount.

The Manchester Gazette announces that Fanny Elliser was expected to appear at the Opera of that city.

The inauguration of a monument in memory of Goethe was to take place at Frankfurt, on Tuesday last, with great pomp and ceremony.

The Prince Charles Anselm of Tour and Taxis died at Prague on the 8th inst., at the age of fifty-two. This nobleman was a second cousin of the Prince of Tour and Taxis, who partook of the splendid hospitalities of the Duke of Bedford, at Badminton, last season.

It is now fixed that a winter coal delivery shall take place, but it is believed that the subsidiary arrangements will not be made till the beginning of Term.

It appears from an official return that, at the end of August last, there had been completed in Germany 475 French leagues of railroads, and that the capital employed amounted to 136 millions of florins (about 373 millions of francs).

We learn from Frankfort that on the night of the 4th instant there were destructive fires in two Austrian villages, named Hohenlohe and Arnstadt. Nearly 250 houses were consumed. At Hohenlohe the church was the only building spared by the flames.

On Tuesday a sale by auction of 85 hales and 38 half-hales of American hay took place at the offices of Messrs. Keeling and Hunt. There were sixteen lots, which realised from 35s. to 90s., a ton—10s. to 20s. higher per ton than the former parcels. There were also offered for sale 10 3/4 tons of Irish salmon in tins, at 6d. and 7d. per lb., and the article was highly approved of.

In consequence of a general order, all the children belonging to the charitable institutions of Lyons placed at nurse in Savoy have been recalled to France. On Monday last, at Chanaz, 38 of these helpless creatures were placed in a small boat on the Rhone, to be sent to France. But the children, when separated from their nurses, felt such a dread of the water, that they screamed loudly, and rushing to one side of the boat, they capsized it. The two boatmen could not even save themselves, but the Rhone engulfed them in its flood with the 38 children.

A letter from Nantes states that a fisherman of Chinon has just found in a neighbouring canal a statue of gilt metal. It is in good preservation, and is supposed to be of the time of the Romans, one of their camps having been erected near the spot.

A Christiania paper relates that the severe laws of Norway against the Jews have been lately applied in the case of two persons taken up on a charge of swindling. They were fully acquitted, but both were discovered to be Jews, one a convert of Hamburg, named Lopez, and the other an officer of Palestine, named Philippen. They were shown into prison in the midst of thieves and malefactors, there to await their sentence, which will condemn them to a fine of 4000 francs, and to be taken out of the kingdom by gentlemen as vagabonds.

Upwards of £3000 have been subscribed for the relief of the widows and children of the H-wellillery soldiers.

The Journal de Reims announces the death of M. Houzeau-Muiron, the deputy for that city, after an illness of 25 days. M. Houzeau-Muiron was one of the most distinguished men in France in the industrial arts. He was the person who introduced in France the lighting by portable gas on an improved system, and rose by force of perseverance and industry to the important position in which he stood for several years before his death.

The police authorities of Heidelberg, in the grand duchy of Baden, have, with a view to prevent intemperance and drunkenness, issued an order, declaring that any workman who shall be found in a public-house, except at the hour of meals, shall be fined a sum equal to three francs French for the first offence, and be imprisoned three days for a second offence. Public-house keepers are prohibited, on pain of heavy fines, from supplying the workmen with wines or liquors, except at meal times.

The celebrated pianist, Liszt, is at Madrid, and is about to give several concerts.

THE MARKETS.

CORN MARKETS.—FRIDAY.—Since Monday, a full average quantity of English wheat has been imported up to our market, hence the market, to-day, were well supplied with samples. In the demand, we saw nothing new or extraordinary. The supply of foreign wheat was not large, and the inquiry for that article was inactive, at previous prices. Of English wheat, very little was offered; but 14,000 quarters of foreign wheat having arrived, caused the latter trade to rise, and at barely low rates. The best wheat was quite as dear, but in other kinds, very little was doing. Oats, beans and peas supported the prices of Monday.
